PROBLEMS OF THE ORIENT FROM THE MISSIONARY POINT OF VIEW.

LLOYD BALDERSTON.

There has been progress in missionary method. Nearly all are now agreed that missionaries must first learn and then build upon whatever is good in Japanese customs and maxims; that leading is better than trying to drive. There is, however, wide and emphatic divergence in regard to many of the details of method.

One of the points on which opinions differ as to mode of approach is concerned with the scale of living of the missionaries themselves. Wonderful results have been achieved, especially in India, by some workers who have taken the road of poverty, and there has been in America much criticism of the missionaries whose salaries enable them to live in better style than the average of the people about them. The ground of this criticism has been largely removed, so far as Japan is concerned, by the advance in scale of living among the Japanese.

In defense of the plan under which missionaries are paid enough to enable them to live in comparative comfort, it is urged that the appeal to people of education is more likely to prove fruitful, since the educated convert exerts much greater influence than the laborer. This view seems justified at least to some extent in Japan, where a disproportionately large number of Christians are men of learning and influence. In Sapporo, less than two per cent. of the population are church members, while about one-fourth of the faculty of the University are.

It is so throughout the country. The influence of Christianity on the thought of Japan is far greater than the number of Christian converts among her people would lead one to expect.

Whatever view we may hold in regard to the effect of the missionary's scale of living on the success of his mission, I feel quite justified in saying that most missionaries in the Orient would not last long if they were obliged to live in the manner of Japanese laborers. Ordinary prudence surely suggests that if we wish the best return from the lives and energy invested, comfortable living conditions should be provided for the workers. I heard one teacher say: "It takes half of my energy all winter just to fight the cold."

Another matter on which opinions differ is whether indirect modes of approach shall be countenanced, or only direct ones. Many are committed to what may be called the method of pure evangelism, eschewing any concern with social betterment schemes, or other indirect methods. Many converts have been won by this means, and as now carried on by such men as Paul Kanamori, evangelism is a great force in waking Japan to a sense of her need.

Among foreigners, I suppose those most committed to the direct approach method are the believers in the near approach of the second coming of Christ. They reason that there is not time to reap results by indirect methods, we must save as many as we can from the destruction that impends. Besides, it is useless to spend effort on improving outward conditions of life since the whole present order is soon to be done away.

Over against this point of view is that of the rapidly increasing number of men and women who believe that their best service to Japan lies in showing that Christianity does things not only to the lives of those who accept it, but for those who come into contact with it, whether they accept it or not. This mode of approach had its first trial in the establishment of schools in which young people were taught the various subjects of the curriculum by Christian teachers. This is an old and successful method of capturing the imagination of the children.

The newer method is much broader. It seeks to touch all the forms of activity in a community, helping the people to decide by discussion among themselves what ought to be done, and then to help them in all possible ways to carry out improvements. I shall describe very briefly and imperfectly the work being done in one Japanese city to illustrate this kind of work.

Mito, seventy miles north of Tokio, is the Boston of Japan, centre of the oldest classical literary movement in the empire, and constitutionally suspicious of everything new. Mission activities, chiefly of the pure evangelism type, have been going on for some thirty years, and there are several hundred converts, including very few of the leading men of the town.

A new worker, trained in sociology at Columbia University, began there two years ago with an industrial survey of the city. Access to a number of leading men, including some bankers and educators, was obtained by consenting to help them in the study of English. This soon developed into a social problems club, meeting at the missionary's house, in which the needs of the city are debated. A Bible class, composed mostly of older school boys, meets at the house. A boys' club has been organized along lines a good deal like the Boy Scouts. A Y. M. C. A. is working, with large evening classes in English, French and German, held at the Friends' meeting-house. The missionary has accepted an invitation to teach English in the newly organized Government college. Recently a civic betterment campaign was carried through, nearly all the work being done by the Japanese themselves. Meetings were held in several towns throughout the province, presided over in each case by a local official. Discussion of methods of fighting disease, of child welfare problems, of good roads, and various other matters of vital interest were discussed in Japanese by Japanese, with moving picture illustrations. All the advertising, including many posters, was managed by the Japanese. To be sure, the missionaries were in the thick of the campaign, to the limit of their strength, but not obtrusively prominent! Besides all this, the mission home is a social centre for people of many kinds.

The city is an important educational centre, and a dormitory for girls under a single lady missionary has been in operation for some years. Now it is proposed to build one for young men, adjacent to the home of the young couple whose activities have been sketched.

I need hardly say that I believe thoroughly in this indirect method of commending to the Japanese the message of Jesus Christ to the world, having confidence that in the long run it will yield rich results in the shape of active, devoted and intelligent disciples of Him who came not to be ministered unto but to minister.

NOTE.—This address was delivered at a Conference at George School Seventh Month 3rd last. Some who heard it then urged its publication in THE FRIEND.—[Eds.]

A DISARMAMENT RESOLUTION, declaring the full accord of the Haverford student body with the action of the Princeton Intercollegiate Disarmament Conference, was unanimously passed by the Students' Association on Eleventh Month 7th.

A MEETING FOR WORSHIP is held at Hatboro, Pa., once a month on First-day afternoons. The last meeting, under date of Twelfth Month 12th, proved an interesting occasion. A goodly number of Friends of both Yearly Meetings assembled, and also some six German Methodist Christians, who told one of the visitors present, that the reason they felt like attending the meeting was on account of the reports that had reached them by letters from various parts of Germany of the work Friends were doing there. Thus the ministry of mercy abroad is reacting on the testimony of Friends at home.—R.

To the Editors—

We ask that you will give as great prominence to this appeal for flour as is possible. We are concentrating the whole effort of the Service Committee toward securing flour through the appeal, and need every bit of publicity you are able to give. J. Augustus Cadwallader, a miller, of Yardley, Pennsylvania, a member of Makefield Monthly Meeting of Friends, is now at Headquarters organizing and conducting the campaign.

A MILLION BARRELS OF FLOUR ARE WANTED FOR RUSSIA.

Service Committee Appeals to Every Organization and Family to Give of Our Great Surplus.

HOW MANY BARRELS WILL YOU GIVE?

The nation has been asked to give a million barrels of flour to the 15,000,000 starving people of Russia, to be distributed by the Friends. Every miller of the country has been approached and asked to give, and the great flour weekly papers, "The Northwestern Miller" and "The Modern Miller," have editorially commended the appeal, and have given free pages of advertising to it.

The plan as outlined by the Service Committee is, each miller will be asked to make a direct contribution in flour to the campaign, and with this as a nucleus, to solicit and accept contributions from the community about him. He will sell at cost the flour which the community buys from him, thus making every dollar buy the greatest amount of food possible. In the community all agencies will be asked to contribute. The bankers, the chamber of commerce, the Rotary or Kewanis Club, the women's Club, the lodges, the grange, the labor unions and the churches will be asked to take their share in raising this amount of flour. The basic cost of a barrel of flour will be put at Five Dollars and each organization will be asked to contribute one barrel for every ten members, which will mean a giving of only fifty cents per member.

The family is the great unit of American life. How many families in the circle of your acquaintance would not be able to give one barrel of flour this winter, out of their abundant supplies, to save men, women and children from the agony of death by starvation? The family which gives a barrel of flour will practically never know, by the quantity of food that is served upon its table during the winter, that it has given the flour. Even with the remembrance of all that we have given during the past five years is it not true that not one of us, even, has ever begun to actually suffer because of what we have given? We have always given of our surplus, and even those of us who went deep into our surplus have always stopped when the limits of our surplus had been reached. We have never given of our actual needs and wants.

Suppose, just as a dream, we have given until all of the extras of our life are gone, and if we should give more it would take of that which we actually need for ourselves. The world, and life, has never been saved by someone giving of their surplus. Its saviours have always been those who have given of their very life.

To-day one-seventh of the number of people who live in the comfort and security and luxury of the United States, are standing helpless while Death overruns them, tears their children from them, separates families and causes the agony and misery that starvation alone can bring. The world is suffering the agony that would come to us if one of our children should die, multiplied by 15,000,000. In the face of this shall we give simply of that which we do not need, or shall we give until it begins to take even life-blood itself? Somehow a young man of Nazareth tried to teach that to give until one sacrificed one's very life was the only way to live. Shall we follow Him?

FEEDING THE HELPLESS BREAKS DOWN VIOLENCE.

A raiding expedition of 800 men and women, all dressed in sheepskin coats and riding black horses, and carrying two rifles apiece, swept down upon the warehouses of the Soviet Government in Moscow and looted them, taking what they wanted, and then, opening the doors wide, called to the people to come in and take what was left—states a recent cable to the American Relief Administration.

But a strange thing was happening during all this time. The warehouse of the American Relief, which stood nearby, was left untouched. The tall, thin, black-bearded leader stood upon a high stand in the public square and said that he had only humanity at heart and their effort was only to feed the starving. Coming and going the raiders met several unprotected wagon trains carrying relief supplies south into the famine area, but always left them unmolested when they learned the origin and purpose of the food. Thus it is practically assured that the relief train will be safe from those who would maraud for their selfish use.

A STOVE AND A PIECE OF GLASS.

Winter is coming on swiftly now in Poland, and at the out-post station of the Society of Friends, organized to aid the peasants in the devastated areas, the workers are arranging for defense against the cold. They are repairing boots, sorting out mittens into pairs, sewing fur on to their coats and experimenting with fires.

At one of these stations a few days ago the Mission workers decided that they must have a stove. They were living in a house which had been wrecked by the Bolshevik invasion last year, and the usual big white stove had been destroyed. They inquired, therefore, if it was possible to buy a stove in the small neighboring village. The answer was, as they had feared, that it was not possible. But then a man came forward and stated that he would make them a stove, himself, with his own hands. "What kind of a stove?" asked the Mission workers, "and are you an expert ironworker, and do you know about stoves, and what will your stove cost if you make it for us?" "Come and see my house," answered the man "and I will answer all your questions there."

In a few minutes the party were ushered into a small dugout which was hardly visible above ground in the heaps of surrounding rubble and bricks. The inside of the shelter, which was about eighteen feet by twelve, was made of wood collected from ruins, sawn and smoothed and shaped so that it fitted floors and walls beautifully. The roof was corrugated iron, with the joints and crevices neatly filled with clay. The table and chairs, and the bench which ran along one wall, were also made of the same wood, but so exquisitely carpentered that, with a coat of paint or varnish, they would have passed for the work of a professional furniture maker. The bed was covered with a neatly-patched old blanket. The floor was spotless. And in one of the corners stood a stove, in which a fire was burning steadily.

"I made the stove," said the man, "after I had made the rest of the house." But it was such a skillfully-made stove that the workers looked at it dubiously. After all, they felt, Mission money cannot be thrown away on elaborate things when simple ones would be as good and cheaper. So they asked tentatively how much it would cost them to have a stove like that made. In reply the man pointed to the small oblong windows at the end of the shelter. It was the only window, and it was eighteen inches long and about five inches broad. It had a neat frame of white wood, opening on two brass hinges, but there was no glass. "I don't know," he said simply,

"whether you consider my price excessive, but I will gladly make you the best stone I can if you will get me a piece of glass for my window."

That was all he wanted, a piece of glass, a very small piece, but a treasure beyond price of labor in these poor districts.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

"THE GOSPEL OF GOOD WILL"—A BOOK REVIEW.

President Hyde of Bowdoin College published during the Great War a book entitled "The Gospel of Good Will." It was originally intended as a course of lectures to theological students. Apart from this special turn of the thought and apart from his attitude toward the war which he regarded as unavoidable and excusable, the book is illuminating and concretely helpful to a very unusual degree. Its whole theme is the brotherhood of man. "The State, the economic order, the family and the international world" are spheres for the practice of Good Will.

The outline of the book is briefly as follows:—

The Gospel of Christ is the good news that God expects a man to earn and spend his money, control his appetites and passions, choose war or peace, and do whatever his hands find to do, with an eye single to the good of all concerned.

"Sin is falling short of this high, heroic aim" and men should be ashamed of it for the low mean thing it is.

"The instant a man who has done wrong repents, God and all Christlike men welcome him back to their favor and fellowship."

"To the Christian every secular vocation is an opportunity to express Good Will: and sacrifice is the price he gladly pays for the privilege."

A passage quoted from the chapter on "Falling Short of Good Will" may give a sample of the clear incisive style of the book throughout.

"Murder is a widely prevalent form of sin to-day. The murderers we meet in every walk of life to-day, members of every club or church we join, present in evening dress at almost every dinner or party, like the thieves previously considered, are simply the men who want big dividends with which to maintain their families in luxury, and who do not inquire too curiously how many human lives they needlessly shorten to increase those dividends, or how many human heads they cut off with their coupons."

This is a rare book, a book to be owned, read and re-read till we train ourselves to ask every day and hour, "in every relationship of life, not what is profitable, not what is pleasurable, not what is respectable, not what is lawful; but what does the Will that wills the best for all: what does Good Will in the precise situation require?"

Only as this spirit shall come to govern our national and international life shall the threat of war be finally done away.

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE.

VI.

The naval ratio of 5:5:3 has now been definitely accepted by the governments of Great Britain, the United States and Japan. Some readjustment of the American programme was necessary to comply with Japan's desire to retain its latest battleship, and to even things up with Great Britain and the United States; but the programme has been adopted almost intact. This involves, in the first place, a noteworthy reduction in the number of capital ships in the three navies. Sixty-eight dreadnaughts and super-dreadnaughts, with a displacement of nearly 1,900,000 tons, are to be "scrapped." With this great reduction there goes an equally noteworthy limitation, including a ten years' naval holiday and a maximum of 35,000 tons displacement for any ship built after the ten years have elapsed. Had not this two-fold limitation been agreed upon, there would doubtless have been a continuation of the feverish competition in the number and size of super-dreadnaughts which the three powers have engaged in during the past three years.

It is small wonder, then, that Secretary Hughes refers to the agreement as "the greatest event since the Armistice;" or that Arthur J. Balfour should have stated in an interview this afternoon that the President of the United States has inaugurated through the Washington Conference a new era in international relations, a new page in the history of the world, a wholly new departure from the old order of things, which deserves all the praise that has been showered upon it, and which will shine with increasing lustre as its significance is made more clear by every passing year. "This naval agreement," Ambassador Balfour continued, in an address filled with enthusiasm said to be quite unusual with its author, "will be of incalculable benefit to all nations, and especially to those with the largest navies; quite apart from the moral and idealistic points of view, even the richest of nations will find it a boon of vast economic importance."

The Anglo-American-Japanese ratio of 5:5:3 will be maintained, even though the number of capital ships possessed by each of the three nations may be increased by the success of the French Government's demand that it be permitted to build ten super-dreadnaughts between 1925 and 1935. This French demand for naval expansion has startled the Conference to-day, but it seems quite improbable that it will succeed. Great Britain and the United States are both unalterably opposed to it, since to maintain the ratio of 5:5:3, each of them would be obliged to build ten capital ships within five years! The Italian spokesman, also, said to-day that Italy, while it desires naval equality with France, is wholly opposed to the French demand for naval expansion. Not only because of the enormous cost of such a programme, he said, but because Italy has come to the Washington Conference with a firm "will to peace," and a firm determination to follow America's magnificent invitation and example in reducing, rather than increasing, naval armaments. "The United States," he continued, "could become the strongest naval power in the world, should she so desire; but the United States is idealistic; so is Italy. The spirit of moral disarmament, which Premier Briand referred to in his speech the other day, Italy has already begun to put into practice and she is determined to carry it out still farther." There is quiet confidence that Great Britain and the United States will succeed, with Italy's aid, in persuading France to give up her present plan for great naval expansion, and accept a ratio for the five nations,—which is based upon their existing tonnage,—of 5:5:3:2:2. And then if the same three powers will introduce and succeed in carrying through a proposition to reduce and limit land armaments and abolish compulsory military training and conscription, then indeed we should feel that two mighty blows had been struck at both Mars and Neptune, the gods of war on both land and sea!

The Four-Power Treaty, in regard to the islands of the Pacific, having been negotiated and signed last week, is being discussed with great animation and interpreted in various ways. One group of its critics declare that its Article II provides for the same military sanction that was so vigorously opposed by the United States in Article X of the Covenant of the League of Nations; while another group of its critics declare that it is "spineless," and therefore "a mere scrap of paper." Secretary Hughes said this afternoon that, as far as he is concerned, the treaty is an accomplished fact and that he is too busy trying to get other things done to give his interpretation of it at present. President Harding, also, declined to discuss it at present, but simply remarked that there is absolutely nothing in either the letter or the spirit of the treaty which requires any of the four nations to engage in military or other coercive activities to enforce it. Minister Hanihara, commenting upon Japan's surrender of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance and acceptance of the Four-Power Treaty, said that "Japan has been materially affected by American prohibition. We have substituted water for whiskey." The comment of the French, who pin their faith to the League of Nations Covenant and desire also straight-out military and naval alliances, is that the weakness of the treaty lies in its lack of guarantee and penalty: "The American Government," this comment continues, "opposes any real defensive alliance, and is unwilling that this agreement should entail any obligation to use force."

The affairs of China have been under slow but hopeful consideration, during the past week, and besides the naval ratio and the Four-Power Treaty, the question of submarines has been a topic of great interest. The British Government has served notice that it would propose to the Conference, at an early opportunity, the abolition of submarines for both defensive and offensive warfare. Ambassador Balfour declined this afternoon to state fully the British reasons for this proposition, which will later be laid in toto before the Conference, but he did remark that there is no real distinction between offensive and defensive submarines, since what is true of any weapon is emphatically true of submarines—namely, that they can be used for both offense and defense.

There is a well-grounded belief that American naval experts and the American Advisory Committee are advocating the continuation of submarines for war; and it is greatly to be hoped that the American public will come to the support of the British,—which is at the same time the logical, and the civilized—proposal, to abolish the peculiarly pernicious instrument of warfare. Great Britain has stood gallantly by in support of our propositions to reduce and limit capital ships, to place the British and American naval strength on a basis of equality, and to abrogate the Anglo-Japanese Alliance. These three great steps have been made possible only because of the hearty co-operation of Great Britain with America. Now America has a chance to reciprocate by supporting a measure which will redound to our own benefit as well as to that of the British and of all the world. Great Britain could, of course, continue to develop and construct anti-submarine devices; and thus would be carried on, in a new field of naval preparedness, the old, old competition which is illustrated by the race between the projectile and armor-plate. This kind of competition gave rise to ever more "invincible" guns and "impregnable" battleships; and it was to stop precisely this cut-throat competition that the Washington Conference was summoned. The mutual good-will of the British and American people will be of far more value, either in war or in peace, than any number or size of submarines, offensive or defensive. Moreover, it was horror and resentment at precisely this kind of warfare that did much to lead the United States into "the war to end war and preparations for more war." In justice to its ideals, then, and as an example and incentive to other and weaker nations, the American people should march shoulder to shoulder with their British cousins in achieving this great restriction on preparation for war, which would at the same time diminish the danger of war itself.

While the British proposition for the abolition of submarine warfare is under discussion, it may be wholesome to recall the attempt of the Russians to secure the adoption of a similar proposition at the first Hague Conference in 1899. Great Britain, Germany, Japan, Italy and six other governments voted for the Russian proposition; France, Austria and four others voted for the use of submarines for defense; while the American delegation, under the insistence of Admiral Mahan, refused to accept any restriction whatever upon the use of submarines, whether for offensive or defensive war! Eight other governments voted with the United States and the proposition was accordingly lost. It is not logical, of course, to assert that had it not been for American opposition at The Hague to the prohibition of the use of both submarines and poisonous gas, the Germans in the recent war would not have resorted to them; but it certainly does behoove us Americans of to-day to reverse that reactionary record of 1899 and to do our full share now towards prohibiting the use of weapons which are as nefarious as they are potent in creating hostile feelings, hostile preparations and hostile acts.

The United States and all the world have moved far from the spirit of the warlike past, and at this "Peace Christmas" here in Washington, we are glad to recall Whittier's poem on "The Peace Convention in Brussels," written seventy-three years ago. [For lack of space the poem is not reprinted.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., Twelfth Month 17, 1921.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

THE Yearly Meeting's Extension Committee proposes calling a Conference of the Ministers, Elders and Overseers of the Yearly Meeting, the date proposed being Seventh-day afternoon, First Month 14, 1922. A further notice will be published, but Friends concerned are requested to hold this date open.

[UNDER date of Eleventh Month 25th, our friend George M. Warner sent a letter of encouragement to Secretary Hughes. The reply as follows has a message to us all.—Eds.]

DECEMBER 13, 1921.

Sir:—

I am directed by the Secretary of State, Chairman of the Conference, to acknowledge the receipt of your telegram of November 25th in behalf of the Society of Friends, and to request you to express to the members of the Society his sincere appreciation of the interest and support which they have been so good as to evince.

I am, Sir,

Yours very truly,

J. BUTLER WRIGHT, Secretary.

FRIENDS' BOOK STORE has recently received from the estate of Joshua L. Bailly, some hundreds of books (see advertisement), which should be in the hands of our Friends.

Among them, is that excellent book of prose and verse, "The Wheat-sheaf," which was supposed to be out of print. "The Fells of Swarthmore Hall," by Webb, is another book full of interesting matter (468 pages). "The Life of William Allen," by Sherman, 530 pages, tells of one of England's very prominent Friends. "Annals of the Early Friends" (Budge, 456 pages), is very informing. In addition there are "Penn's Maxims," "Cry of Christianity," "Mary Carrow's School," besides books on Peace, Mohonk Conferences, etc., etc.

W. B. H.

Our friend Joseph Thomasson spent about ten days in Ohio in prosecution of the concern for which his Monthly Meeting liberated him in the Tenth Month. He was at Stillwater Quarterly Meeting, at Somerset Monthly Meeting, at Richland Particular Meeting, the new Friends' school at Highland, and made about forty family visits. On his way home he attended the meetings at Harrisville, Ohio, and Pittsburgh, Pa.

HADDONFIELD AND SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING occurred on the 15th at Moorestown, N. J. The crisp, clear weather brought a good attendance. E. Maria Bishop, of Street, Somerset, and Hannah P. Morris were present, and the former had most acceptable service in the first meeting. These Friends had attended the Meeting for Ministers and Elders, held the day before, which was felt by a number to have been an occasion more than ordinarily impressive. The Quarterly Meeting considered the so-called "social-order" queries, and wrote a brief letter to two Monthly Meetings in Japan, commending to their Christian care and fellowship Herbert V. and Madeleine W. Nicholson, who (with their infant daughter Virginia) are shortly to sail back to Japan to resume their work in that country. Several Friends expressed feelingly their sense of personal loss, in thinking of the imminent departure of the Nicholsons after the year they have spent in this country. A welcome letter from William C. Allen was read. The Quarterly Meeting likewise sent a note to Secretary Hughes, expressing unity with the efforts he has been making towards disarmament.

CARE IN INSURANCE

The Provident was founded in 1865 by a group of Friends for the purpose of protecting the estates and insuring the lives of members of the Society of Friends.

Later the services of this Company were offered to other people who were known to be of careful habits. A careful company insures only those people who are good moral as well as health risks. This results in a low death-rate, which is one of the elements of low cost of insurance.

Care is important—in insurance as well as in other things

ELECTION.

The first impression of an aviator as the machine rose above the gaping crowd was one of such stupendous wonder that no definite picture of what had been seen was produced upon him; with subsequent adventures, however, this feeling gave place to that of intense satisfaction as he saw the "lap of the land" stretched out in every direction below him.

He was a man given to serious thought, and there broke in upon him for the first time the sense of the utter feebleness of his creative power as contrasted with that Power which had made and which still directed the world he looked down upon. He was part, for the moment, of the newest, and, it may be, the most curious device of man's creative genius, but the droning of the engines and the upward sweep of the mighty wings, reversing in an instant in a downward plunge, that almost took his breath and stopped his heart beats, were as nothing to the thoughts that crowded upon him as he saw God's handiwork as he had never before been privileged to see it.

To say that the motion of an aeroplane is conducive to serious thought, while the motion lasts, is to stretch the truth, but to hint that it may give a turn to one's thought track that it has never taken before is easily conceived.

There come opportunities, when the small things of life are submerged, when we gain glimpses of the beginning and the end, and can measure as we are not wont to do, the real significance of the present as it links us with what has been and with that which is to follow. As these opportunities are not always, if indeed ever, of our own volition, so do they become the most precious hours of our experience. A light that does not come at our own bidding shines upon us; petty matters of everyday occurrence slip into the background, and the picture of our life in an extended perspective takes their place.

A popular writer of a half century ago was emphatic in his declaration that heredity and environment controlled man's destiny. We recognize the truth of this and accept it as far as it goes, but must add to it or rather prefix the more important truth, which he indeed also implied in his teaching, that the directing Hand of God was above all else.

As all that the aviator looked down upon, the hills, the valleys, the running streams, everything in nature that the hand of man had not marred, spoke of age and strength, so by contrast he was made to feel his own littleness and weakness.

These outward manifestations of God's power are of no greater significance than those that are out of sight and are not material. There are controlling facts that were fixed when the morning stars sang together. We cannot change them if we could, and much less should we if we could.

What are some of these? A man born in a given country becomes, through no choice of his own, a citizen of that country. Unreasonable as it may seem to him, he cannot become an alien so long as he is held to the soil of his birthplace. This is nothing, however, to those laws of election which God has fixed. Had we power of selection as to what family we would grace for the three score and ten years of our earthly pilgrimage? What had we to do with the creation of that feeling within us that placed the family tie above every other human relationship? Can any whim or wish of ours change our race, our speech or our individuality? Surely these were all predestined for us. They cling to us as closely as do the spots to the leopard. They are the most important elements of our lives; they may be what we talk the least about, because we do not know the language in which to express them, but after we have studied what we choose to call heredity and environment, we shall find, if we go below the surface, that the most interesting as also the most important part of our study is still untouched.

There is profound significance in the truth that not a sparrow falls to the ground without His notice, so also not a detail of our lives is beyond His knowledge.

That my path and thy path are not the same, may be in part due to our respective wills and strivings, but much, and indeed very much, was in God's planning before ever we knew ourselves. There is that in us that partakes of the very essence of eternity; we touch it all the while, and though we fail to give it credit, it envelops us and influences us more profoundly than all else. The world we live in and are a part of is very human, and, alas! too many of us recognize only that part of it, but should the scales fall from our eyes or the veil that envelops us be rent we shall see in its more than earthly beauty the touches of the Divine finger in very much that concerns our lives.

We shall see outward forms of our own creation, that we had thought to be everlasting, melt away and become as naught, faith may waver and almost desert us, and even we may well nigh give up hope, yet if that lesson that the aviator grasped as he was carried high above the dead levels has been grasped by us, we have an Anchor that must hold. The river courses, the hills, the valleys, the plains that stretch to the farthest horizon and all the outstanding natural features of the landscape continue as they always have been, a mute reminder to one whose soul can grasp the lesson, that in our individual lives God has set His permanent landmarks. We may not know or even guess why these temptations or those trials have come into our lives, why this cup of blessing or that cup of bitterness has been given us to drain, why this burden has been turned into a cross for us to carry all life's pilgrimage through or why sorrow beyond human heart to carry has been meted out. We find nothing in any school of philosophy to explain it to us, till we learn in the school of faith that it was God's election that our lives should be chastened and sweetened by His Will.

Not until we can give an honest assent to the prayer, "Thy Will be done," can we make a real approach to the lesson the aviator thought he had learned, can we accept with full assurance the truth that God's hand is laid upon us in tenderness and in love, that He permits affliction only that we may know true joy, and that life's tempests are to fit us for a fuller measure of peace and happiness here and the fullest measure hereafter.

D. H. F.

JANE S. WARNER.

From the love we bore her, we would gather together a few fragments of a life that speaks to us of a goodly past. For as we imagine the character of our friend, with its outstanding features, we find ourselves saying:

A "Quaker of the olden time,
How calm and firm and true!"

And we ask ourselves whether the calmness of the olden time has been too much displaced by the alertness and activity of the present. The firmness in the right, has it yielded unduly to the broad-minded charity for all? The open face of truth, do we still welcome it—even if it spoil some of our pleasant pictures? We love these old-time features. They must be preserved; the Christian structure topples without them. But we have faith to believe that they can be kept while yet the virtues stressed by an imperious present are added—the fusion accomplished by that Power who can make His children "complete in Him."

The girlhood of Jane Warner takes us back to the second quarter of last century. The daughter of John and Ruth Sharpless, she grew up in the vicinity of Chester, Pa., near the home against the rock of the Sharpless pioneer of 1682. Her parents gave her a wholesome upbringing on a farm, handicapped by neither poverty nor wealth, and where each of the eight brothers and sisters had his portion of work to do; where cattle were fattened, and butter was made by the good old-time process, before the introduction of creameries. We can see the lithe-footed and rosy-faced Jane and her sisters carrying the surplus butter to the neighboring stores, several miles from the farm. She kept this mode of travel to advanced age. How well we can recall her brisk step and erect carriage as she threaded our West Chester streets, disdaining street-cars and hacks.

At the age of thirty she married our Friend Charles L. Warner, and her helpfulness and vivacity brightened his life for forty-two years. During his days of active business they lived in Philadelphia, but came to West Chester about 1870.

Old age brought no wearisome leisure to her, for she had plenty of interest indoors and out. The luxuriant growth of the ferns, callas, and geraniums in her little conservatory was to her worth all the vigilance and labor of cultivation; and the roses, pansies, fruits and vegetables from her garden were frequent reminders to her friends of her love and interest.

A good neighbor was she. In she came through the back gate and the back door, with a basket of fresh peas, or ripe pears, or bright flowers. And then she sat down and chatted in the good, old-fashioned way, lively and kindly, of home matters, or meeting affairs, or past events, and left us cheerier for her informal call.

Other gifts from her, many and sometimes great, were not wanting, though not advertised. In fact, you felt the while you listened and received that these outward evidences "only half-revealed and half-concealed" the life within. She was not one to speak freely of her religious experiences, but her companions would realize that a Christian's heart beat warmly underneath, and a Christian's hope was hers. She was serviceable in our meetings, with her clear judgment, as Clerk and Elder.

Used to doing for others rather than being served by them, her cheerfulness throughout her illness was a lesson to all; and she was thoughtful of the comfort of others until the shadows of death clouded her powers. Then still "calm and firm and true," enduring to the end, she passed in happiness away. It was not a life of great things, but of little faithfulnesses which come within the reach of us common people. "To be faithful in little things is something great." Our Father is calling for it and the world needs it.

WHAT MESSAGE SHALL WOMEN SEND TO WASHINGTON?

LADY BARLOW.

(Liberal Candidate for Parliament, High Peak Division.)

My experience is that women are keen on the question of disarmament. Their views merely want focussing in order to get a powerful volume of expression in support of this movement. This is my sincere opinion from what I have noted at meetings up and down the constituency since I was adopted as Prospective Liberal Candidate for the High Peak Division of Derbyshire.

As a Quaker I constantly express my strong belief that there is one way, and only one, by which war will cease. It is when men refuse to fight. This is quite a new idea to many, but they immediately recognize the logic of it. And they are encouraged when I speak of the hold this thought is taking throughout the world—more especially of the young people.

I believe the churches in their own interests would do well to emphasize this thought, otherwise the Great Reform—abolition of war—will come as the Anti-slavery Reform came—through the laity and not through the spiritual guides of the country.

I want women to-day to band together with the determination to put down war. Let them ask their candidates for Parliament: "Will you refuse to vote for war?" So only can they be safe. Because the Government of the day invariably justifies every war as it comes up as being "inevitable."

The procedure as I have watched it is thus:

- (1) A Secret Treaty.
- (2) Silent and sinister development by powerful armaments and combines of huge munitions. Their secret agents pulling wires behind the scenes.
- (3) A political impasse.
- (4) Passion poured out by the Press.
- (5) Declaration of War.
- (6) "Your King and Country Need You."

This is the routine.

I call on women to refuse submission any longer to this War Tyranny. Washington is the chance to break this vicious circle. Ask your minister and your M. P. what they are doing,

EDUCATION.

"THEMELESS COMPOSITION."

AT FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL, TWELFTH MONTH 10, 1921.

In the morning session of the Friends' Educational Association, Professor Sharp talked on "Themeless Composition," drawing his material from his own experiences with Freshman and Sophomore English Composition classes in Boston University. The substance of his speech follows:

"In the first place, I give a talk the purpose of which is to make composition seem altogether worth while. It is the second largest profession in Boston. The whole world is written up new every evening and published fresh every morning. There is no more interesting and vital profession than letters. There is nothing more essential than the power of self-expression. By it one's work is furthered and his experience multiplied. For instance, I went to visit John Burroughs. Then I came home and thought it over. After that I wrote it up and sent it to Good Housekeeping with its 400,000 paid subscribers, so that visit was multiplied 400,000 times. It is worth while to get the habit of multiplying yourself 400,000 times. The practical side presented to the students makes them something more than dumb driven cattle. The object is not to make them writers, but to create such a habit of writing that they will be their method of self-expression.

"It is fatal to assign topics to write upon. They must write out of their own experience. Find out what the student knows most about. Draw on that source. Call on his hobbies for composition material. Have him write out of the things he is working at. Then go on through the books he reads and the dreams he dreams. I make him prepare a list of all the things he is going to write upon during the semester, probably about six. All the seed must be in the ground at once. Some, like salix, take long to germinate; others spring up at once, like lettuce. I start him thinking on all six subjects at once, an experience that sometimes proves almost fatal. He survives, however, even though he finds he can write all he knows on a card the size of a postal. Now we are done with themes.

Then I have a conference with the student.

"Where do you live?" I say.

"Hull."

"All right. What's your newspaper?"

"The Hull East Wind."

"Write your next essay for it."

"What child's paper did you grow up with?"

"Little Folks."

"Write an essay for it."

"Do you take any religious paper?"

"Zion's Herald."

"Write an article for that."

"Do you subscribe for a farm journal?"

"Yes, The Country Gentleman."

"Write one paper for that."

"Do you read a funny paper?"

"Yes, I read Film Fun."

"Write something for it. If you read The Police Gazette, write a story for it."

Here is a series covering news, religious emotion, funny view,—almost every phase of his nature and aspect of his experience. The student makes two copies of each article he writes; one he sends to the editor and one he submits to me with a note in the corner saying, "I intend to send this paper to Dew Drops, or The Atlantic Monthly," or whatever magazine he desires.

The student thinks of me as a mark. Any fool thing will do for me. If he only gets by, that's enough. But when he knows he has to submit it to an editor, he doesn't think any old thing will do. I say to him, "If you have literary wisdom enough to get this paper into the magazine to which you submit it, you get a good mark." To get such literary wisdom he must have bought at least six copies of the magazine to which he submits his article and he must have studied the length and character of the stories that magazine publishes.

The freshman class starts hating English Composition, but by the middle of the sophomore year eighty-four per cent. of them have appeared in print, and when a boy sees his ideas in print, there is no more hating English Composition. It is such a vital experience that it changes his whole outlook. They make an awful appearance in print, but they have learned to choose things editors want to hear. It makes them a part of their surroundings and gives them a hand in human affairs.

I require the student to write a paragraph a day. No less is allowed. I present the paragraph as the unit of composition. We think in paragraphs. It is a practical way of working. You can't find time to write a whole essay, but you can write a paragraph. Let him note that an Atlantic essay is approximately twenty-five paragraphs long. At the rate of one paragraph a day, one would produce twelve essays a year, a volume. This seems to him a most reasonable and freshman-like undertaking.

I write by paragraphs. I have seven hundred students a week. There is no time for literary work free in a block long enough for a whole essay. I start for Hingham with a bag of bananas and a butter-box. On the train I write all over the butter-box. I give the butter to the family, but I have butter to eat that they know not of, for I keep the wrapper. My articles progress like the march in the Anabasis—so many parasangs, then a halt.

The students' paragraphs may be written in a diary, go later into a composition, form part of a letter home or be the substance of a speech for his fraternity. Everything is directed to some practical purpose. He must have several papers going at once, so when he sees a thing or has time to think, one of these compositions will reach out for that experience. He will see things he never saw before. That will make life more abundant for him.

Once life becomes so full of interest that it requires expression, expression will come. See that the lives of the students are so full of interest that they will be continually talking about themselves. The only new original thing in the world is yourself. The old world has been written up again and again. Composition training is the humanest thing in college. It puts tongues in their heads, real hearts beneath their ribs, enriching life so it overflows."

Comments and questions followed from Mary B. Jones, of Friends' Select School, Frances Ferris, of Haverford, Irvin Poley, of Germantown, D. Lawrence Burgess, of Germantown, Richard Gummere, of Penn Charter, and Stanley Yarnall, of Germantown.

Professor Moffatt, head of the English Department of the Central High School, gave some account of his experiences in the teaching of English grammar, emphasizing the need of a definite program, a text-book that fits your school, and common sense and zeal in the teachers.

This talk also called forth some comment after which the meeting adjourned.—Reported by ELIZABETH PAIGE.

HAVERFORD FRESHMEN MAKE RECORD SHOWING IN PSYCHOLOGICAL TEST.

The Freshmen of Haverford College led seventy-seven institutions of the country in a psychological test given to colleges and universities since the opening of the college year.

The examination consists of one hundred and sixty-eight questions requiring alertness of mind and a general knowledge, and must be answered within half an hour. The highest possible mark would be one hundred and sixty-eight. This would be obtained if all the questions were answered correctly. No one, however, has succeeded in attaining this pinnacle of perfection. The average of the Haverford College Freshmen was 113.6, the Cornell Engineering Freshmen coming a close second, with 111. Only five colleges in the country thus far have averages above 100, the general average of the seventy-seven institutions being 87. It is interesting to note that this general average is about the same as that received by a group of about twelve Haverford Freshmen receiving the lowest marks in the institution.

It is intended that during the next few years these psychological tests will be given to the Freshmen at Haverford and other places, in addition to the regular entrance examinations. In order to judge of the value of such an examination, the Haverford upper-classmen were also given the examination. The averages were as follows: Seniors, 117.3; Juniors, 112.9; Sophomores, 104.8. The highest mark in the college was made by a Sophomore, with 163. Exactly fifty per cent. of the men coming in the highest quarter of college grades in each class were in the highest quarter in the test grades. The same split was shown among those in the lowest quarter.

Haverford College has an enrollment of two hundred and twenty students.

BOOK REVIEWS.

GEORGE LLOYD HODGKIN.

"For there is three-fold oneness with the One;
And he is one, who keeps
The homely laws of life, who, if he sleeps,
Or wakes, in his true flesh God's will is done.

But ten-fold one is he, who feels all pains
Not partial, knowing them
As ripples parted from the gold-beaked stem,
Wherewith God's galley onward ever strains.

To him the sorrows are the tension-thrills
Of that serene endeavor,
Which yields to God for ever and for ever
The joy that is more ancient than the hills."

Thus sings Thomas Edward Brown, in lines no doubt familiar to the late George Lloyd Hodgkin, the beautiful story of whose life, with extracts from diaries and papers, has just been written by his sister, L. Violet Hodgkin. George was an "absolute pacifist, who gave up his life joyfully in a foreign land—an ambassador to famished and war-harried peoples from the England which he loved."

Engineer and banker, he depended as few of his generation have done, upon the leading and inspiration of that perfect Guide who had attended his father and himself all their days. Retiring by nature when among strangers, his interest in other people and desire to benefit by their experience and life, earned him a large circle of close friends.

He delighted in travel and showed immense enthusiasm in pursuing any particular object, as the account of his and his sister's search after Canopus on a journey to Algiers testifies. He shared with his friends the books which became part of himself; bore the jolts of life with good humor, finding in them something worth having at the price; and, it is unnecessary to say, a high sense of civic duty, in the performance of which he showed absolute fearlessness when his conception of that duty differed from the one held by his compatriots. (This was especially the case during the war.)

His letters and the extracts from his diaries reveal a man with marked social gifts, devoted to his family, enjoying to the full the beauty and wonder of the world around him, but more and more responsive to those wireless messages which come from the Unseen to waiting spirits.

The selection of papers has been made with much discrimination. Two or three of these give the attitude of the Society of Friends to war and it is useful to observe the consistency of the writer by comparing a paper written in 1900 with a striking essay on "Good Friday at Bamborough," penned in 1915, and the account of a pilgrimage which the writer made a year later in company with an English clergyman. The longest of these papers contains a delightful account of the late Keith Lucas with whom George Hodgkin went to New Zealand on a scientific expedition. Another essay is a really beautiful parable for children of all ages, and still other papers reflect the delight and interests of purposeful tours in Australasia and a Summer School in Ireland. Mention is made of visits to American colleges in 1912.

To all those who knew this young and gifted man as a friend and leader this book will be a precious gift, and it cannot fail to stimulate to higher thought and action others who may be introduced to it. "Friendship maketh indeed a fair day in the affections from storm and tempests, but it maketh daylight in the understanding out of darkness and confusion of thoughts."

JORDANS—REVIEW OF ERNEST WARNER'S "A QUAKER SHRINE."*

This little book will be a treasure to all who know Jordans, and to all who will pilgrimage there in the future. In a simple and sufficient manner it brings into its pages the breath of that sweet English countryside, the peculiar glamor of the past, and the uses and hopes of the present.

The many Friends and others, on both sides of the water, who have visited the grave of William Penn, and the cottage at Chalfont St. Giles, where Milton took refuge from the plague, who have joined in the transparent simplicity of Friends' worship in the old meeting-house, so little, so plain and so beautiful, with the door and latticed windows open to the scents of flowers and songs of birds, have set Jordans in a place apart in their memories. Ernest Warner will help to keep that picture clear and bright, without detracting in guide-book manner from its peculiar mystery. To those who have yet to go to Jordans, he offers a friendly hand pointing out the spots of historic interest and touching with light reminder on the stories of some of the past great ones who have left at Jordans something of themselves.

And to the non-Friend, inquiring as to the meaning of Friends' ways and doings in order to enter into the atmosphere of the place, he offers brief, illuminating statements of Friends' principles and doctrine.

One modest criticism is respectfully offered of such a charming little book. How much nearer perfection would it not have come if the author had avoided the tempting use of phrases that are not sentences.

But this is a book that all lovers of Jordans, and all who plan to go there, will want to possess.

J. P. WHITNEY.

PRESENT CONDITIONS IN CHINA.

[NOTE.—This article is reprinted from The Friend (London) of Eleventh Month 11th. The author, Isaac Mason, is known in the Philadelphia circle. Some of our readers will remember that he and Joseph Elkinton were one time fellow-travelers. Isaac Mason is now in London, but his long-time residence in China is no slight guarantee of his understanding of the difficulties in which the "Celestial Kingdom" is involved in its effort to become a republic.—EDS.]

Since the Revolution, which took place nearly ten years ago, China seems to have steadily drifted from bad to worse. As H. Wilson Harris has truly said, China is like a "rudderless vessel wallowing in the trough of a shoreless sea." The trend downward into chaos has been most distressing. There is so much jealousy, wire-pulling and intrigue, that the country, politically speaking, seems to be in a hopeless condition. The military governors of the different provinces are practically little kings in themselves, and are almost entirely independent of the Pekin Government. At the present moment several civil wars are going on in China. Two of the southern provinces are fighting each other; the Honan Province is in a state of civil war; while away in Schwan for four or five years different factions have been fighting each other, and again and again surrounding cities where Friends work, and giving anxiety to them. These things have, as I say, been going on since the Revolution, which, incidentally, is a proof that political change alone is no salvation for China, but that we must look in other directions for its uplift. At present the military parties have the ascendancy. I saw the striking statement in a recent Shanghai paper that probably there are more men under arms in China to-day than in any other country in the world. At first sight I could hardly realize that; but yet in every province there are commanders who have sometimes ten or twenty thousand men under them, roaming the country and terrorizing the people. Twice within six months the port of Ichang, which our Friends from Szechwan pass, has been rioted by soldiers supposed to be under the Pekin Government, which cannot control them. Very few taxes are being paid to the Central Government, as a result of which it is borrowing money, chiefly from Japan, but also from other sources and is becoming more and more involved in obligations. The financial position of China to-day is, therefore, very acute.

Then the license which is seen in the country because of the different military governors has given opportunity for all kinds of retrograde movements. For instance, opium is now being grown freely in many provinces. Not only so, but I know of cases in which the military officials have actually compelled farmers to pull up their crops and plant opium, because they were able to tax opium at a higher rate. As they could not get money from Pekin for their soldiers, they tried to get it by such illegal and evil ways as by the production of opium again. There is thus every need for a strong anti-opium campaign, both in England and also in China.

As I have already said, we must look in other directions than politically for the uplift of China, which can only come about, as I see it, through the Gospel of Jesus Christ influencing the hearts of men, and raising up strong, honest, God-fearing people. We have a few such already. Some of the leaders of China to-day have been through Christian schools. If one may venture to prophesy, I believe that C. T. Wong, one of our strong Christian men who was, for a long time, at the head of the Y. M. C. A. in China, will be the future President. He and others will get their opportunity sooner or later; but we want more of them, and we are glad that they are being prepared in various ways. Friends have heard of what is being done in this connection in the Christian universities; but a large field like China affords opportunities for all kinds of service.

I have described the dark side of life in China politically; but I would conclude with one or two brighter pictures which represent real facts. The number of Christians is not increasing at all as we should like to see it: the yearly statistics are, in some ways, disappointing; but we see the evidences of Christianity every day. The leaven is at work transforming a large number of lives. Therefore we feel that Christianity is influencing the people, even though, at present, the Christian community, judging by numbers, is but small.

The educational system, of late years, has progressed wonderfully, having had Christian men at the head of it. It is quite different from what it was twenty years ago. To-day it is producing really well-educated men, of whom we have great hopes.

Then, while some of the books and magazines which are being published by the Chinese are of a harmful character, these are in the minority. One of the most interesting sights in Shanghai is the great printing house called the Commercial Press, probably the biggest publishing house in the Far East. It is entirely a Chinese concern, and the heads of the firm are Christian men. It is doing good social work amongst its employees; and, whilst it is purely a commercial proposition, it is doing valuable service for the whole of the Far East. Everywhere one meets business and professional men who have been abroad, and who are now living good Christian lives. I know some Chinese in Shanghai, such as the heads of cotton facstories, who have a large number of people under them, and who are trying to better the condition of their employees.

I should like to mention the interesting case of a Chinese Christian General in Mid-China—General Fung. He has 9,000 soldiers under him, and they are, almost to a man, influenced towards Christianity, and many have become definite Christians, because of the strong stand which their General is making. Thus even in the army the Christian element is finding its way. Two very interesting movements have been started within the last year or two. One is a Home Mission, which is supported by the Chinese themselves. They send out Chinese men and women to the far southwest of China, and are thus beginning definite home mission work, much in the same way as we send out missionaries to-day. Then the China for Christ Movement, as it is called, has come to the fore during the last year or two. Some of the finest Christians have got together, and have taken as their slogan the phrase "China for Christ." These are some of the signs which make us feel that Christianity is progressing, and which should encourage the Board of the F. F. M. A. We do not forget the dark side of China and its great need; but we are encouraged by what we see already, and by what we expect to see in the future of China.

JAPANESE NOTES.

THE HEART OF A JAPANESE WOMAN.

On the tenth inst. I went into Tokio, and shortly after my arrival there one of our staunch, tried military Japanese friends called. He left his sword outside. We had not seen him for three years and more. For three years he has been in Siberia, Korea and in Manchuria. He went away a Lieutenant and came back a Captain. He was pressed by his family into military lines much against his own desire to educate himself to do Christian work. He became a Christian in our Bible classes for young men and was always one of the pillars in the young men's brotherhood. He married a woman who was not yet a Christian; but before he married her he said he would make it his first duty to lead her to Christ. The first night in their home, he told us afterward, they read the Bible and he explained the meaning to his wife, and in a very short time she became an earnest Christian.

When he was sent on this last three years' military mission he said, "As we sailed out from Shimonoseki for Fusan, Korea, I sought my room and poured myself out in prayer that God would keep me from yielding to temptation and make my influence go out for Him. While away, at times temptations seemed to assail me from every side—but I always found there was time for a word of prayer and almost I can say without exception God helped me out of every difficulty." He went on to say, "While in Seoul and attached to the Imperial Manchurian Railway, one of my particular duties was to arrange for the frequent great dinners and entertainments of various kinds. I never once drank myself. To me the most objectionable part of the whole affair was the drunkenness and the ever-present Geisha (dancing girls). Two things kept me true. Prayer and my wife's letters. I learned then, as I had never known before, the heart of a woman, for every week my wife wrote to me and in every letter she entreated me to be true to Christ and to be in every way a strong Christian. I could not go against her."

While he was away he encouraged her to go to school. She has one small son. She started into the Christian College for young women, and though the work has been very heavy, and even now she has her work in the home and the boy to care for in the evening, she gets up at three in the morning that she may have the quiet for her study. "When she finishes her college work she wants to do some active Christian work, and I want her to." He then added, "Now that I am back, and shall for some time be stationed in the Military Headquarters in Tokio, I hope to get a home near the Friends' meeting and work there. We want as a family to attend the meeting."

At last, one beautiful calm day, the dreaded news was told to Joe by one of their workmen in the early morning that the rebellion had broken out several miles to the northward. It was the custom of the family at Randall's Mill to start for Cooladine Meeting at eight o'clock, and they set off as usual on the car, drawn by good grey Denis, their favorite harness horse. They had barely gone two miles when a neighbor, in a state of abject terror, told them that two men were being murdered at the Cross Roads of Ballymurmin.

Jane turned white to the lips. Joe glanced at his mother. "I think we shall feel best satisfied to go on," she said, composedly, and they found the Cross Roads deserted, but did not dare look behind the thick bushes by the roadside.

Several groups of men, armed with pikes, hurried by as they drove forward, and one, who knew Joe, said, civilly enough, "It has come to this with us at last."

But before they reached the Bridge of Ballinkeale they were roughly bidden to stop, by a man on horseback, surrounded by forty armed men.

"Hi, there! You must turn back. We can have no spies taking news to Enniscorthy."

"Is not to Enniscorthy we are going, my friend, but to worship God in the Friends' Meeting House at Cooladine, as all our neighbors know that we constantly do," said Rachel Williams quietly.

"Oh, indeed; but we let none pass this day, and let me advise you, ma'am, to go to your home, and keep out of sight, or I won't be answerable for the consequences."

Finding remonstrance in vain, Joe turned his horse, and they proceeded homeward, meeting on the way another carload of faithful Friends.

"Come and sit with us in the parlor at the Mill," said the mother. "We must not miss our united seeking for best guidance in these sad days, even if we are prevented from meeting with Cooladine Friends."

So when the horses were taken "from under," as they say in Co. Wexford, and Jane had given a drink of milk to the frightened Barry children, ten quiet people seated themselves in the parlor, where the only sound was the rustle of the lilac bushes outside the casement window, and the distant ripple of the mill stream. During the hour, several voices offered fervent prayer for help and guidance, and strength to endure patiently, and when timid Susan Barry collected her flock to return to their farm, she felt a calm uplift which lasted through many troublous days.

After Joe had seen their friends drive off, and was standing in the yard, one of their workmen ran up in great excitement. "The United Irishmen are out, and say I must be armed when the soldiers come upon us. Where is the long fork that we use at harvest, Master Joe?"

"Thou knows very well, Jim, that no fork of mine shall be used against a brother man, and if I gave it thee I should share thy guilt as a murderer."

"We are only out against our oppressors," said he, sulkily; but he lounged off, making no search for the weapon.

After dinner, Joe and his sister went to the high ground behind the house, and were shocked to see flames and smoke rising from many places where had stood the pleasant homes of their Protestant neighbors, and passers-by brought fearful accounts of cruel murders, robbery and destruction. Gunfire in the distance told them that a battle was going on, and in the evening a crowd of men, armed with guns as well as pikes, and some wearing military coats with ominous stains, trooped by, dragging with them a few survivors of the North Cork Militia, a hundred of whom had been cut to pieces on Oukart Hill.

They called for drink, and the Williams family, taking it as the best policy to be civil to all—even these savages, drunk with the success of their butchery—brought out buttermilk and barley bread, and slices of the great joint of bacon which had been cooked for the workmen's meals.

The leader said, threateningly, that they would find it to their interest to have plenty of food and drink ready at demand, which they did not fail to do.

When they had passed, Joe found, to his dismay, that they had taken with them the four fine horses that he used in his business, leaving only some unbroken colts. News came that the rebels had taken the town of Wexford, and were camped on Vinegar Hill, above Enniscorthy. There they dragged scores of innocent Protestants to be butchered by executioners kept mad with drink.

Several Friends were taken up the hill, and threatened with instant death if they did not profess the Roman Catholic religion, the priests being prepared to baptise them on the spot, but with steadfast faith they refused, and not one Quaker life was lost during the ghastly three weeks that chaos reigned in County Wexford.

Joe Williams was taken by armed men in one of his own fields, and marched off towards Vinegar Hill; but a neighbor spoke to him, and was asked by the rebels if he knew anything against the young man.

"Never a bit!" he said; "I know him well. He's a Quaker, and won't fight, and I'll take my oath he is neither an Orangeman nor a Protestant."

"I've heard the Quakers are a good, quiet set of people, and hurt none," said the man. "There are none in my part of the country, but I should be sorry to injure such," and he shook hands with Joe when he released him. His appearance at the mill was a cause for unspeakable thankfulness to his parents and sister, for a wild little gossoon had just rushed in with the news that he was a prisoner and on his way to the camp.

The same evening, when he was quietly attending to his farm, two more men arrested him, pointing a loaded gun at his breast, but his steadfast fearlessness overcame their evil intent, and they slunk off, doing him no harm.

SILENT WORSHIP.

"When mystical activity is at its height, we find consciousness possessed by the sense of a being at once excessive and identical with the self; great enough to be God, inferior enough to be me." That which William James here calls "mystical activity," is what Friends understand by Silent Worship. It is the effort of the human spirit to put itself in touch with the Divine Spirit by means of the silent waiting of an uplifted mind and heart. It is the endeavor of the human soul to merge its consciousness with the Divine Consciousness.

While present in one of our Meetings for Divine Worship we find that our highest and best thoughts are "co-terminous and continuous with a more of the same quality." We know no limit to the immensity of Love and Power with which we put ourselves in contact. We are enlarged beyond ourselves by this influx of the Divine Spirit.

"Whatever this 'more' may be on its farther side, with which in religious experience we feel ourselves connected, on its hither side it is a subconscious continuation of our conscious life. Beyond each man and, in a fashion, continuous with him there exists a larger Power which is friendly to him and to his ideals." And it is the privilege and aim of the individual to identify himself, as far as may be, with this felt presence of the Divine.

Draw, if thou canst, the mystic line
Severing rightly IIs from thine,
Which is human, which Divine.

This silent waiting upon God is the very life of a Meeting; while it is for the individual the sine qua non of spiritual growth and power. "Place yourself in the middle of the stream of power and wisdom which animates all whom it floats, and you are without effort impelled to truth, to right, and a perfect contentment."

In Silent Worship there are indeed infinite enlargements on every side, directing us to higher and yet higher leadings—the infinitude of the private man. CHARLES B. HESTON, JR.

THE UNITED STATES GIVES TWENTY MILLION DOLLARS TO BUY FLOUR, CORN AND MILK FOR RUSSIA'S STARVING MILLIONS.

Congress, on Twelfth Month 20th, passed a bill which appropriates Twenty Million Dollars from the United States Treasury to purchase flour, corn and milk for the relief of the famine sufferers in Russia. They passed the bill because of the reports which the investigators, sent purposely to Russia to ascertain the truth of the extent of the famine, brought back to Congress. Through their Congress, the people of the United States have decided that the Russian famine is too great for individual charity successfully to meet and combat, and have decided that only a government appropriation will give the backbone upon which the entire relief of the famine can be built.

At first sight, it will seem as though a government appropriation of Twenty Million Dollars will adequately cover every need of the Russian people for food in a very generous and ample way. The sum does seem staggering when thought of in the amount of food it will buy. It is only when we realize that even with the Hoover Relief feeding 1,200,000 children and the Friends feeding 100,000 children, it becomes apparent that there are still over 13,000,000 people in Russia who are in danger of death. When Twenty Million Dollars are divided among 13,000,000 people it gives a relief of only a dollar and a half to each person. This will not keep these 13,000,000 people alive for more than one month. It is of no value to keep a person alive for one month and then let him die. It is far better to feed 1,000,000 people for ten months through a famine than 10,000,000 people for one month. At the most, this government appropriation will meet the needs of only 2,000,000 people, which, added to the others who will be fed by the Friends and Herbert Hoover, will make only 3,300,000 people who will be touched by the present extent of American relief. It is striking to realize that three times that number are still left in the danger of death. We cannot stop here. Individual relief must be magnified even in the face of the generous gift of the American government.

WHY THE GOVERNMENT RELIEF IS NOT ADEQUATE TO MEET THE EXTENT OF THE RUSSIAN FAMINE.

It became perfectly clear that the tragedy of starvation in Russia grew to such a size and form that neither individual nor organized charity could any longer meet the emergency alone. It was understood that the United States Government must help unless millions of men, women and children should be allowed to die by slow starvation, a thing which is now going on before the eyes of a world busy with other things. The American relief organizations have done their best to turn back the tide of suffering, but the forces are too great to be met in this way. A bill has been passed by Congress for the appropriation of Twenty Million Dollars to furnish grain and seed for the sufferers. It is too little, but it will be an enormous help.

This is not an issue between radical views and conservative policies. It is a question of life or death for human persons like ourselves, who can live through this winter only if we go to their help with a generous relief expedition.

It is important, however, that none of us should stop satisfied with the effort which the government has made. At the best it will be far short of adequate. The work of relief now being carried on with private funds will be none the less important. Every month that passes makes it more important. The American workers who are already over there distributing the gifts of generous American citizens are standing all the time on the desolate frontiers of death. They represent the only hope there is in the hard struggle for life through these dreary days of winter. We must keep them there, and we must keep the stream of food flowing for them to distribute. These Christmas days in our land of abundance should open our hearts in sympathy for those who cannot live unless some of our food goes to them. "Remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive."

THE VIENNA BREAD RIOTS.

"I am wondering if the American papers told much about the bread riots in Vienna," writes Emily Poley. "Yesterday the price of a loaf of bread went from Thirty-four to Seventy-four Kronen. I was working quietly in the Hofburg office in the afternoon when one of the girls who had been out visiting came in with much excitement. She said that all the shops were being broken into in the Jewish quarter. The next person who came in said that the riot was not particularly Anti-Semitic, but that it was mainly against the profiteers in general, and that all the cafés on the Ringstrasse were being demolished. The trams had stopped. There were crowds of people on the streets, and the Burg gates were being closed to prevent the people rushing through into the Inner City. We went on working in the Hofburg until time for supper. When we came out we found that all the palace doors were closed and we had to have the porter let us out. The streets were dark. There were no trams, or motors, or other vehicles. There were crowds of workers roaming through the streets, and in many of the shop-windows the glass was broken to pieces. We heard that the workers had gone around in companies and that the leaders had told them which places to break into. The stores which were selling only useful articles were quite untouched. The luxurious cafés, the big hotels, and the money exchanges and the luxury shops suffered most. I heard of only one place where they took things out and that was one of the large hotels, the Bristol. They entered there, threw the trunks out of the windows and broke the furnishings.

"It was a protest against the speculation in money, had been mostly by foreigners, which has helped to lower the value of the crown and thus raise food-prices beyond the possibility of purchase. It is a great pity that the demonstration took such a destructive form, but I expected it long ago. There is such a contrast between the destitution of the majority of the people and the luxury and extravagance of Kärntnerstrasse and the Ring.

"It is very cold here now, about ten degrees Fahrenheit."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

[This item from The Friend (London) brings again into prominence a subject to which Friends on this side of the water seem to make meagre response. The basic idea that peace is nurtured by understanding one another is certainly correct.—Eds.]

Henry Van Etten, of Paris, has just completed a series of addresses in this country in the exercise of his concern to bring home to Friends the spiritual value of the Esperanto movement. He has spoken to meetings of Friends and others at Birmingham, Leeds and Plymouth, and he also delivered his message at Lancashire and Cheshire Quarterly Meeting. Henry Van Etten became a Friend a few years ago, through reading Caroline Stephen's "Quaker Strongholds" in the Esperanto translation, and the first real impression made upon him by the Bible was made by the Esperanto version of the New Testament.

The burden of our Friend's message to us is that we are commanded to love all the members of the human family. Real personal love is almost impossible without mutual understanding, and the language barrier shuts us off from most of our brothers and sisters. With great labor we may acquire a knowledge of a very few foreign tongues. How few of us there are, however, who really master even one language besides our own! Esperanto, he feels, has been given to us as a key able to open the door to the hearts of our fellows, not only in two or three foreign countries, but over the whole world. Our Friend urges that it is the plain duty of us all to do everything in our power to hasten the day when the language is adopted as the general medium for international communication.

On the 16th, at Twelfth Street Meeting-house, there was held a meeting of about fifty Friends, representing a large number of Monthly Meetings, who are especially concerned in the matter of education for disarmament. The first hour, from five o'clock till six, was spent in comparing and sharing ideas and experiences of different communities. Sarah W. Elkinton told of work in Boston, accounts were given of public meetings, prize essay competitions, study groups, debates, in such places as Wilmington, Moorestown, West Chester, Yardley, Media, Downingtown, etc. After supper, a set of Peace lantern slides, prepared by our Friend Henry S. Williams, was shown. This was followed by an address by Francis E. Pollard of London Yearly Meeting and one of the most active peace workers in England, who felt he ought to call our attention for the moment to what the great conference at Washington is leaving undone. England's naval bill will still be at least seventy million pounds per annum. The land armies in Europe still number 3,300,000 men, of whom 2,500,000 belong to Allied nations or to nations the Allies have brought into being. The United States must revive its interest in European affairs.

He was followed by Frederick J. Libby, who reported on a session he and Francis Pollard had just recently had in Washington with four influential Japanese, where a platform was adopted (to be presented to the public in the three countries of England, United States and Japan immediately after the Conference has closed), looking towards further steps along the lines upon which the Conference has so splendidly begun. He discussed, too, the financial requirements for a campaign of education such as he is convinced is the one sure way to attain what we so long for.

The two hundred and fiftieth annual session of Baltimore Yearly Meeting is reported in the American Friend for Twelfth Month 8th. It was held Eleventh Month 18th to 23rd. John R. Cary succeeded to the clerkship made vacant by the death of Allen C. Thomas, who had served the meeting nearly a quarter of a century. The progress toward organization in the meeting is thus recorded:—

"In preparing for the work in the future the Yearly Meeting created an Executive Board, composed of the clerk and a representative of each of the standing committees. It is hoped thus to unify and co-ordinate the work so that the increased impetus engendered by the Forward Movement may be made into a steady force throughout every congregation in the Yearly Meeting."

We are indebted to Professor W. L. Pearson for a copy of the printed minutes of the fiftieth annual session of Kansas Yearly Meeting. It includes 112 pages of closely printed matter and a good index. A table on page 86 gives a total membership of 11,020, of these 2,820 are non-resident. This statistical table contains matter that we should hardly know how to collect in the east. There are 854 conversions recorded for the year, 1018 renewals, 567 sanctified. In the explanatory matter 5,227 are reported in twenty years as professing to have received the Baptism of the Holy Spirit. Even questions of cost of this evangelistic work are freely discussed. The average per capita for the past ten years has been $3.26. The educational table gives $48,000 as the value of school property and $63,960 as the amount of endowments.

THE Tenth Month number of the Australasian Friend is largely devoted to the General Meeting at Adelaide, South Australia, being the twentieth General Meeting of Friends for Australia. It was held "Ninth Month 26th and by adjournments to the twenty-ninth of Ninth Month, 1921."

Something of the distances involved in travel to the meeting is indicated in this paragraph:—

Our Queensland representative, Joseph Dixon, is over eighty, and had traveled 1868 miles to be present. The distance covered by those attending this General Meeting is greater than usual. Mary Pumphrey and Dorothea Benson had but recently arrived from England—about 12,000 miles. John Holdsworth had traveled from the East Coast of New Zealand—2600 miles, to Adelaide. Queensland next, 1868; Sydney, 1083; Hobart, about 900; Melbourne, 483.

It is noted that a letter of greeting from W. C. Allen and his wife was read.

Two or three reported utterances will show that Friends are exercised along similar lines on both sides of the globe:—

E. Benson—In earlier times, when little business came before us, the consideration of "The Queries," one at a time, deeply and seriously, led to personal searching of heart, as to how we could truthfully answer that, as in God's sight. That caused humility, and prayer for help—deepening the spiritual life. We seem now to miss that depth.

Dorothea Benson read extracts from the minutes of Yearly Meeting in London. We delegate too much to Committees. It rests with individuals to raise the tone of spiritual life.

Professor Wilton said addresses with power need not be long or frequent. He would rather sit through a whole silent Meeting than hear one utterance not in the life. The Meeting is not the power-house, God is the power-house—the Meeting should be a time for gathering strength. The spiritual is the more important side of life, the basis of our active life. We go out from waiting upon God, to do His will—practical work.

The reported membership of the General Meeting is 642.

J. W. GRAHAM, Principal of Dalton Hall, Manchester [a month ago, Eleventh Month 29, 1921] gave his contribution on "The Society of Friends" to the series of lectures, "Some Leading Phases of Christian Belief," organized by the Court of Governors of Sion College, London. This body is actually one of the ancient City Companies, dating from the reign of James I, and was originally devoted to the benefit of the clergy "of the City of London and outlying Hamlets," though now its membership includes the whole of the metropolitan area.

Principal J. W. Graham had an audience of Church of England clergy and a few ladies, and after speaking for fifty minutes was urged to go on. Forty minutes were afterwards devoted to questions and two speakers described the occasion as an outstanding event in their lives. It appeared to have introduced them to regions of religious thought quite new to them.

TUNESASSA NOTES.—Henry B. Leeds, Superintendent, has recently forwarded to the Indian Committee a copy of Resolution adopted by the New York Indian Welfare Society, which reads as follows:—

"We desire to register our appreciation for the long and helpful service of the Friends' Indian School at Tunesassa, and we further state that we believe that these good people at their School have exercised a transforming influence over the lives of hundreds of our young people. For these and other reasons we petition the Friends to continue their splendid work for our boys and girls, if it is possible for them to do so without detracting from the support of other duties they deem more important."

He also gives the following interesting information, which is worthy of note:—

Dema Crouse—1913—is our Girls' Governess this year; Ruth Warrior—1916—graduated as a Registered Nurse at the Jamestown Memorial Hospital, New York, last Fifth Month; and Bessie Jamison—1917—finished the prescribed course at the Cleveland, Ohio, High School, Sixth Month, 1921."

The Representative Meeting held a three-hour session on the 16th inst., there being a rather unusual number of matters of interest to claim its care.

The Committee under appointment to consider the practicability of co-operative action in connection with other Protestant bodies in certain kinds of betterment work in Philadelphia, had given attention to its duties, but was not ready to make definite recommendations.

At our last meeting, considerable time was spent in discussing the merits of the much advertised cases of Sacco and Vanzetti: the Committee under appointment is giving intelligent care to the subject, and hopes to be able to render further service.

Our last Yearly Meeting referred to this Body the consideration of a request for certain changes in the rules of Discipline on Marriage; the Committee under appointment produced a written report; a full discussion determined the sentiment of members, which was somewhat different from the changes suggested; the Committee was continued to make the changes brought out in the discussion.

Francis E. Pollard, representing the London Meeting for Sufferings in its work on peace and disarmament, was present, and told us of the work of English Friends in this direction; he asked for co-operation in the wonderful work which has been started, towards what we hope is real world understanding.

It was directed that a message should be sent to our President, and other prominent Government officials, urging the abolition of submarines and poison gas—also expressive of our approval of the proposed International Conferences to be held from time to time to discuss world problems. We need to urge the operation of law instead of war in the settlement of international differences.

We were informed that there are still 145 men imprisoned for long terms under war time legislation, for acts which in time of peace would not be considered criminal. Europe has released her prisoners of this class; it was agreed that we should urge Executive clemency, and a committee was appointed to draft a letter to President Harding, and deliver it personally if thought best.

The Doukhobor Committee made a report, stating that, inasmuch as the Doukhobors are not needing financial assistance in educational matters, they recommended that the balance of the $15,000 Clementine Cope Fund be now transferred to the Yearly Meeting Indian Committee to be used in paying teachers' salaries at the Tunesassa Indian School; this met the full approval of the Meeting.

WARS AND STRIKES.

[Not the least remarkable thing about this article is the fact that it comes from a French paper. It does seem that what President Harding calls "The Gospel of Understanding" is thriving throughout the world.—Eps.]

The long and destructive textile strike in the north of France has served to call attention to the similarity between wars and strikes. Each is provoked by an appeal which is not thoroughly understood, each works the greatest hardship on the working-man, and it is rarely possible to erect a new and better civilization on the ruins left by either. There is reason to believe that wars are going to be no more. Effort is at least being made in this direction. Why not begin right now to arrange our affairs so that strikes will likewise be upheavals of the past? If twentieth century civilization is worthy of the name, wars and strikes are equally absurd. We are doing a lot of investigating just now by way of getting at the real cause of the last war and thus placing ourselves in a position to make such a situation impossible in the future. Would it not be wise to make an equally thorough study of the causes that led up to the textile strike by way of averting a similar misfortune in the future?

Since it is the laboring class that declares strikes, it is commonly believed that it is the same class that causes strikes. This is one of the first propositions that need to be submitted to the acid test. And since a change of some kind inevitably follows a strike, some unfortunately believe that the change must be for the better. This is by no means the case. The workmen of Roubaix-Tourcoing admit at present that the strike is a quite unsatisfactory means of adjusting their difficulties, but they come up at once with their real grievance: We have no other means of placing our case before the public. That is the gist and the crux of the whole business. Our workmen have heretofore had inadequate opportunity to talk over their troubles with their employers. This they should be given. If wars are to be eliminated from the scheme of things it will be because men agree to talk the situation over so long that when through debating they will not feel like fighting. The working-men must be given the same privilege. Talk after all hurts no one to the extent of killing him or making a major operation urgent. Wars and strikes do. Both should be abolished.—Le Progrès Civique. Translated and reprinted in the N. Y. Evening Post.

A THOUGHT OF GOD.

Vainly strive our lips to utter Fitting words for thoughts of Thee.
Better Thou than best of fathers,
Tenderer than fondest mother,
Closer friend than earth can wot of.
Must Thou ever nameless be?

Burning bush in part revealed Thee
To the patriarch of old.
Emblem of potential guidance;
By its brilliance, night defying,
Ever burning, nought consuming,
Flaming bush like constant gold.

When he asked how he should name Thee
To the people of Thy choice, (Toil-worn slaves in Pharaoh's kingdom,
Groaning in a cruel bondage,
Looking unto Thee for succor),
Spake to him Thy answering voice.

Say "I am" hath sent me to you;
This the mystic name Thou gave.
Named were Pharaoh's gods for powers,
Named for qualities or talents,
Named at pleasure of the priesthood.
Not a name like theirs Thou gave;

But to words that spell existence
We add attributes of Life.
Thou art Power, and Hope, and Comfort,
Sternest Justice, fairest Mercy,
All of all in Thee residing,
Thou art Love and Thou art Life.

Thus we use our verbal symbols,
Symbols of the best we know,
All too feebly thought expressing.
But in simple daily phrasing
We fall back on "Heavenly Father," Humble childlike love to show.

VII.

There has been no plenary session of the Conference this week, and hence no formal progress can be recorded in this letter. One very important question has been settled—namely, that the French are not to be conceded the very large naval expansion which they demanded last week. The Japanese having definitely accepted the ratio of 5:5:3 for capital ships, the Conference was on the eve of holding a plenary session to adopt formally that ratio for Great Britain, the United States and Japan, with a probable ratio of 1:7 for France and Italy, respectively; at this critical moment the French plan of building ten capital ships, thereby increasing their ratio to more than 3, was suddenly spread before the naval committee. After a frank cablegram from Secretary Hughes to Premier Briand, this plan was withdrawn, and now it seems probable that the ratio of 1:7 will be accepted by France and Italy.

This decision depends partly upon the decision in regard to submarines. Great Britain is desirous of stating its proposition to abolish submarines, for both offensive and defensive war, in a plenary session and of having it discussed in the full light of the world's public opinion. This opportunity has not yet been accorded. Meanwhile a large volume of public opinion in favor of the British proposition is beating in upon the American delegation.

American public opinion as a whole, however, is still to be enlightened, organized and mobilized upon submarine, chemical and aerial warfare, and upon various aspects of land armaments. While our Secretary of State and his colleagues in the Washington Conference are laboring to reduce and limit armaments, it is an extraordinary and preposterous fact that our Secretary of War is advocating in his annual report and public speeches such things as "a more complete state of preparedness than at any previous period in the peace-time history of our country;" universal military training; a reserve army of 2,000,000 men; the use of the Regular Army mainly as instructors of the people in the military art; the maintenance of 17,000 officers, the doubling of West Point's capacity and the training of as many reserve officers as possible in colleges and universities; the development of aerial weapons, poison gas and chemical warfare; and the mobilization of the industries and the entire man and woman-power of the nation for military purposes.

"I would conscript every person in the United States from eighteen to sixty years of age, should a future war prevail," declares our official representative of Mars, "and would say: 'You are to do thus and so, because you can do that better than anything else; you can fight, or you can serve in some other capacity for which you are best suited.'" The Secretary admits that his grandiose plans of military preparedness cannot succeed "until the American people, who are the source of material for the body of our defensive structure [what a delicate way of suggesting that they are the real 'food for powder' and the real instruments of organized murder!] throw themselves whole-heartedly into the work. The American people have started along this path, and they cannot afford to turn back."

How characteristic of a Secretary of War that, with offices under the same roof that shelters the Department of State and within a stone's throw of the Pan-American Building which shelters the Conference on the Reduction and Limitation of Armaments, he should nevertheless discern the path of unprecedented military preparedness as that which the American people should still be intent on pursuing! And what a weird aspect of Mr. Facing-both-ways, of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, is given by Secretary Weeks to an Administration which includes Secretary Hughes! It is of course to be expected that officials of the army and navy should be the last to read to-day's handwriting on the wall and interpret it aright; but the War Secretary's programme is a wholesome reminder that, after the Conference has accomplished its work of muzzling the dogs of war, as between nations, our own people must buckle down to work, in common with the army-ridden peoples of Europe, to extract the fangs and clip the claws of the dogs of war which are still rampant among us here at home.

The Shantung question has been given precedence in the Conference over other Far Eastern questions, and just at present the discussion between the Chinese and Japanese over Shantung has been referred to Peking and Tokio. The Chinese spokesman stated yesterday evening that the Japanese proposals were unacceptable, and the Japanese spokesman said that the Japanese delegates had already exceeded their instructions in the proposals they have made. The Shantung discussion is not a part of the proceedings of the Conference proper, but it is being conducted between the Chinese and Japanese, with the American and British first delegates acting as "guides, counsellors and friends." The chief bone of contention is the Shantung Railroad, its ownership and control; and there should certainly be found some solution of the problem acceptable to both parties.

The naval committee is discussing this morning the French proposition regarding its auxiliary ships and the British proposal to abolish submarines. It is an unusually important and difficult discussion, and may be so prolonged that a plenary session of the Conference will not be able to pass upon its recommendations until next week.

Meanwhile, there will probably be an adjournment of two days for the Christmas holiday. May the minds of statesmen be enlightened and their hearts softened by the spirit of the Prince of Peace so that they may join heartily in the Christmas anthem of "Glory to God in the highest, on earth, peace, and good-will to men."

NOTICES.

FRIENDS engaged or specially interested in the problems of secondary and college education are cordially invited to hear Arthur E. Morgan, President of Antioch College, Ohio, who will speak at Friends' Select School, Sixteenth and Cherry Streets, Philadelphia, on Sixth-day, First Month 6th, at 8 P. M. His subject is "The Antioch Plan."

Antioch College is famous for having had Horace Mann as its first President and G. Stanley Hall as an alumnus.

President Morgan, a very successful construction engineer by profession, has undertaken the reorganization and development of the college according to educational methods that have never before been so fully tried. Opportunity is provided for both boys and girls to spend alternate periods of five weeks in school and five weeks at actual work in nearby industries, and thus be partially self-supporting. It is the purpose to combine the general essentials of both a liberal and a technical education. The required cultural courses are based upon a complete revision of the conventional liberal arts curriculum and are planned to give the student a survey of the entire field of human concern and interest.

ONE of our subscribers was much interested in the recent account which we published on the Arts and Crafts work done in Vienna by the impoverished aristocrats there, and which is sold in the building occupied by the Friends' Mission. This subscriber bought $25 worth of kronen, and sent it to a friend in the Mission, asking that she should make a selection of articles from the Arts and Crafts work. This was done and the following articles were received by mail, which showed exquisite workmanship, and valued by American standards were worth far in excess of the $25 sent: one beautiful scarf (like those from Liberty's), evidently dyed in Vienna, two exquisite etchings, one carved pendant, one silk card-case with a cameo insertion of the most exquisite needlework, one brooch of similar needlework (very beautiful), one beaded necklace, one embroidered handkerchief, one linen handkerchief-case (embroidered), one open-work, embroidered centerpiece. The duty on these articles was less than $5.

A member of the Friends' Mission who sent the articles wrote that if there are others who wished to buy, they should write directly to the Arts and Crafts Department, Mission der Freunden, Singerstrasse 16, Wien I, Austria; and that they should send money in the form of a check, rather than buying kronen in this country.

THE GREAT QUEST.

We are familiar with Cromwell's remark in justification of his daughter's religious course: "To be a Seeker is to be of the best sect next to a Finder; and such an one shall every faithful, humble seeker be at the end." This has the ring of sincerity, however much the great man failed subsequently to recognize some of the "faithful, humble seekers," and to guard their rights to the freedom of their consciences. A seeker after truth must be humble enough to receive it, and the use of the word seek pre-supposes a condition of conscious need and aspiration. But the word as employed in so many places in our English versions of the Scriptures represents not only the active desire for discovery, but for possession and enjoyment as well. Thus we are exhorted to seek the Lord, His name, His strength, His face. On the other hand, it represents a movement of the Divine love toward us. "The Father seeketh" those who would be His true worshippers; "The Son of Man came to seek and to save."

In the injunction, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness," we are shown both something to be learned as truth and something to be pressed after as a personal experience and possession. The Kingdom is elsewhere presented as at once a condition into which if faithful we shall enter, and as a power coming to us and into us. To view it only as a final reward to be reached when the earthly tabernacle shall be dissolved, is to fall short of the full lesson and purpose in our Lord's teaching. The Kingdom is not to be separated from righteousness. It is both spiritual satisfaction in the individual experience and a solemn emulation of the life of Him who hath in all things left us an example that we should follow in His steps. What this may lead us into is implied in that memorable saying, "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent me and to finish His work." This, indeed, is such a seeking as will bring the final consummation of faith and hope.

But righteousness—that is, rightness and justice—as viewed in the Gospel, transcends anything attained by even a punctilious observance of rule alone. The righteousness which is of faith is the expression of a renewed mind; it is the product of obedience to the word "nigh thee, in thy mouth and in thy heart," and it is regarded by the Apostle as a "gift," attached to grace. To seek righteousness then involves being cleansed from unrighteousness,—and how irksome we often find this process! Very significant is William Penn's description of the thorough work of grace in that day of the "fresh breaking forth" of Truth, when "the brightness of God's coming" both revealed and corrected whatever was amiss. "Every thought, word and deed was brought to the Light, the root examined, and its tendency considered." Surely this examination of the root, this consideration of the tendency, is something that too many have not been careful to give themselves to, if we may judge from the plans, adventures and methods by which they have sought to obtain their purposes. In what a vague sense, with what little insight apparently, is the petition often recited—"Thy kingdom come."

Obviously there is throughout the Christian world generally a need of such an apprehension of the nature of that kingdom that righteousness shall be recognized as essentially part and parcel of it. We are called upon not only to endeavor to "practice the presence of God" in a devotional sense and in the innermost sanctuary, but to practice the kingdom of God in the affairs of human life and in the relations of human society. Happily, to this higher conception of the requirements of Christianity,—of the kingdom that has come nigh unto us—some fine, courageous spirits are giving voice, and sometimes suffering in its cause. If once the powers of the earth, in whatever form or establishment they may appear, could be in larger degree actuated by a similar motive, could be inspired with this kind of seeking, how quickly would the solution of "world problems" be simplified! What re-modeling then of the institutions of society and of government! What new adaptations of the faith we have professed! Yet all these would follow in due course and place, if those who "name the name of Christ" could so far come into the order and spirit of His peaceable kingdom that they would seek the righteousness thereof in their individual lives. For hardly shall that kingdom be "in the midst of us" if it is not also in us, governing our affections, regulating our impulses, and "inspiring us to good."

Here, in view of individual failures in the past, with doubts or misgivings as to future fidelity, one can hardly forbear acknowledging the sense of deficiency and disclaiming the advantage of "having attained" to any full experience. Yet the goal is before us all: the Kingdom of Heaven and the righteousness thereof. What if this mean for us the relinquishment of some cherished enjoyments, the negation of long-accepted precedents, a venturing forth in some unfamiliar paths of faith? Is it indeed such a kingdom that we are seeking?

"THE hard things to give up are not necessarily motors and obvious luxuries. For Friends that is fairly easy, but it is hard to give up the quiet hours in a country home with simple surroundings and books and leisure."—GEORGE LLOYD HODGKIN.

THE SOUL-WINNING APPEAL.

THOMAS J. BATTEY.

(Read at the New England Conference on Evangelism.)

The soul-winning appeal of a consistent Christian life expresses a whole sermon in itself. It is such because its skillful statement opens the eye at once to the realm of reality, and fixes the gaze on the actual facts of spiritual life which are as deep as consciousness and as dependable in their working as gravitation is in the world of matter. Strictly speaking, there has been only one absolutely consistent Christian life lived in this world; all others have been more or less imperfect reflections of this. But the fact that He left the soul-winning appeal of His own life as His best legacy to the human race, and the only hope of the world is the crowning evidence of its ultimate triumph.

Evidently He needed not that anyone should teach Him what man's spiritual nature demanded, for we are told, "He knew what was in man." As the Great Physician of humanity, He prescribed the sovereign remedy. That remedy lies implicit in His great word, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Me;" and the way of His being lifted up in these latter days is through the soul-winning appeal of His life lived over again in His followers.

The most illuminating commentary I can think of upon this subject is afforded by those choice words spoken by poor James Nayler two hours before his death. The message is a familiar one, but is too full of the saddest and gladdest meaning in a soul's history ever to become commonplace. He said: "There is a spirit which I feel that delights to do no evil nor to avenge any wrong, but delights to endure all things in hope to enjoy its own in the end. Its hope is to outlive all wrath and contention and to weary out all exaltation and cruelty or whatever is of a nature contrary to itself. It sees to the end of all temptations. . . . If it be betrayed, it bears it, for its ground and spring is in the mercy and forgiveness of God. Its crown is meekness, its life is everlasting love unfeigned; and it takes its kingdom with entreaty and not with contention and keeps it by lowliness of mind. In God alone it can rejoice, though none else can regard it, or can own its life. . . . I found it alone, being forsaken."

The matchless gem of thought in this quotation, as it seems to me, is this: "It takes its kingdom with entreaty and not with contention." A kingdom taken with entreaty belongs to a different sphere than that won by contention, even to that sphere of which Jesus spoke when He said, "My kingdom is not of this world else would my servants fight." The one is the consent of the soul; the other the compulsion of fear. The first is the slow way of the cross which the Saviour chose; the second is the swift destruction of enemies which the tempter suggested.

Contention has failed ingloriously. The way of entreaty has now its chance, perhaps as never before, and its first great task is to stop the breach and heal the wounds contention has made. The weapons of its warfare must be the sweet reasonableness of consistent Christian lives lived side by side and heart to heart with a contentious world, a little leaven in a large lump, but having the promise and the potency of a living, growing, developing, revolutionizing organism, fed from hidden sources, working slowly, but in the end converting the sodden lump into the veritable staff of life.

There is a story told of a stranger from Europe, a cultivated musician, who in old Colonial days entered a place of worship out in the wilderness where the crude singing so offended his ear that he fain would have rushed from the room to escape the hateful sound. But his sense of propriety restrained him, and as he listened he soon noticed one voice amid the jargon that was singing in perfect tune, no higher, no lower, because of the discord about her; still that calm sweet voice sang on, and as she sang one by one of the other voices came into harmony with hers until, ere the hymn was ended, all were singing in unison.

There has been only One Voice in the Babel discord of this world that could thus sing on to the very end but the echoes of that Voice have not yet quite died away, and others who have listened and are still listening for its accents, have felt their sweet, subduing power and have come into harmony therewith. May we not believe that many more through the soul-winning appeal of this rising chorus will come into harmony, the discord slowly cease, and the Anthem of the Ages, the Song of Moses and of the Lamb, will yet be sung, as the Babel noises die away?—Reprinted from the American Friend of Twelfth Month 15th.

PROVIDENCE, Rhode Island.

STILL thy love, O Christ arisen,
Years to reach these souls in prison!
Through all depths of sin and loss
Drops the plummet of thy cross!
Never yet abyss was found
Deeper than that cross could sound.

—WHITTIER.

Every child of God must have his convictions. Direct dependence must be upon Christ our Lord. Our fathers, however righteous, cannot give us faith, but God can give us that same faith which our fathers held in the cross of Jesus Christ, his Son—a faith which we shall unflinchingly keep, not because another has held it, but because it is eternally righteous and true, a conviction of our own souls. The fathers of the Society of Friends were strong in their full acceptance of Jesus Christ as the Saviour and Redeemer of the world. They recognized in him the eternal fountain of all cleansing. They saw in His death upon the cross the way appointed for the opening of that fountain—and as our fathers believed we also believe that the "blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth us from all sin." We feel that Christ, risen from the grave, triumphant over death, one with our Almighty Father, will enter and govern the lives of men.

To the verity of these unchanging principles of the Christian faith, the disciples and apostles of our Lord bear indisputable witness.

We hear the voice of John, the beloved: "Unto Him that loved us and washed us from our sins in His own blood." "These are they which came out of great tribulation and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

We hear the voice of Peter: "Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things . . . but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish or spot: who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world." "Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved."

We hear the voice of that strong writer of Hebrews: "But by His own blood He entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us."

"So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many." "Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden underfoot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing?"

We hear the voice of Paul, that ever-active, fearless servant of our Lord: "Grace be to you and peace from God the Father and from our Lord Jesus Christ, who gave Himself for our sins, that He might deliver us from this present evil world, according to the will of God and our Father." "But God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, whereby the world is crucified unto me and I unto the world." "In whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace."

We hear the voice of that stern, unflinching herald of the immediate coming of our Redeemer, John the Baptist, whose words, spoken on the banks of the Jordan, so powerfully stirred his hearers: "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." And again the day following—"Behold the Lamb of God."

We hear also the Divine voice of our Lord Himself: "For even the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister and to give His life a ransom for many." On the eve of His crucifixion, in the face of that experience which in all the history of the world has never had its equal, His word is clear—"But for this cause came I unto this hour." When leaving His disciples on that now far distant day when the clouds received Him from sight, we hear His ever-consistent word. "Thus it is written, and thus it behooved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead on the third day: and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name among all nations beginning at Jerusalem. And ye are witnesses of these things."

ARTHUR R. PENNELL.

BREAD AND HYACINTHS.

Across the bold, black type that tells
Of students starved for bread and books,
There comes a misty blur of words
Out of a cloistered past:

"Had I two loaves I'd fain sell one
And buy me hyacinths,
For hyacinths would feed my soul."

And this indictment stabs my mind:
We in America add loaf to loaf
And only now and then buy hyacinths;
While over there they sell half-loaves
To buy a bit of time to think.

To those that know that hyacinths can feed
There comes the call to a Diviner deed—
To share the loaf to fill another's need
For hyacinths—and bread.

STUDENT FRIENDSHIP FUND.

THE SPIRIT OF NATIONALISM AND THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE.

VINCENT D. NICHOLSON.

One of the most interesting developments of the Washington Conference is the bringing forward by President Harding of his dark horse,—his "Association of Nations." A permanent forum of all nations (including those not now represented) is the logical development of the idea back of this Conference and is in line with imperative world need. The Conference now in session for a few weeks can take only the first steps toward the solution of the few questions that are before it, and these are only a fraction of the questions that clamor for solution in a frightfully disordered world.

The logic of President Harding's idea (not to mention its practical realization) is seriously challenged by the fact that we already have in existence an Association of the Nations that includes most of the world. The relation between the Wilson League and the Harding Association will cause the President many sleepless nights if he really has the burden of the world's chaos upon his heart. Is the Association to merge into the League, or is the League to be swallowed up in the Association; will we allocate certain different functions to each, or will both exist as rival organizations in a struggle for the survival of the fittest? The last mentioned possibility would be a preposterous denial of the very purpose of both organizations. Each of the other possibilities must involve an agreement on the part of all nations (including our own) as to the methods and machinery for handling international affairs and as to the functions and future of the existing League. Whatever happens, our own country, if it plays a helpful rather than a ridiculous part in world affairs, must turn its back upon the past issues of our domestic party politics and consider the facts of the world situation as they now present themselves.

There are many reasons why a believer in the League,—or a League—of Nations should desire a drastic revision of the Versailles Covenant. It is too much in the nature of an alliance of victors to guarantee the continued status of a punitive peace. It excludes Germany and Russia. Its usefulness is seriously impaired by the unanimous consent provision.

These considerations, however, are not the ones put forward in the inspired articles favoring the Harding "Association." We can toss aside, as scarcely worthy of consideration, the rhetorical references to the sacred policies of our forefathers and the Washingtonian objection to "entangling alliances." Those who thus pay homage to the spirit of Washington do not wear the clothes that he wore nor do they travel in the vehicles which he used; neither should they be bound by the thoughts with which he clothed his mind, nor by the peculiar political problems of the eighteenth century world.

Of little more importance are the statements that the new "Association" is to be one of "informal understandings," in which we will avoid the binding entanglements of the existing League. If the "informal understandings" are to mean anything when vital problems involving these understandings arise, they will be just as binding as lengthy covenants covered with all the fearful sanction of red seals and ribbon. If they are to mean that a nation is left free to do just as it pleases, regardless of the "understanding," then the Association becomes an empty shell.

There is a matter of serious danger in the discussion of the proposed Association of Nations—namely, the emphasis being placed upon sovereignty and the fear of a so-called super-government. This type of international psychology (which sometimes seems to run riot in the United States) is the fundamental problem in the whole field of international relations. As a pre-requisite to any forward step we need a new conception of the word "patriotism." H. G. Wells evidently exaggerates the fact when he says that patriotism is largely a "snarling suspicion of foreign peoples." A. Clutton-Brock in an article in the Atlantic Monthly only deals with one aspect of the problem when he describes patriotism as an objectionable and often dangerous type of collective self-conceit.

We need to recognize that a nation is merely a political unit for dealing with certain problems of government that can best be dealt with by a unit of that size and character. When we strip patriotism of the traditional prejudices and the admitted excesses that cluster around it, we have little left but the same kind of relation which we bear toward other governmental units,—the State, the county, the township. We need to be loyal and devoted members of every unit to which we belong. In all the vast problems within the jurisdiction of our nation we should strive for a realization of our ideals and should be proud of achievement, just as we should feel the same obligations of citizenship in connection with the lesser problems of our borough or city. Anything more than this, in a conception of patriotism, seems based on traditions that do not correspond with the real interests of mankind. The vesting in a world organization of exclusive responsibility for all problems of international scope, even though it involves large abridgment of national sovereignty, is just as reasonable and necessary as the limitation of sovereignty by each of the American Colonies in 1783. How far our prejudices prevent an acceptance of this obviously true principle is indicated in the Society of Friends itself by the frequent objection of existing Committees or groups to a limitation of their "sovereignty" for the sake of a broader movement.

It is often urged that a nation is more than a governmental unit; that the sentiment of patriotism is based upon race, religion, culture, social and economic systems. Upon analysis, however, it appears that none of these important parts of the content of human experience are necessarily delimited by national boundaries. Usually just the opposite is true.

Our own nation is only one example among many of a composite of races. The converse is also true that one race often forms the predominant element in several different nations.

Religion is not circumscribed by national boundaries. Our feeling of Christian brotherhood—one of the strongest currents of our lives—pays no attention to national boundaries and flows across them to embrace persons of all nations.

The commercial firm with a large exporting business has a stronger community of interest with his foreign customers than with his neighboring firms across the street. Except for such artificial creations as a tariff, national boundaries are as easily disregarded by business as are boundaries between our States and counties.

The best that we enjoy in the realm of culture—literature, music, art—are not American. Our loyalties and devotion in this realm must go out to the many foreign peoples who created the culture which we enjoy.

Patriotism, of course, often attempts to restrict the natural flow of these great fundamental loyalties of human experience. This attempt, which all too often succeeds, is a perversion of the true basic interest of man. We should be loyal to our country throughout the whole range of legitimate obligations which citizenship imposes, just as we should be loyal to the best interests of our state and county and city. We should recognize, however, that this loyalty to country—called patriotism—operates in only one field—the political; that other loyalties equally important have no relation to national boundaries; and that a patriotism that has anything of suspicion or antagonism or jealousy toward other nations strikes at the heart of these other world-wide loyalties and is opposed to the realities in human happiness and life.

The view of patriotism presented above seems the only one that squares with basic reality in human experience and is the goal toward which the peoples of the world must move if war is to be eliminated and constructive processes of mutual helpfulness substituted in its place. I do not mean to intimate, however, that we must not take account of the traditions and prejudices that have grown up around the concept of patriotism. Every actual step toward the goal of a true world brotherhood of peoples must make temporary adjustments and make-shifts in recognition of national aspirations that may be illusory but are none the less imperious.

The matter of real concern is the direction toward which we set our faces. So far as our own country is concerned, most of our emphasis upon "sovereignty" and "Americanism," most of our objection to "entanglements" and a "super-government" are a look backward along the blood-strewn path that is marked by national antagonisms and war. For us, who are largely free from the traditional jealousies that curse the old world, the forward look must be free from the exclusive nationalism that has dominated American life for the past two years. We are called to a bold leadership in developing a world consciousness with world loyalties in connection with all questions that are international in scope. The measure of success of our present government in this great hour in American life will be the measure of its response to this call.

NATHU LAL, YEARLY MEETING CLERK.

Readers of The Friend (London) will be sorry to hear of the death of Nathu Lal, of Hoshangabad, who for several years was the Clerk of Hoshangabad Yearly Meeting of Friends. At the time of his death he was about sixty-one years of age; but for some time his powers of both body and mind had been failing, though he continued to the last to take his accustomed seat facing the meeting on First-day morning. Joseph Taylor writes:

"Nathu Lal was a native of Rajputana, and was left an orphan during one of the severe famines that ravaged North India; he was educated at Narsirabad, about 300 miles north-west of Hoshangabad, by the Rajputana Presbyterian Mission. For some time he had charge of their Mission book-shop, and then entered the service of the Rajputana-Malwa Railway as a guard. About 1887 he relinquished this post and all prospect of advancement to assist the late John H. Williams, of the F. F. M. A., as his principal helper at Sohagpur. In view of what is so often stated as to missionary work being undertaken in pursuit of 'loaves and fishes,' I may add that he received as a mission helper less than half his salary as a guard, but he undertook the work under a very definite sense of the Lord's calling.

"During 1889 he opened up work in the Seoni Malwa tahsil, returning to Sohagpur in 1890, when I took over charge from him. During his short stay in Seoni Malwa he endeared himself to the people, and opened about five 'Sunday-schools,' besides regularly visiting the large markets within a day's reach of his home on preaching expeditions. Most of his later years were spent at Hoshangabad, where he purchased a house opposite the meeting-house. Besides the routine work associated with the duties of a preacher of the Gospel and pastor of a large congregation, he prepared and published two or three small books in Hindi—including a Hindi life of the late Samuel Baker, to whom he was much attached. When I accompanied him on our cold weather itinerant journeys, I was always impressed by the way in which almost before light he would retire into the jungle for private prayer before we set out on the day's work.

"Nathu Lal was much respected throughout the Hoshangabad District, and there are few villages in the eastern portion, in which the Friends' Mission labors, where he had not witnessed for our Lord. He leaves a widow and several children."—From The Friend (London).

AN OUTSIDE IMPRESSION OF THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FOREIGN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

Out of Japan came the Grand Old Lady, Kaji Yajima San, bringing in her ninetieth year a world-peace petition from ten thousand Japanese women to President Harding.

Through the courtesy of the Friends' Foreign Missionary Association the memorable opportunity was given of hearing her speak on "What Has Christianity Done for Japan?" As the slight, yet imposing figure, in dark kimono, stood at the desk, the magnetic message reached her hearers, even before it was gracefully interpreted by her good friend, who had been constrained to leave her work in the Japanese Home in Seattle and accompany Yajima San upon this journey.

Yajima told of many of the helpful influences of Christianity in Japan, especially striking was the statement that a great meeting of social workers was held in one of the largest Buddhist temples in Tokio and that two-thirds of these workers were Christians.

Her closing word was very Japanese and pleasing. She expressed the hope that the time would come when throughout the world all would be Friends.

The Japanese National President of the Y. W. C. T. U., a vigorous, fine-looking young woman, gave a stirring address, and a few moments of intense consecration closed the meeting, when the devoted Friends' missionaries to Japan crystallized their missionary purpose in a few significant sentences. In a quarter of an hour a vivid presentation was made by Gurney and Elizabeth Binford, Dr. William W. and Catherine J. Cadbury and Catherine J. and Herbert V. Nicholson.

Kaji Yajima craves that at all her meetings, Christians shall join with her in prayer. She longs to know of their hearts and voices being lifted to God. There were no perfunctory prayers, but heart-felt petitions were offered.

Truly, as was said, the coming of these messengers from Japan, after the tumult of the war that deluged the world with sorrow, was like the return to Noah of the dove bearing an olive leaf.

"FAITH must express itself in action or it will get weak and rotten. . . . The necessity of faith is one of the commonplaces of religion; but the full meaning of faith is too often missed. To have confidence for our ultimate salvation is only the shadow of faith; the substance of faith is a confidence that we and all men can have here and now, the spirit of moral health which makes us brothers of all our fellows."—From "The Meaning of Prayer."

THE LOST POET AND PROPHET.

In his address, "The Lost Poet and Prophet," at the meeting of the Friends' Educational Association, held at Friends' Select School, Twelfth Month 10, 1921, Dallas Lore Sharpe said in part:—President Butler of Columbia University in his address to the Trustees of Columbia last summer called attention to the fact that in this great world crisis of our history "for all these millions we have not produced one great poet, religious leader or philosopher." The voice of business is easily heard and great inventors and great organizers shout aloud, but the voices of the spirit are stilled. There is something wrong in the educational system or this would not be so. In times past we have had our great leaders, why not now? Commenting on the "Sermon on the Mount" men said they were astonished for Christ had spoken as one having authority and not as those who had gone to college. That first man spoke as he felt, free from the mark of the book. His only reference to books was meant to set them aside as final authorities. The substance from the Sermon on the Mount came from three great sources,—his knowledge of his trade, his knowledge of common folk, and his knowledge of the wild and lonely hills. He went behind what he had learned in books to his own knowledge of life and nature and so spoke with authority.

In our schools what credit do we give a child for his knowledge of nature, life, handling of tools? We act as if the whole of education could be compassed by books, as if we wished to produce scribes. We all dream dreams for our children, but forgetting or taking no hint from Jesus' early training, we send them to school, to a select school such as Saul of Tarsus attended in Jerusalem, not to such a school as produced Jesus, the carpenter's son. "But," you say, "he was different." All boys and girls are different. The educational program of many of our great men very nearly matches that of Jesus. Lincoln is only one great example of many. Had his ancestors continued to live at Hingham, Massachusetts, and had Abraham Lincoln gone to Harvard, he could never have spoken at Gettysburg as he did. His discourse would more nearly have paralleled that of Edward Everett on the same occasion. Aesop's Fables, Shakespeare, the Life of Washington, the Bible, were his text books and he knew them well. Where in the program of our children is due allowance being made for their elective courses?

The great utterances of men are marked by: Religiousness—The utmost simplicity—Freshness and originality.

Great utterances are marked by religiousness. Religion cannot be taught in school. You can learn theology, but you can't "get religion." Religion must come in remote and quiet moments to be given by one as close to the child as breathing. This is the parental part of education. There are many more children like Samuel and Jeanne d'Arc than there are mothers like Hannah. A child does not need doctrinal religion but consciousness of the presence of God, and it is the privilege of parents to keep that consciousness alive.

Great utterances are marked by simplicity. No man can be great until he becomes like a little child. It is better to be born an ordinary Sharpe in Halesville, New Jersey, than Henry Adams with the whole of Boston on his ten pounds of babyhood. How can a child get in contact with influences which will make him simple and elemental? The public school is a great fundamental institution, a national institution for national purposes intended to safeguard life and liberty. Much can be done in school. There is great value in great books and in book education, but school develops the group, not the individual. The individual should be the parent's concern. A parent must regard his child as Mary regarded Jesus. God's work is not yet done and one of your sons may have been ordained to complete in word or form or color what God has started. The parents alone can provide the training for the individual, no school can do it all. Do we encourage the artist, the poet, the preacher in our children? Are we not afraid and ashamed of the things of the spirit?

Great utterances are marked by freshness and originality. I believe there is a poet born in Boston every day, but he is killed by the theatres, the schools, the life itself. Raw materials should be given to children, not the finished product. Libraries are where books are gathered and never written. Put your children in contact with nature for part at least of every year. A child with a creative spirit can get from nature the raw materials he needs. Dana wrote "Two Years Before the Mast" because he escaped from his family and Harvard and shipped as a common sailor on a two years' trip about Cape Horn. The school and college cultivate the boy's ability to hold his own, but it kills the poet and prophet in him. Let the children seek the out-of-doors; it is the original unread manuscript of God not found in libraries. We are not a happy-hearted people nor a beauty-loving people. The foreign-born love far more deeply nature and music and poetry. Let us try to give our children a greater love of beauty and truth for without vision they will perish.

Every worker bee in an apiary might have been a queen had not the normal mother been transformed by slow starvation into the abnormal worker. We, ourselves, like the bees, are putting the communistic theory into practice. We put our children into worker cells. We stimulate their lower powers so that our potential poets and prophets emerge as plodding workers and money-makers.

Those who wish to learn more of Dallas Lore Sharpe's theory of education will find three very interesting articles by him in the earlier issues of the Atlantic Monthly for the current year. Although he may have overstated the conditions as they exist in the best of our Friends' schools, his remarks certainly contain for those of us who are interested in the training of children a distinct challenge.

BOOK REVIEWS.

THE FOREIGN RELATIONS OF CHINA.*

Dr. M. Joshua Bau, who has university degrees from Yale, Columbia and Johns Hopkins, has just issued from the press a book of great importance. Dr. Bau has written this book to promote the cause of Peace, and it is very opportune that it appears at the time when the Washington Conference is dealing with the critical problems which profoundly concern the future of China. Dr. Bau is at work upon a second book which will set forth the internal conditions of China, and the two books will form an immense contribution to our knowledge of the real external and internal conditions of the most densely populated country in the world. It should be said that Dr. Bau has had to struggle along in his work without proper financial backing, and is laboring now under great difficulties. He has been compelled to purchase two hundred and fifty copies of his book in order to secure its publication, and it is hoped that Friends will help him dispose of these copies. They should be ordered directly from him, care of The China Advocate, 542 Munsey Building, Washington, D. C. Price $4.00. The book on Foreign Relations is indispensable for any one who wishes to know what China has suffered at the hands of foreign nations since contact was established with the outside world in the seventeenth century. Here is an accurate and reliable history of the concessions which China has been compelled to make to other nations, and of the policies which these same nations have carried out in their relations with this long-suffering race. The book is packed with valuable material, carefully studied and interpreted by an expert who reveals clear insight and sound judgment.

THE CHRIST-CHILD.

Once every year, at Christmas,
The Christ-child comes again,
As in the story beautiful,
Midst human sin and pain.

Wherever He finds entrance,
The sad look up and smile,
And men are strangely moved to drop
Their selfishness awhile.

O, if they but retained Him,
And proved His inward birth,
How quickly would His reign of love
Spread over all the earth!

THE WOODBROOKE SUMMER SCHOOL.

[The summer session of Woodbrooke has been noticed twice before in THE FRIEND. Our readers will be glad to have this lively account from the pen of an American participant.—Eds.]

It is customary for Woodbrooke to hold a summer meeting for Bible Study, or for the discussion of the problems of the day. These sessions answer a two-fold purpose. They help to bind Woodbrookers together and they attract others who are interested in the Woodbrooke idea. They are held in different places and in different countries, so that they reach more people than if always held at Woodbrooke.

Last summer the school was at Løstus in beautiful Hardanger, Norway. A better spot could scarcely have been selected. The management was able to secure as a home the Hordatum National Boarding High School. This school, situated high on a hill above the village, gave a commanding view of the surrounding country. In front was the wondrous scenery of the Fjord and behind rose the mountains with the beautiful shades of green foliage broken here and there by rushing mountain streams and waterfalls.

The Principal of Hordatum proved to be an ideal host. He was steeped in the history and folk lore of his country, and was never tired of lecturing to us as we visited the different places of interest which he so kindly mapped out for us daily. Norwegians do not have to be taught patriotism. Through all of Principal Mansaaker's talks ran such a burning love of country, that one grew to understand the intensity of that Viking spirit that has been woven into song and story. The foreigners, placing factories where their dusty smoke would obscure the whiteness of snowcapped peaks, were committing sacrilege. His brother, on the other hand, after having lived in America, offered such modified translations, in his capacity as interpreter, that those who understood both languages were intensely amused. To me, it was encouraging to find in this commercial age, a leading educator who preached lives without the luxuries that money can buy, rather than sacrifice natural beauty to get the money.

That they live simply in Norway is plainly to be seen on every hand. The High School itself was crudely and barely furnished. Benches without backs were used everywhere. We became adepts at hopping in and out at the dining-room tables when we took our turns at serving. The bed-room suites consisted of wooden beds which reminded me of packing-boxes on legs. They were devoid of springs; the mattresses, I think, were of burlap filled with straw, and there was one straw and one feather pillow. Each room was also supplied with a table, a chair, a stool, some bookshelves and a stove.

Community wardrobes were in the halls, as were also the stationary washbowls. Those who did not climb down the two hundred and thirty feet to the Fjord for an icy plunge in the mornings, shivered in the draughty halls as they took their ablutions ensemble. You may picture what it would be like in midwinter when we felt the cold so keenly in mid-summer. There was one bath-room, but, as firewood was expensive, hot water could only be had on specified occasions.

For these the guests had to sign up. We were very glad that the fire to heat the tank was under the bath-room, because it warmed the floor. Since the room was on the ground floor with a cement base, it was cold.

Mostly we were not warm. If it rained, and rain in this part of Norway is frequent, and we got wet, we had to wait for sunshine to dry our clothes, or else wear them until they were dried. Unless one had a special pull with the reigning queen of the kitchen, there was no place to go to dry clothes, or even get hot water. The meals were as simple as the furnishings.

Black bread, cheese and coffee or tea formed the staples for breakfast and supper. For dinner, potatoes, soup, meat, and a small portion of some green vegetable, with meat, fish and fruit or other dessert, formed the rather unvaried menu.

The thing, then, that drew and held us together for those two glorious weeks in Norway, was not physical comfort. Woodbrooke offers something higher and better and it binds its students in a marvellous way. One young man traveled for nine days to reach that summer school. He came from the north where there are no trains and where travel has to be done perforce by stages.

Woodbrooke aims to give an education for Christian service. It does this so completely that men and women go back to their own fields of work, if not as Quakers, knowing at least what Quakerism stands for. That is the keynote of the loving hold that Woodbrooke keeps over its students and old scholars. Perhaps nowhere is its spirit more keenly felt than in its devotional meetings. There, young and old take part in seasons of uplift and spiritual refreshment. One cannot but feel the atmosphere of cordiality and mutual helpfulness. It draws no false line of demarcation in regard to age. Young Friends look up to and seek advice of the older ones. Older Friends do everything that they can to draw out, help and encourage the younger ones. Woodbrooke seeks to develop initiative on the part of all. It realizes that the Society of Friends must look to the younger generation to carry on its work when those who are now bearing the burden are laid to rest.

Nor were our meetings confined to the school. Anyone was welcomed. The first First-day the villagers were invited to an afternoon meeting. They came in such numbers that the lecture-room would not hold them. The following week H. G. Wood was invited to speak at the morning service in the village church. (Through an interpreter.) This time the congregation was even larger. They came in motor boats, sail boats, rowboats, and on foot. But the big thing was that they came. The message of Christ's teachings applied to the daily dealings of man with man today, fell on eager listening ears.

H. G. Wood's message was a vital one. It dealt with the difference between the Gospel of fear, which John (the Baptist) preached and the gospel of love and forgiveness which Christ gave. I was led to contrast this meeting with another I had in mind where "plainness of dress" was the one topic alluded to. Plain dress does not make a Christian. It may in itself be a manifestation of religious conviction, for a Christian who is really working in the service of the Master will have little interest in the everchanging fashions. Spiritual change comes from within. From the one meeting I left with a sense of spiritual uplift. From the other I had a keen desire to talk with the minister. I wanted to ask him what he had given in work and hardship. Had he ministered to the wounded in ambulance duty, or spent long weary hours in hospital wards, following the call of sacrifice for the sake of suffering humanity, that so many young Friends have done, would he not have realized that true religion is manifested by the life even more than by dress?

In hundreds of homes on the other side of the water, Quakers have become idealized through the self-denying service of love rendered by Friends.

Perhaps that service has done more to further the great principles for which we stand than anything else has ever done. We have lived too much to ourselves, and it may be that we have not held our young people because we have not kept pace religiously with educational progress. In reaching out to help others we get away from narrowness and in doing so may save ourselves. Confronted by the searching questions of those unacquainted with Friends it behooves our members to be able to answer those questions and thoroughly know the ground upon which we stand. An old Frenchman after questioning me one day said: "Mademoiselle, you have the better way."

We believe that we have the best way. Then surely we should give it to the world. Our young men proved their mettle when they were willing to face jeers, imprisonment and even death itself. They have earned their right to be consulted and heard in our meetings. Yet I have known of efforts to carry on work that have been discouraged and handicapped by those who could have done so much by holding out the right hand of help and encouragement.

Our own savant, Dr. Rendel Harris, told us in his very first address his idea on the subject when he said, "We have labelled ourselves all over with tags of approval and we live by those tags and by the methods used in a former generation."

That our Norway meetings were appreciated was very clearly shown as we left. The village folk gathered on the wharf, and, as our little launch pulled away, they sang their sweet and parting song, which made it hard to keep back the tears. Then as we sped on our way not only from the wharf, but from the houses and fields, from roads and from haystacks were waved the friendly adieus. No selfish pleasure-seeking party could have touched the chord of sympathy that Dr. Harris and H. G. Wood had been able to touch. In the hushed silence of those two meetings the Divine message had been poured out even as it was of old, and it had helped to link soul to soul. Surely the Quaker message (even though losing something at the hands of an interpreter) that could touch the hearts of unknown brothers and sisters in a foreign country, is a real living message and not the dry bones of formality.

One of the biggest things that Woodbrooke is doing today is along the line of internationalism. Wars would cease if Woodbrookers were PLANTED in sufficient numbers over the globe. I say PLANTED advishly for Woodbrookers are actively growing. They try to find and meet the questions of today upon the broad lines which the Master Himself laid down. They are modest in their own estimate of themselves, but they have obtained marvellous results toward universal brotherhood. The Woodbrooke Club in Norway has five hundred members. Each one represents a focus for work in the community in which he or she lives.

The majority are teachers, but many other professions may be found in the ranks. So interested were the Norwegians in the success of the summer school, that they voluntarily contributed five hundred kroner for its support. There were between fifty and sixty of us who attended for the whole or part of the time. To have Norwegians, English, Dutch, Chinese, Swedish, Lapp and American housed under one roof in perfect harmony, certainly was a practical demonstration that people can learn to know each other in such a way as to make it possible to live in peace.

Woodbrooke is no longer in the experimental stage. Its students scattered all over Europe can testify to its efficient methods. Interchange of education should be one of the fundamentals in any scheme for better national understandings. Why does no young Friend from this side of the water use the scholarship which Woodbrooke has so kindly offered us? Would it not be possible for us to do more than we are doing in this form of service? As we have opened our schools to non-Friends, cannot we also open our houses to foreign young people who wish to come here for study. Mutual understanding would do more to further the cause of peace than anything else could do.

Time will not permit me to tell of the lectures of the summer school. Dr. Rendel Harris has discovered bits of the missing link between the time of Christ and the years that passed before the gospels were written. Certainly the Testimony Book when he publishes it will be of intense interest to all Biblical students. It goes to prove the Divinity of Christ by Jewish law. It takes up and answers the questions that the Jews were most likely to ask at that time. It does not leave to memory things that under normal circumstances should have been recorded on the spot, to be written up years after they had happened.

There have been many enquiries in regard to Dr. Harris. He was torpedoed both in going and returning from Egypt some time ago. The hardships he suffered have left him in a weakened physical condition. His wonderful grasp of the Scriptures, his chillike faith, and the indomitable spirit which took him to Norway to endure the discomforts in order that he might give his message, endeared him to all of us who did not know him before. His hair is white now, but he has the same kindly twinkle of the eye, the same friendly grasp of the hand and the same way of talking straight to his audience in an intimate and wholly unconventional way.

He, who for so many years, was the leading spirit of Woodbrooke, has lived to see his work a success, and to Dr. Harris and to Woodbrooke I feel that I owe one of the biggest inspirations of my life.

HARMLESS AS DOVES (1798).

MAUDE ROBINSON.

Some quieter days followed, only interrupted by the driving off of five young steers to furnish meat for the camp on Vinegar Hill, but to Jane's satisfaction the six dairy cows were spared. She and Biddy, the maid, were kept incessantly busy boiling great pieces from their store of home-cured bacon and baking barley bread, for constant were the demands of passers-by for food and drink. The Williams' little store of beer and mead was soon exhausted, rather to their relief, as the cool buttermilk was less likely to inflame the marauders to work further mischief.

When meeting came again, anxiety for the welfare of their dear friends, the Thompsons of Cooladine, made the family very desirous to get to meeting. The Barry family, whose horses had also been taken, came over to meeting at the mill; but Joe and Jane, being young and strong, walked the long miles to their usual place of worship. Once they were roughly told that they might go to mass, and nowhere else, as all Ireland was now of one religion; but someone who knew them interceded, and they passed on safely for the hour of worship, with their friends, who they were relieved to find, had suffered only the spoiling of their goods.

As the time of Ennischorthy Quarterly Meeting drew on, many were the conjectures if it would be possible to hold it—whether Friends from Dublin and Co. Wicklow would be allowed by the rebels to take their peaceful way through the disturbed district. Joe had quite intended to attempt to go, but he had, in the absence of his workmen, been toiling incessantly in the mill and on the farm, and a neglected blister on his heel made the long walk an impossibility.

Strange as it may seem, that Quarterly Meeting was duly held. Friends from Dublin arrived in their own carriages, and as they entered the streets of Ennischorthy had frequently to alight to drag aside from their wheels the bodies of the victims of the cruel uprising, which no one had dared to bury. They had with them the brave and spiritually-minded American minister, David Sands, who they felt had been assuredly sent for their help and strengthening at this terrible time.

The day after the meeting, a party of Friends quietly set about burying the dead, no one saying them nay. They laid in one large pit the mortal remains of their neighbors, which had been torn by swine in the very streets where they had lived as quiet and respected citizens.

David Sands, driven by a courageous young Dublin man in his own carriage, visited the families of Friends all through the disturbed district, and no one molested them. At Randall's Mill his ministry was particularly acceptable, and a poor Protestant widow who had taken refuge there spoke of him as an angel sent from Heaven in their hour of need.

From Jane Williams he heard the history of all they had suffered, and when she spoke with horror of a gun having been pointed at her brother's breast, David Sands turned to Joe with a smile. "I had a similar experience once, and thou may'st like to know that the man who held that gun, now preaches the gospel of peace as a Quaker minister."

"How could that be? Have you had a rebellion like this in America?"

"It was private greed that put us in jeopardy. Some wild young military students at West Point, when mad with drink, came to my store at night and stole all my money. They were armed, and threatened us, but the hand of the Lord restrained them, and this one, who had been decently brought up, became deeply convicted of the sinfulness of his ways, left the army, and joined Friends. Most of the dollars were returned to me also," said David Sands, and after kind farewells, he drove away on his errand of hope and mercy.

At last came the news that the King's troops had retaken Wexford, and had swept the camp on Vinegar Hill with terrible slaughter. Reprisals of the cruellest description were ruthlessly carried out. A whole street in the town of Carlow was burnt, the inhabitants, innocent and guilty, being driven back into the flames by the soldiery. Through the whole country of Wexford came the troops, treating all alike as rebels.

Joe Williams was robbed of his watch, money, and penknife, in his own fields, by two soldiers, who then followed him to his home, took the watch from his feeble old father and some money from Jane.

Shortly after, Joe was again accused of being a rebel, and a pistol held to his head, when one of the soldiers, who had been apprenticed to his uncle at Waterford, recognized him, and called to his comrade not to fire, for he knew he was a Quaker and would never have been concerned in the rebellion.

The troops were quite as ready to commandeer food and drink as the country people. One day, Jane had procured and roasted a nice loin of veal for the family dinner, when in came a party of arrogant young officers and devoured it all, and also the little store of wheat-en bread made especially for the elderly parents. Their followers made equal havoc on the bacon and barley bread in the kitchen, which had been prepared for the many refugees who were hiding in the woods and rocks and crept out at night to beg for a morsel of food.

ANNA HAINES WILL REMAIN IN THIS COUNTRY THROUGH FIRST MONTH.

Anna J. Haines, who, since her arrival in this country, has contributed greatly in many important circles toward the development of public opinion in favor of Russian famine relief, has had so many calls for her story that she has arranged to remain in this country through the present month. She will be speaking mostly under the auspices of the Russian Famine Fund, and requests for her time should be addressed to that organization at 15 Park Row, New York City.

Comments of almost superlative praise have been made upon her addresses as she has given them from Boston to Minneapolis. One instance may be cited. It is from The Continent, the leading weekly magazine of the Presbyterian Church. In speaking of the address before the Annual Meeting of the Federal Council of Churches in Chicago, The Continent says:

"Painful interest was attached to the session given over to the report of the committee on mercy and relief. Russia and Armenia are the themes of this hour. Miss Haines' immediate report of personal observation in Russia told a story of hopeless waiting for death in that vast land which has not yet been put in print anywhere in this country. The heart-wrench listening to the tale she told with studied avoidance of either picturesque or sensational elaboration seemed almost insupportable before she had finished. She said that 30,000,000 Russians are already on a ration so scant that life is a misery, and 10,000,000 of them seem certainly marked for death. Within the famine region the staple food for months has been a flour made from grass dried and pulverized, a substance from which pancakes can be made only when it is given consistency by mixing it with a glutinous product obtained by boiling hoofs from dead horses. Millions have no other food than this, and, of course, from the time of snowfall it is impossible to gather more grass."

THE New York Times declares that the Russian Relief Bill is not adequate.

The Bill appropriating $20,000,000 for the purchase of corn, seed, grain and condensed milk for the relief of the millions of starving Russians, has passed Congress and has been signed by the President, and the Government has promised that food will be moving within a week.

This sum seems so stupendous that at first thought we are led to feel that everything has been done that is needed. It seems impossible to think that $20,000,000 will not feed all the starving people there are in Russia. The sum seems so huge, so vast; but we have only to divide $20,000,000 by 15,000,000 people to understand how little, after all, the relief will be for each individual person. Would you, for instance, want to have your chances for living through this winter depend upon $1.50?

A LETTER OF GRATITUDE FROM POLAND.

Have you forgotten that there is a need in Poland? There is no doubt that Russia has overshadowed the need of all the other European countries, but it is well to stop and listen and hear the cries of the needy in other places.

The Polish Mission is helping 76 training colleges in Poland with gifts of clothing, furniture, beds, blankets and other necessities of which these colleges are painfully destitute. The following letter of gratitude needs no comment. It is a literal translation.

TO THE FRIENDS:—

The Director of the State School for Teachers, at Chelm, is in possession of your letter, and wishes to express in the name of the Administration her gratitude for the gift.

It is always difficult to accept gifts and if we are decided to accept them, it is because we see the difficulty of our present situation, and also because we feel that those who offer them are doing it out of love for humanity.

Our economic and cultural life is being very quickly built up through the intense work of our people. When that life returns to its normal state, and when we have no longer a need for your help, the memory of the good you have done will always live in the hearts of our people.

We shall never be able to pay you back, as the mighty English and American nations will never be in need of our help. But I think it will be the best reward for the work which you are doing, the work of sacrifice among ruined and oppressed countries, that you will have some day Polish Friends standing beside English and American Friends to help other nations whom the cruel hand of fate has not spared.

And through this deed our nation will be able to pay a little of its debts and at the same time co-operate with you in your work. For the importance of your work is that it teaches not only that man must help man, but that nation must help nation, and thus you have shown that there is a new future for the nations, when on their banners shall be written the watchwords of Fraternity and Co-operation.

Accept from these "strangers" from this "foreign land" the words of brotherly affection, reminding you of the great family of nations, for the establishment of which you are working so hard in Poland.

With expressions of profound esteem and reverence,

V. TYRANKIEWICZ.

A SPRING BY THE WAY.

I want to relate a little incident which has touched me very much. A short time ago my telephone rang and I found myself called up by a stranger. The person at the other end—a lady—told me that her sister had just died and that one of her last requests was that I should be asked to attend her funeral. She had said, "He does not know me nor do I know him, but I know that he does not believe in war and that he held this faith when many other Christians were preaching in favor of it. I do not want any minister to speak at my funeral who preached in favor of it. I want some one who followed Christ's way of love."

I went to the funeral and spoke the words of comfort which I felt upon my heart to say. A few days later I received a letter from the sister asking me to let her know what my fee was, that she might send me a check for the amount. I quite naturally replied that I desired no fee and could not accept one, as the simple service which I had rendered had been given in love and sympathy and for no other reason.

A few days ago I received in the same handwriting a check for five hundred dollars, "to be used for the relief of little children who are suffering in Russia." It was likewise a gift of love and sympathy.

RUFUS M. JONES.

The following item from The American Friend will bear repeating:—

Fascinatingly interesting and illuminating are the running comments on men and events by the great American preacher, J. Fort Newton, who occupied the pulpit of the City Temple of London during the last two years of the war, the comments being given in his diary covering that period, which is published in the "August and September" numbers of The Atlantic Monthly. Friends will be particularly interested in his reference to a sojourn at York, in which he speaks of his visit "to the grave of John Woolman, the Quaker, a brief biography of whom I had once written." "Reverently we stood by the grave of that simple man—daringly radical, but Divinely gentle—who was the incarnation of the spirit of Christ, and whose life of love and service, of pity and prayer, made him a kind of sad St. Francis of the new world." Continuing, he writes: "York is a stronghold of the Society of Friends—the noblest body of organized mysticism on earth. Aye, the war is making men either skeptics or mystics, and wisdom lies, methinks, with the mystics."

HORACE BUSHNELL says: "I fell into the habit of talking with God on every occasion. I talk myself asleep at night, and open the morning talking with Him;" and Jeremy Taylor describes his praying as "making frequent colloquies and short discouragements between God and his own soul;" and Sir Thomas Browne, the famous physician, says: "I have resolved to pray more and to pray always, to pray in all places where quietness inviteth, in the house, on the highway, and on the street; and to know no street or passage in this city that may not witness that I have not forgotten God."

VIII.

The fifth plenary session of the Conference and its settlement of the submarine and other naval questions, which has been anxiously awaited during the past ten days, has not yet been held. The British proposition of last week to abolish submarines for both offensive and defensive war was promptly followed by a demand from France to be permitted to build 90,000 tons of submarines, and by a proposition from the United States to restrict the submarine tonnage of Great Britain and the United States to 60,000 each, and of France, Japan and Italy to 31,500, 31,500 and 21,150, respectively. Japan and Italy were ready to accept this proposal, approximately; but the French delegation referred it to the French Cabinet, which insisted on its original demand of 90,000 tons, or at the least on an equality with Great Britain and the United States. Since this would be greatly in excess, for submarines and other auxiliary craft, of the ratio agreed upon for capital ships, Great Britain and the United States would not yield to the French demand, and Italy too was wholly adverse to accepting either naval inferiority to France or the necessity of increasing greatly its own submarine and other auxiliary tonnage. Italian spokesmen said that they were willing to cut their submarine preparedness down to a single torpedo, but as a Mediterranean power their country deemed it necessary to maintain equality with France.

Thus the Conference was face to face with a grave crisis, and was obliged to choose between the alternative of adopting an agreement which would leave France in isolation, or of deferring the whole question of submarines and other auxiliary craft to a future conference. It was the latter alternative which France naturally desired; for, having failed to secure an American guarantee against Germany, by refusing to reduce and limit her armies, she has left no stone unturned to secure a British guarantee against Germany, and has put forward, first her capital ship, and then her submarine demands, hoping to secure by their surrender either a British naval alliance or another Conference in which the supreme French demand for an anti-Germany alliance might have a better chance of being granted than in this Conference at Washington.

During the animated debate in the Conference over the question of submarines, two British spokesmen, Lord Lee, the first lord of the admiralty, and Arthur J. Balfour, the head of the delegation, presented a powerful argument and appeal against all submarine warfare which have made a profound impression upon American public opinion and, through it, upon the American government. In response to this two-fold pressure, the United States has not yielded entirely to the British proposal, but it has cut down its original limit on submarine tonnage from 90,000 to 60,000, and has proposed drastic rules for the curbing of these "demons of the sea."

The British argument and appeal are to be repeated in extenso at the next plenary session of the Conference, the British spokesmen say; and this will greatly strengthen the campaign of publicity and education which is being carried on. The Advisory Committee of the American Delegation reported, prematurely, that the American public favored the retention of submarines for defensive war; but the National Council on the Limitation of Armaments, under Frederick J. Libby's energetic guidance, is endeavoring to convince the Advisory Committee that it was mistaken in this judgment. Numerous evidences have come through my hand to show that Friends, individually and in their corporate capacity, are taking an active part in the campaign of education against preparations for submarine warfare. This campaign will be necessary for some years to come; for the French are insisting on their right to build a great submarine fleet and America and other powers have not yet been entirely converted to a belief in the futility and wickedness of submarine warfare. The Washington Conference has therefore come most regretfully to the conclusion that a drastic reduction and limitation in submarine building is not possible at this time, and will probably refer the question to a future Conference to be held at the expiration of, say, seven years.

The British are emphasizing the competition which will doubtless set in meanwhile between submarines and an infinite variety and number of anti-submarine devices. The pecuniary cost of this competition, they are glad to admit, will be far less than that between capital ships, and, they are glad to reflect, will be less for them than for any other country. This latter fact is due to the very large number of steel-built, steam-propelled trawlers and other craft which are engaged in the British fisheries, and which can be equipped with anti-submarine devices. Far worse than the expense of this competition, of course, is the atmosphere of suspicion and hostility which it will increase between France and Great Britain and, to a less extent, between other countries as well.

To mitigate in some degree, this deplorable condition, the Conference is working today over proposals made by Secretary Hughes for the curbing of submarine activities when engaged in actual warfare, and for the limitation of the size of auxiliary warships to a maximum of 10,000 tons' displacement, of capital ship guns to 16-inch calibre, of auxiliary ship guns to 8-inch calibre, of airplane carriers to a maximum for each of 27,000 tons' displacement, of airplane carrier guns to 8-inch calibre, and of total airplane carrier tonnage to 80,000, 80,000, 48,000, 28,000 and 28,000 for Great Britain, the United States, Japan, France and Italy, respectively.

If these proposals are adopted, there will be at least some reduction and limitation on auxiliary battleships, airplane carriers and submarine activities. But the outstanding achievement of the Washington Conference, as far as checking preparations for war is concerned, is the great blow struck at dreadnaughts and superdreadnaughts. Other instruments of naval warfare, air warfare, chemical warfare, economic warfare and land armaments, still stand like mountains in our path. Fortunately, we have set our faces resolutely towards them, "the first great step" has been taken, and if we proceed steadily on our journey, "sustained by faith and matchless fortitude," we will find these mountains also dwindling into mole-hills and will leave them too behind us in the great upward march of civilization and Christianity.

In welcoming the New Year, shall we not all turn over another new leaf and write upon it continued devotion and redoubled effort in behalf of the Great Cause of our time?

WASHINGTON, D. C., Twelfth Month 29, 1921.

"THE great dividing line, it appears to me, is that which marks off all those who hold that the relation of Jesus to God—however they describe or formulate it—is of such a kind that it could not be repeated in any other individual—that to speak in fact of its being repeated in any other individual is a contradiction in terms, since any individual standing in that relation to God would be Jesus, and that Jesus, in virtue of this relation, has the same absolute claim upon all men's worship and loyalty as belongs to God. A persuasion of this sort of uniqueness attaching to Jesus seems to me the essential characteristic of what has actually in the field of human history been Christianity."—EDWYN BEVAN, in "Hellenism and Christianity."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

Dr. Tatsunosuke Ueda, the gifted Japanese Friend, from whose letters to Edward C. Wood we published extracts early in the autumn, continues to write most entertainingly from London. His shrewd comments on England, the English people and especially English Friends, comparing his impressions of those gained during his years in Philadelphia, are of unusual interest to those whose privilege it has been to share them, though the letters are rather too personal for publication. He describes visits to the home of the Cheal family, well-known Friends and horticulturists, to Frederick B. Meyer, minister emeritus of Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, and to other famous persons and places. One letter says: "As soon as I finish this I am going to meet a gentleman from my own country—a high official in the Japanese Government, who some day will occupy the portfolio of the Minister of Education in Japan. He and his friends want me to lecture to them upon Quakerism. I am glad of this God-sent opportunity to impress upon him the spiritual need of young men and women who study at schools and colleges. Education without spiritual foundation is null and void — this is the message I wish to convey to him, with reference to the aspirations of a true Quaker."

We are indebted to C. E. Wright for this item in regard to Pittsburgh Friends:—

The members of the Quaker Round Table were privileged to hear Anna Haines at a special meeting on the evening of the 10th instant, and listened with interest to her graphic description of life (and death) in Russia. She spoke also at various other and larger gatherings in and about Pittsburgh.

The Round Table met at the home of Carol Tomlinson, in Swissvale, on the 17th instant. The resignation of Carol Tomlinson as Treasurer was accepted with regret, as he and his family are soon to move to Philadelphia. R. A. Smith and Harriet Eck gave interesting accounts of the rise of non-conformists in England, and of the early Quaker preachers and their message.

The Friend (London) reports that Elizabeth Rotten of Germany and Carolina Wood of Mt. Kisco, N. Y., were at the Meeting for Sufferings on the second of Twelfth Month. Both spoke briefly. E. Rotten said: "We want a demonstration of Quaker spirit and principles after the relief work is ended." Carolina Wood, after saying, "Friends were standing for a great deal in Germany," recited this instance: "A child connected with the Frankfurt office had seen a little boy very nearly run over in the street, but said the child, 'A Quaker saved him and it was all right.' But how do you know it was a Quaker? 'Why, of course it was a Quaker: they are the people who take care of little children,' was the answer."

THE constant demand for "Friendly" stories for children means a sure welcome for the new volume of stories by Maude Robinson, "Nicholas the Weaver," which is now going through the printer's hands. Like her previous book, "The Time of Her Life," the tales centre round Quaker personalities, and show up the romance and adventure in homely lives in days gone by.

READINGS FROM ENGLISH POETS

I am proposing to give eight readings from English poets at the Arch Street Centre, Room 1, during the winter months. The purpose of the readings will be to bring home to the hearers the beauty of poetry; to recall to them the invigorating ideas that underlie all great poetry; to offer, in these days of hurried living, a few quiet hours of the company of writers who have permanently enriched the literary and spiritual treasures of humanity. No effort will be made to be learned or original. Most of each lecture will be devoted to reading poetry; such comment as is made will be confined to historical and biographical matters and to the introductory background that seems essential to the understanding of the poems. The readings, if successful, will sustain courage rather than add to the stock of information. Sincere effort will be made to refrain from the maudlin sentimentality that always haunts interpretations of poetry.

The following prophets will speak in due order: John Milton, William Cowper, William Wordsworth, John Keats, Robert Browning (twice), Matthew Arnold, Alfred Tennyson. No, I do not think that poetry died with Tennyson.

The readings will come on successive six-days from 4.00 to 5.00 P. M., from the thirteenth of First Month to the third of Third Month, inclusive. A charge of $2.50 will be made for the course. Tickets, good for any person, may be had by writing to the undersigned. Admission to a single lecture will be fifty cents. As few as six, and as many as fifty, persons will constitute a good audience. Please tell your friends about it.

WE often send out slit samples of Tannate Round Belting, like that shown in our trade-mark. Pulling on one of these gives a better idea of Tannate toughness than any words can do.

In this connection, a salesman tells a story like this: He handed a slit sample to the "boss," who tried it, and then turned to a big colored helper just entering.

"Here, Jim, you've got plenty of muscle, pull this apart."

"No, yo' don't! I got caught on dat befo". Can't nobody pull dat open. I know what dat is, dat's Tannate."

Tannate is tough—in Round Belt, in Flat Belt, in Tannate Lace.

CARE IN INSURANCE

The Provident was founded in 1865 by a group of Friends for the purpose of protecting the estates and insuring the lives of members of the Society of Friends.

Later the services of this Company were offered to other people who were known to be of careful habits. A careful company insures only those people who are good moral as well as healthful. This results in a low death-rate, which is one of the elements of low cost of insurance.

Care is important—in insurance as well as in other things

THE FATAL THIRD.

We are indebted to our friend, Walter Penn Shipley, for the following clipping. It is taken, we understand, from one of the responsible financial journals. We welcome it especially, because it fits in so well with some considerations to which the above seems a suggestive if not accurate caption.

Chewing gum, candy and other minor luxuries take more from the pockets of the American people than the entire governmental expenditures for the army and navy. Against $418,000,000 spent for the army last year, the country consumed $750,000,000 of candy and chewing gum, spent $834,000,000 for soda and other confections, and $959,000,000 for perfume, jewelry, silk stockings and other articles of personal adornment. Smokers spent $1,151,000,000 for tobacco in various forms, while baseball fans, theatre-goers, cabaret-frequenter and those attending concerts paid $897,000,000 for their entertainment.

The comparison in this excerpt of the vast expenditure for "minor luxuries" to the sum of the "army and navy bill," is what particularly arrests the attention. Instead, however, of being impressed with any contrast in the figures the point of telling moment to some would be that both these items of expenditure belong in one class. In the final analysis war and luxury are first cousins. The late Caroline Stephen in Quaker Strongholds failed to satisfy Friends that she accepted the Quaker view of war. In substance what she said was that the stock arguments used against war even by Friends, did not fully convince her, as much as her nature revolted from the barbarities of warfare. Like many others she found it difficult to accept a mere negative presentation of a subject. She must grasp her convictions positively. Years after Quaker Strongholds had become a classic, she was led into a careful analysis of luxury and wrote an essay on War and Luxury that indicts not only the military profession, but also the spirit in many professing non-militarists. She was able to show that insensibly this spirit contributes to the anachronism of war. That spirit was defined by John Woolman as the spirit of oppression.

He discovered it—Caroline Stephen re-discovered it, in Luxury. The cold logic to them and to many, fortunately, in this day is that the axe must be laid at the root of this spirit of oppression on which warfare lives, if the evil is to be actually uprooted.

We have applied the term "the fatal third" to the astronomical figures that result from the aggregate of the outlay for war and for luxury. In the list furnished by our friend it appears that only "minor luxuries" in our own country are included. So great would be the whole world-bill, if every item properly belonging to it were put in array, that we may well believe that it would amount to a third of the annual expenditure of the billion or more people in the present estimate of world population. Is it not indeed a fatal outlay for them? Fatal we mean in the sense of being at once futile and harmful. In any event the outlay for war is destructive. The economic aspects of this waste have put the world of business the past year in dire extremity. But is not the luxury expenditure often more than waste? It very generally saps physical, intellectual, moral strength. It spells decadence and makes prophets like Arthur Balfour (see his essay on Decadence) and Dean Inge cry aloud in warning tones of modern Jeremiahs. Of course the cry is largely unheeded. One actually wonders in the face of such heedlessness, whether calamity is a necessary instrument of national salvation. It worked as such again and again in Old Testament times, and the world may not have advanced beyond that necessity yet.

There is, however, still another side to this great aggregate expenditure for war, and for that part of luxury that actually contains the seeds of oppression. The attempt to think in world terms and especially to indulge in world statistics is so new, that one needs to be cautious in using the figures even of professional economists. It may be no better than a guess, but it is soberly stated in some quarters that about one-third of the population of the world to-day, in face of war conditions and of famine, is underfed in body or in mind or in both. There can be no question that the aggregate number is appalling. It makes a background to our abundance in America that ought to arrest the sober attention of every one. It may be easy to challenge the figures in either case—we trust the aggregate is much less than is represented. Be that as it may, the two groups of facts, the military and luxury expenditure, surely shame the good feeling and the intelligence of the twentieth century. Vast sums of money are spent for destructive purposes, and for indulgence that tends directly to destruction! Vast numbers of people are hungry and forlorn, who could be lifted out of this deplorable condition by the sum of that expenditure! Cannot enough intelligence be marshalled in world conference or in the leadership of some really good Samaritan government, speedily to end such an anomaly? What if the present Conference at Washington were to address itself to this positive note? The transition is not so difficult as might appear. Warships might be loaded with grain for the famine districts; soldiers very often have been almoners of good. If this positive side of peace-making were rightly put to the imagination of a war-weary world we feel sure there are incalculable possibilities for practical development.

And what is the alternative if this is not done? Is it not the painful process of agitation—revolution, and again revolution, the barely recognized “step by step” of the poet toward the “Golden Year?” This slow process will go on, does go on. We must be blind to the lessons of history and of life if we cannot see “the steady gain of man.” But Christianity has power greatly to accelerate this progress. It can make the same change in direction for nations as for individuals. In other words, it can convert the world,—convert it in the sense of turning it toward the light. That usually does not at once eliminate every item of evil from one’s life. It starts one in the direction of right. Our habits of thought, the manner of our acts, even our tempers and temperaments change by degrees as we live in the light. Let us courageously believe that nations can thus “face about.” Our believing it has something to do in the Divine economy with bringing it to pass.

A recent book from the pen of a famous German has the title “In Days to Come.”* It is his vision of the social evolution by which the destructive and harmful elements of national and human life are to be transformed into universal well-being, the very problem indeed involved in eliminating the two groups of facts noted above. But Christianity is infinite in power as a social force. It does all and much more than social evolution and does it much more quickly. The golden rule is said to contain the best political economy in the world. And we stand helplessly by and hardly catch the faraway whisper—“Oh ye of little faith.”

BOOK REVIEWS.

“THE QUAKERS: THEIR STORY AND MESSAGE.”†

A. Neave Brayshaw’s book has more than once been mentioned in these columns, but we feel it could hardly be called too frequently to the attention of our readers.

It is an astonishing little volume. We have all known of houses “so much larger inside than out.” This is precisely the impression one gets from this book; when one has completed the reading of its 148 pages one is amazed that so much could ever have been told in so small compass.

Nowhere is there anything suggestive of the “compendium.” Nowhere is one conscious of condensation or of matter closely packed in the way common to nearly all books which aim to give much in little. The whole period is covered, from before the birth of George Fox down to the great London Conference of 1920—and after; three centuries in all, yet not once is there the slightest sensation of being hurried along. There is always time for happy anecdote and pithy, leisurely comment, illuminating detail, and shrewd, whimsical observation. Of course, the secret lies in an almost incredible skill in determining just what shall go in and what shall be left out. What does go in is treated amply and with leisure.

The “Rowntree History,” in its seven great volumes, is monumental. Yet it is safe to say that there is scarcely a phase developed in those, approximately, 3500 pages, which is not somehow touched on in this little work, not one-twentieth so large.

* “In Days to Come,” Walther Rathenau.

† Published by Robert Davis, Harrogate, for the 1905 Committee of Yorkshire Quarterly Meeting of Friends, 1921. To be had at Friends’ Book Store, 302 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

And many, who would gladly own and assimilate the great history, will be able to find neither the money for the first nor the time for the second. For these Neave Brayshaw’s book is invaluable, as indeed for all others; for a handbook such as this is of use to even the profoundest scholars.

The Table of Contents, with its analysis of the four chapters, is illuminating:

I. The century preceding George Fox; early life of Fox and rise of the Society of Friends; the early messengers and the bond of fellowship; the central teaching and its bearing on worship, truthfulness and war; persecution; organization.

II. The eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries; quietism and seclusion; training as pioneers; the inner history of the Society; anti-slavery trade and other philanthropic activity; social and family life.

III. The nineteenth and early twentieth centuries; emergence into the wider world; historical sketch of Quaker ministry; effect on Quakerism of the Evangelical and Methodist movement; the Beacon separation; the evangelical period; foreign and home missions; adult and junior Sunday Schools; change of outlook in scientific and religious thought; the Manchester Conference; concern for religious teaching; philanthropic activity and examination of the causes of social evils.

IV. Service during the war of 1914-1918 and after, Friends’ Ambulance Unit; War Victims’ Relief Committee; Emergency Committee; conscientious objectors to military service; All-Friends’ Conference, 1920; the relation of the ‘Peace Testimony’ to other parts of life; the message of Quakerism.

It will be seen from this that the book is written from a very definitely English point of view; indeed, were an American asked to criticise and suggest, one would ask whether a second edition might not be made even more valuable by being inclusive of Quakerism in America and other parts of the world. This could quite conceivably be accomplished by a deft touch here and there which would probably add less than a score of pages to the book. But while there have been separations in this country that London Yearly Meeting has been able to avoid, the same problems have presented there as here, the same varying types of Friends exist, and it is astonishing how parallel has been the development of Quakerism in England and here, despite the three thousand miles of ocean that separate us. So that the fact that this book was written by an Englishman about English Quakerism makes it really scarcely one whit less important for Americans or Canadians or Australians.

One of the finest passages of the book is to be found in Chapter III, being the ten pages entitled in the Table of Contents “Historical Sketch of Quaker Ministry.” Space forbids quoting it in toto, and to quote in part would be to garble it, and might lead to misconstructions of Neave Brayshaw’s position. Those who know his “Life that is Life Indeed,” first published ten years ago (I shall always be grateful to Thomas Davidson of Fritchley, who first brought it to my attention.) will be sure that his views are sane and sound on this subject. He deplores the “excess of fear,” as distinct from a holy sense of responsibility, which has so frequently accompanied a call to the ministry, and the “embarrassment” which is so often felt in mentioning the subject or discussing it.

“In all this [he says] we see the concern of the true minister that his life shall commend his words; but Quakerism has suffered from an over-cautiousness, slipping at times into lethargy and even into excuse for drawing back from service. A genuine desire for correspondence between life and ministry will be more concerned with elevation of the former than with suspicion of the latter. Unworthy the preacher may feel himself to be (in fact, what preacher does not?); grieved at his inconsistency in his falling short of the ideal which, having seen, he sets forth; and strong (and not always unwelcome) is the temptation to withhold his offering under plea of avoidance of hypocrisy. Nevertheless, it is an abuse of language to call “hypocrite” the preacher, or any other, who, notwithstanding failure, is honestly set in the right way, pressing toward the goal even though he cannot count himself to have attained. Inconsistency is not the same as hypocrisy."

The brief sentence from George Fox, appearing on the title-page, characterises, I feel, the whole spirit of the book and its author: "Always feel a growing in the power of the Lord God that is universal and everlasting."

GEORGE LLOYD HODGKIN.

I have just been reading the beautiful story of a beautiful life—"The Life and Letters of George Hodgkin" (1880-1918) edited by his gifted sister, L. Violet Hodgkin. His life, his ideals and his Quaker faith were formed and shaped under the immediate influence of two of the most remarkable Friends of the nineteenth century—that of his father, Dr. Thomas Hodgkin, and the famous "Nun" of Cambridge, Caroline Stephen. He visited America in 1912 as a representative of the English Young Friends and he attended the Five Years' Meeting of that date, followed by a memorable tour of the Friends' colleges of the eastern and middle western States. This American visit had been preceded in 1908-09 by a still more important one, in company with his parents and his sister, to Australia and New Zealand. This journey left an ineffaceable trace upon his life and prepared him for the part he was to take in the great test of 1914-1918.

In 1912, George was married to Mary, the daughter of Henry Lloyd Wilson, and the couple settled in a simple little home of joy and radiance at Banbury. The story of George's pacifism is one of the most interesting Quaker cases which the war called forth, and in the story of it one sees vividly what "absolutism" meant. Finally, the door opened for a real service in which George felt free to engage. This service took him into Russia, Persia and Armenia in 1916 and on a second eastern journey for the purpose of carrying medical relief through Bagdad into southern Russia and Armenia in 1918. He died in the hospital at Bagdad Sixth Month 24, 1918, at the age of thirty-seven. The book contains extracts from his Letters and Diaries and a few short papers and fragments giving his written thoughts. It is a good book for young Friends in America to read and to meditate upon, and it should come to many as a fresh inspiration to be faithful to vision, light and leading.

RUFUS M. JONES.

THE INCARNATION AND THE INWARD LIGHT.

The Christian Church is intended to be the pillar and ground of a twofold truth; the fact of the divine Incarnation and of the divine Immanence. These two great truths are intimately connected, and no end of confusion has been caused in many minds by pitting the one against the other, as if they were mutually exclusive, instead of being, as they are, complementary to each other. And it certainly is not without significance that the chief exponent of the divine Immanence should have been the great apostle of the Incarnation also. I refer, of course, to the writer of the fourth Gospel, the disciple who was able to look deeper into the mystery of the coming of God in our nature than any other of the apostolic band.

The Incarnation was in the mind of God from the beginning. The revelation of God made to the nation of Israel, with the accompanying teaching of man's relation to God, prepared the way for the truth of the Incarnation, i. e., God-manifest in human nature. God taught the Jewish people by their unique history that their nationality, recognized by God as His "son," should one day be summed up and represented by one wonderful personality, who should crown her history and bring in the kingdom of God.

Israel witnessed to the divine origin of humanity on the very first page of her sacred writings, and through her long and checkered career uttered the instinctive cry of humanity, as no other people has ever done, for the coming of a Deliverer, who would be both divine and human.

The ancient Scriptures declare that Man stands at the head of creation, being made in the image of God, so that there is nothing inherently inconceivable in the union of God and Man. In the earliest Gospel story we have a life presented more perfect than the mind of man ever could have conceived, of which our deepest instincts must confess that it is the most God-like thing that has ever been seen; a life of inscrutable mystery, unless we regard it in the light of the explanation which its eye-witnesses gave of it—namely, that it was the invisible God breaking forth into visibility in the terms of a human life.

How glorious must be the ultimate destiny of our race if the Incarnation be indeed a fact of history! We can never get back where the world was before this new chapter was opened. Through Christ human nature has been dignified. He took it not only to the cross as an oblation of sacrificial love and obedience to the will of God, but He also took it through the gates of death into resurrection life and victory. He has taken it to the very throne of God.

The Incarnation has made the whole of life sacred. Service, however menial, becomes glorious, and the meanest specimen of humanity is now "a brother for whom Christ died."

But the truth of the divine Immanence is the necessary corollary of this glorious fact. The Gospel message takes up the ancient Hebrew conception of the creative and all-enlightening "Wisdom," and says Christ is that Wisdom incarnate. It takes up the Greek conception of the all-informing "Logos," or Reason, and says, what men have more or less dimly felt in themselves to be a voice more reliable than their noisy passions and fleshly desires, is now embodied in the pure and unselfish humanity of the Christ. It can take up the "inner light" philosophy of ancient India, and by making it to be the insining of the living, and glorified Son of God, who has fought man's battle and has come off victorious; who has grappled with the threefold problem of sin, sorrow and death, as a Man, and for Man; and who can make it by His spiritual appearing good in man also; change a cold and inoperative philosophy into a world-conquering Gospel, bringing healing to the nations.

The Light to which the Church of Christ is called to bear witness; to which her ministers must turn all men everywhere is not a mere quality of human nature. It is Christ Himself in His inward and spiritual manifestation. It is no mere philosophical speculation or mystic dream. It is the secret of repentance, for it shows us our hidden sins. It is the secret of faith, for it opens up to the penitent the glory of the Person and work of the Redeemer. It is the secret of regeneration, and of resultant holiness of heart and life, for it is the seed of the kingdom, powerful in every one who welcomes it as a little child: a kingdom of righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. And all who are "children of the light" are led by it in the footsteps of Jesus, in the way where they learn to deny themselves, and to learn of Him, the meek and lowly in heart.

"That was the true Light," says John, and by that he also declares that every other supposed light is a counterfeit.

M. I. R.

"We cannot save the people unless we teach them, and we cannot teach them unless we reach them," and we cannot reach them unless we go after them!

Again: "How shall they hear without a preacher? and how shall they preach except they be sent?"

But, if we are sent, let us be tremendously quick to obey!

WM. C. ALLEN.

Ask a monk like Brother Lawrence what praying means to him, and he answers, "That we should establish ourselves in a sense of God's presence, by continually conversing with Him;" and ask the question of so different a man as Carlyle, and the reply springs from the same idea, "Prayer is the aspiration of our poor, struggling, heavy-laden soul toward its Eternal Father, and with or without words, ought not to become impossible, nor, I persuade myself, need it ever."—From "The Religion of Fellowship."

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS OF WILLIAM BACON EVANS, RAS-EL-METN, SYRIA.

Kindly selected by Mary Harlan Rhoads.

We live in a four hundred-year-old castle (with three to four-foot walls) overlooking the rest of the village, which stands upon a "hog-back" between two deep gorges. Life conditions here retain a good deal of the old elements. Daniel Oliver receives callers not only from this village, but judges, princes, and high "muc-a-mucs" from other places come also—some stay to meals; others have their little cups of coffee and depart.

With regard to the care of the orphans, if it is right to judge by their bright, healthy faces, the rather primitive arrangements are highly successful. They (the seventy boys) sleep in three rooms—their mats covering the floors about as thickly as they can lie. By day, the mats are rolled to one side (or put out to sun) and said rooms become school-rooms, with nothing but the simplest of furnishings—some benches and blackboards.

All three rooms have light and windows on both sides—the old castle stands on an eighty-foot hill—and the hill is three thousand feet above the sea—so that we have good air and exposure.

The boys' dining-room is an arched vault opening to the south. The protection from cold wind or damp air is furnished by a gate of iron bars. The stone walls of the room have been whitewashed and we hope to do it again. The boys sit on benches, with a higher bench opposite for a table. They file in, stand while they repeat a little Arabic prayer, drop to their places, and begin functioning immediately at the "Amen." Pièce de resistance is commonly a round Arabic loaf with upper and under layer, the whole not over one-quarter of an inch thick and about eight inches in diameter.

If one wants a bit of work done, they jump and seem very glad to come, and generally they do their work quite well. When not in school, they usually play on the open space to the south and east of their quarters, . . . the ground falls away rapidly in terraces, and one has to be careful not to tumble over!

"Marbles" is a favorite game just now and there are often lively discussions in Arabic (of course) about disputed points. In clear weather they have always before them a magnificent view of rocky gorge and snow-clad mountain with green pines and blue sea "thrown in!"

There is also "the pass" on the road some sixty feet below, where one may see young men galloping on Arab horses, or occasionally a few laden camels, but more often donkeys or mules, with richly decorated harness and tinkling bells. Automobiles, which come occasionally, are still objects of much curiosity. Some of the boys have soft balls and enjoy playing catch. The boys also watch the chickens to see that no jackal or fox creeps up to carry away a dinner for himself.

Many of the older boys have picked up enough English to understand what one wants and some of them speak quite well in that tongue. They still enjoy football. They understand the rules pretty nearly and call "out!" when the ball passes the bounds.

The older boys come to "Meeting," held on First-day in a small building in the village below. They seem to pay close attention when anyone is speaking. The smaller boys and girls attend a "Meeting" in the "seriah" or castle which Emily Oliver attends. Here the children sit on matting on the floor.

There are now (Tenth Month 31, 1921) five teachers and they have large classes, for day-scholars are now also admitted. The orphanage children of course pay nothing, as they have nothing, but day-scholars are charged ten Egyptian pounds, about forty dollars a year, which helps with the teachers' salaries.

The thirty girls are housed in a separate home one-eighth of a mile away, with two native women. All drinking water is carried, generally on the horse, from the spring near the Girls' School. Rain water is collected from the roofs here for washing purposes in great underground cisterns, one of which used to be a dungeon. The present "laundry-room" is part of a former Maronite (or Roman Catholic) chapel.

The people here are generally of dark complexion. Some of the older men are in long "Biblical" robes, others with baggy trousers (almost skirts) and some in European dress. Some of the women are handsome, but want of care of teeth and too much want and care of other kinds (with hard work) makes the young women look prematurely old.

From the "seriah," as the old castle is called, one descends a crooked, steep path or succession of steps, past dwellings on different levels, some occupied and some in ruins till the "one street" is reached. It is very narrow and winding, ill-paved, muddy in places. Little asses or sheep may be seen tied at house-doors—more rarely, lordly looking camels with their burdens.

Five minutes' walk and the rug factory is reached by a narrow side street. The house is red-tiled, of Italian style and quite roomy. The inside or smaller room has fine broad windows toward the south and here are the two Armenians in the red tarboosh or fez. And Druse girls with blue-white veils, sit on little cushions on the stone floor, two girls at a loom. Women have been furnished with wool which they spin at home into the yarn, which, after being dyed by the Armenians, is made into rugs.

A motherly woman named Mariam oversees the girls' work. Fortunately for me she speaks English. The Druse girls wear white veils which fall below the waist. It is quite important to cover the hair, otherwise they are not particular about the veil when working. For the most part they are of the impulsive lot, of Italian-volcanic temper, but soon over it. Many of them have been cheated of school by the war. So far, way has not opened to supplement this need, except by the discipline and experience which their work affords. We have hung some pictures and have a few books about. At the recess times (fifteen minutes) morning and afternoon, we try to have some game for the little girls, generally tossing the "football" from hand to hand, into which play they enter almost too vigorously.

Now (Seventh Month 24, 1921) we have finished about fifty-three rugs, large and small. The carpets have warp and woof of cotton, with the wool tied on stitch by stitch. The smallest are 2½ by 4 feet, and the largest 5½ by 7½ feet. The designs are either creations of the Armenian teachers or copies of rugs we like.

(NOTE.—At the latest word from Ras, the rug factory was still closed owing to lack of funds, only the orphanages being kept open.—M. H. R.)

The present government in Syria is military. Complaints are heard from many quarters and the Oliviers lost heavily in purchased supplies which disappeared in transit between Philadelphia and Ras.

As regards our currency, it is practically all paper, either Egyptian or Syrian. The Syrian is the legalized money, but the Egyptian, owing to its greater stability, is commonly used to found prices which are then translated into Syrian, whatever the current rate. This varies from time to time, the Syrian pound having been as low as 33½, and as high as 42. Small change is difficult to get up here, and in paying the carpet-factory workers we commonly have to group three or four together and hand over the note to one of them, to divide as best they may!

"PRAY for a greater spirit of hopefulness. I think a bigger ideal of what our country stands for is the thing to ask for. And then the element of hope and restfulness and eagerness to work will follow."—GEORGE LLOYD HODGKIN.

"If the Christian Church wants to convince the world of the supreme value of its ideal of love, it can only do so by steadily confronting the world with the actual thing."—EDWYN BEVAN, in "Hellenism and Christianity."

ASLEEP.

We are asleep—sleep! The bright hours stream away;

The vineyard fruits grow overripe and fall;

The rich grain wastes and shatters day by day;

Yet listless hands hang down; and over all,

A dense and heavy atmosphere of sleep

Hangs still and deep.

We are asleep—sleep! Forgotten is the guest.

Forgotten is the zeal with which we went

Alert and free, to give our very best,—

The joy with which our primal strength was spent.

And so we sit and drowse and sleep and dream,

Nor see the gleam.

Nor see the gleam—the golden gleam that shone

With such compelling fervor that it drew

Strong men and earnest women out alone,

And eager little children, not a few,

To strive and toil and serve, and follow still

The Heavenly will.

Still glows the gleam, still sounds the trumpet call,

Still cries the need for earnest workers strong;

But sleep has dimmed our eyes, and over all,

The dreamy hush hangs dense and deep and long.

Sometimes we stir and murmur, "we must rouse,"

And still we drowse.

O, leave us not to dream our lives away!

O, flash Thy burning beacon in our eyes!

Thunder a booming call to us this day,

That shall compel us to awake and rise!

O, snatch us from our sleep at any cost,

Or we are lost!

LETTER TO HADDONFIELD AND SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING.

HOTEL VENDOME, San José, Calif.,
Eleventh Month 30, 1921.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

We desire to tell you how much we appreciated the Quarterly Meeting Messenger. We are so far away from the activities of our Friends that such information as it contains is most interesting to us.

The subject of amusements is agitating many of the sober people of the other denominations. The need of the hour is a higher concept of our spiritual obligations to Jesus Christ. It is distinctly affirmed, and facts are produced supporting such affirmations, that dancing and some other amusements wound the spiritual life, loosen the ties to the Christian religion, and tend to lead others than ourselves into associations that damage their own souls and the moral status of the community. I would have our members seriously to reflect on the effect of their example to others. These are days when, as patriots and Christians, there is need that we sometimes forgo our own pleasures and follow a course that will lead toward a stronger National life. The way will at times seem lonely, the difficulties not a few but personal peace will attend it. We are never sorry, when past actions have been reviewed, because we "have endured the cross and despised the shame." It pays!

We were also much interested in the report regarding membership. Probably my wife and I have seen as many sorts of Friends, in many lands, as others. We have been observing the practical results of attempts to substitute associate or other forms of membership for birthright membership and observe that, unless there is an exceedingly live overship, the results are not favorable. Again, there is no substitute for the new birth into the Kingdom of God which a birthright membership must know; nor can we deputize to others the ministry, the zeal, the exercise of courage which an hereditary communion rightfully demands of us. We are living in an heroic age—every quality of the Christian hero is required of us, now is the time to give up all for our Saviour, now is the time to strike fire!

In southern California we recently were glad to meet with our dear young friend, Richard R. Wood. He reminded us of his grandfather, that ideal of a Christian and business gentleman, the late Alexander C. Wood. We are pleased to know that Anna J. Haines is again with you and her family. We follow her with our thoughts and prayers.

We have been very busy in connection with peace work on the Pacific Coast. I have for years not done much among Friends in that department of Christian labor, and for a few years, while the country was engaged in war, we both suffered much abuse and not a few trials because we could not support it with approval or money. But things are different now. (A prominent churchman of California, when recently conversing with me referred to how the preachers were swept by the passions of war in 1917 and how they told their young men they were going out to fight for ideals, which have since been proved to have been propaganda to cover up the real object and intent of putting America into the war, and this churchman exclaimed, "We lied to them!") Effort has recently been made to place me on the executive committee of the State Church Federation, and give me my old position of chairman of the peace work connected with it. I have delivered numerous addresses to church and other organizations. Besides the twenty-five church papers I write for, I have been contributing to nearly 500 newspapers on this subject, and we have been able to finance a program which we understand has resulted in about 600 meetings being held over the State in behalf of the disarmament conference. In spite of this there is much anti-Japanese sentiment in California which is a national menace. I simply tell you the above with the hope that it will encourage my young Friends to grip this reform—it is worthy of all their chivalry, skill and patience on behalf of the Master who has poured out upon them so much of the bounties of the world.

We both send you a message of our love and sign this,

Your friends,

WM. C. ALLEN,

JAPANESE NOTES.

EXTRACTS FROM E. F. SHARPLESS'S LETTERS, WRITTEN AFTER HER RETURN TO MITO FROM HER SUMMER SPENT BY THE SEA.

Ninth Month 3rd there was a wonderful celebration in honor of the safe return of the Crown Prince of Japan. There was a flag procession in the morning of the Primary School children, and a lantern procession in the evening of the upper schools, and fire works and a great calling of "Banzai" and shouting. Our English newspaper here prophesies great changes in the conduct of the court as a result of the trip, and it would seem inevitable.

The Kindergarten begins to-morrow. We had our first First-day School and Meeting to-day. We had sent word to very few of the children so I was pleased to see so many—fifty—get together.

Ninth Month 11th-12th.—One of our little kindergarten children was very ill during the summer; they thought she would not live. But she kept saying: "No, I am not doing anything naughty, so God will help me." And the only way they could get her to take her medicine was by reminding her that God was looking. The mother laughed as she told about it, but the tears were not far off, and she was pretty much impressed by the child's faith. I had another rather touching talk with a man a few days ago. He is in a hospital and is probably going to be a cripple the rest of his life. He said he had a dream. He dreamed that he went up to Heaven in a thing like an aeroplane, and he was told to go back, that there was still work for him to do. It was at a time when everyone thought he was going to die. Since then he has brought about the reconciliation of two members of his family whose quarrel of long standing has upset the life of their whole village.

Ninth Month 25th.—It has been a good day for our classes. This morning at First-day School we had sixty-eight children. It began in the thirties and has gone up and up. I remember when it passed the fifty-mark and when the sixty, and such good, attentive children, and such earnest, interesting teaching (I am speaking for the other three teachers of course!). Then we had meeting with a "visiting Friend," a railroad man, who spoke to us very earnestly. The girls have learned a good bit about settling down into silence since we began to meet. This afternoon we had a class up-town, of which my division is the kindergarten one. There were twenty-three of them to-day.

My bicycle has come and been set up, and has already become quite indispensable. Its first job was to go all over town to the homes of the W. C. T. U. ladies collecting their approvals of a message endorsing the disarmament council from the women of Japan to the women of America. An old lady of eighty-nine (Kaji Yajima) is sailing this week to carry them across. She can't speak any English, but she has the spirit of world brotherhood. So I think it was a good christening for that bicycle.

Isn't it wonderful the way the people of America are back of that Disarmament Conference?

FROM THE ANNUAL REPORT OF THE JOHN WOOLMAN MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION, 1921.

During the year just closed, while the record is not filled with anything startling, yet we can report a gain in some of our material, and still more in our spiritual interests. Taking the latter first, the bi-centennial of John Woolman brought evidences of interest in his life and work from all over the country, and still more from abroad. Letters came from all parts of England, and there were many celebrations, of which we can speak only in passing. That at the grave of John Woolman, however, in the old Bischoff ground of the Friends in York comes most closely home to us. C. Walter Borton, who had visited the graveyard, mentions the impressive character of the occasion, and he has taken the trouble to bring us home, with much inconvenience in travel, a bit of ivy from this hallowed spot. The twig had great care given it during last winter; it was set out beside our little porch in specially prepared soil this spring, and has grown at least a yard during the summer.

We may be pardoned a feeling of great satisfaction when we regard one aspect of our material affairs, in contrasting the surroundings of this house with its condition six years ago, when we first opened. The great dump, with its mountain of tin cans and ashes across the way, has disappeared. Two shabby houses opposite have become the property of persons of taste and refinement. One of them was recently acquired as her private property by a well-known social worker in Philadelphia, who will use it as a rest house, and call it from its chief feature, "The Green Pump." We hope much for co-operative service and appreciative expression from our neighbors. In recognition of the fact that we are a public and not a private enterprise, the town has placed us on the tax-free list, as has been stated in a previous report, but our hearts are gladdened with signs of further appreciation, as stone and materials piled along the side of the road indicate the early improvement of the surface of Branch Street, in fulfillment of many of the Street Commissioners' promises. A brick walk laid in the old way, from bricks which were being discarded by a mason, who was tearing out his old colonial pavement to have a brand new cement one, leads now from our gate to the kitchen door, and retains the atmosphere of the place. Such brick are not to be had today at any price.

The prospect of obtaining a grant from the State Legislature becomes more hopeful to us, as our friend, Emmor Roberts, has promised to present our case before the Appropriations Committee of the State Senate. One of our strongest arguments is the fact that some years since the State undertook to buy this property to preserve the memory of John Woolman. This failed at the time, through lack of sufficient proof of its identity. This is all now in our hands. We cannot use the $10,000 now asked for as an endowment, but it will place our property in good order, and move over the original home of Woolman himself, now used as a barn on the adjoining property (generously placed at our disposal, if we replace it). It will also work wonders in our gardens and within the house.

Our other endeavor at the present moment is to raise as much as possible to meet the offer of our kind friend, William Bancroft, of Wilmington, Del., of $1,000, if we can make up the remainder of the $25,000 needed. We have received a little over $1,000, and it will take the effort of every interested member to raise such a sum as $25,000 before the coming of the new year, the date set for our accomplishment of this task. For all the unique charm of the place, and the many visitors, most of these do not remember our straits for support, and precious associations need to be upheld with definite financial aid. May we not claim this, not only as a Memorial to a Quaker worthy who merits continual remembrance, but as a public institution, with ideals for service in the community, worked out on lines that would be approved by John Woolman?

We are an incorporated institution, prepared to receive bequests and care for them, and we would be glad if some of those to whom John Woolman's service to the world, now so needing his memory revived, is precious, might remember us in their wills.

One day, Jane was in the meal room, when she was startled by a whisper from the trap door above her.

"Jane, Jane, mavourneen, couldn't you give us dhrup of buttermilk? 'Tis perishin' with thirst we are."

"Who is up there?" asked Jane.

"Only us—Bess and Norah Byrne and our cousin, Peggie O'Brien. Our mother could not leave poor Mike, who is dyin', and Morgan is taken prisoner, and she would not have us girls at home to be insulted by the soldiers, so she sent us here three days since, knowin' the Quakers wouldn't turn us out. We brought bread and some blankets, and pulled the ladder up after us, but do give us some drink."

Jane fetched a large pitcher of milk and handed it up to the thirsty girls.

"That is good. May your bed in heaven be aisy, if you are a heretic, Miss Jane! And now can't you get us some yarn and needles, and we'll knit you some fine stockin's. Sure, we've nearly worn out our beads with prayin', and little the saints seem to heed—may I be forgiven for saying so!" said Bess, the older of the two pretty Byrne girls, whom Jane knew slightly, but being Roman Catholics, had never been intimate with.

"Try praying to God Himself, the Lord and Master of all the saints," she said; and soon a basket was handed up with mighty skeins of the yarn she had spun for winter stockings for her father and brother. She added two books—"The Life of William Edmundson" and "The Pilgrim's Progress"—her whole library, except the Bible, which she did not dare offer.

So in the dreary weeks that the poor girls hid in the loft, often, when they heard the military about, not daring even to whisper, they had some employment to wile away the long hours, and no one but their faithful friend had any suspicion of their whereabouts. Other refugees came constantly for food. As dear old Rachel Williams would say, it was wonderful how the barrel of meal and the cruse of oil held out. Joe ground the coarse meal for cakes, and Jane, having no market for her butter, could afford a little of that, so no hungry body was sent away empty from the mill.

Early one morning, Joe was dealing out food to a group of wild, unkempt men, whom he well knew had been leaders in the rebellion, when the sound of many horses' hoofs on the road alarmed them, and in a moment they dashed under the arch of the bridge, standing knee-deep in the water that fed the broad, mossy mill wheel. Grass and rushes hid the entrance, and as the poor men cowered together as much out of sight as possible, they heard the horses clatter above them, and a loud voice asking Joe if there were any fugitives about.

"I daresay there may be," said Joe, composedly, "but I am a Quaker, and go about my business, taking no sides, and desire to be at peace with all men."

"Well," said the officer, "if you see any such, tell them of the King's clemency. A Protection will be given to all who come to the military headquarters to apply for it."

"That is good news," said Joe; "I will tell all it may concern."

Away clattered the troop, and when the wet, scared men crawled out of their hiding-place, he earnestly advised them to avail themselves of this offer, and go back to their homes and their work in peace.

It was three Friends—Abraham Shackleton, Ephraim Boake and John Thomas—who undertook to be mediators between the King's troops and the rebels in County Kildare.

Disapproving of all violence, they were trusted by both sides, and although for many months there were robberies and threats and sore anxiety, gradually the reign of terror died away, and it became possible to live a normal life again.

In spite of many moments of terrible danger, when their Protestant neighbors were being slaughtered all around them, not one Friend lost his life, except one young man, who, in a panic, joined the King's army and was almost immediately killed by the rebels.

In worldly possessions they suffered sorely. A few had their houses burnt as well as rifled. Both sides of the combatants stripped them again and again of foodstuffs, of cattle and of horses. Money was demanded by desperate men at the pike's point, clothing and bedding were stolen; for the chance to spoil their more thrifty neighbors was irresistible to the greedy, ignorant and idle among the country folk.

Money to aid the Friends was freely supplied by the fellow-members in Dublin and England, and a considerable sum was put into the capable hands of Joe and Jane Williams. Their power to distribute was much helped by a pleasant surprise. One night there was a familiar whinny under their windows, and there stood grey Dennis, the good horse that had been stolen from them months before, who had found his way home. He looked starved and hard worked, but Joe soon provided him with the warm bran mash that he loved, and in a few days he was fit to be driven into Wexford, where cloth, linen and other necessities of life were still to be bought.

The military in charge of the town told Joe he must take out a "Protection," but he stoutly refused, having had neither part nor lot in the rebellion, so a free pass was given to him, with which he went all about the country on his errands of mercy and healing.

He lived at Randall's Mill all his life, for neither he nor his sister ever married, and at the age of ninety he dictated to a relative the story of his experience of the protection of God for His trusting people during the terrible days of 1798.

WAR is not merely an exercise of force. It is the use of force under conditions which for one thing imply deceit and a doctrine of calculated and systematic perversion and obscuration of truth. And even worse, the conditions imply a contempt of personality which is a concrete rejection of the law of solidarity and the principle of fellowship.—RICHARD ROBERTS.

FRIENDS' HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The Annual Meeting of the Friends' Historical Society was held in the Twelfth Street Meeting House on the evening of Eleventh Month 28th. The Treasurer's report showed a balance of $82.40 on hand in the General Fund.

The President, Lucy B. Roberts, in her report of the activities of the Society for the year, drew the attention of the members to the very complete index of the first ten volumes of the Bulletin which has been prepared under the careful superintendence of Dr. Rayner Kelsey. Desk space has been offered the Society in the Friends' Library, Sixteenth and Race Streets, so that we shall hereafter have a permanent address and headquarters. She also touched on the generous offer of Hannah Fox to give the custody of "Wakefield" near Logan to the Society as Trustee and to endow it with sufficient funds to keep the building in repair and as a meeting place or neighborhood centre.

When the business had been finished the meeting turned its attention to the entertainment which had been organized by a committee under the chairmanship of Walter Brinton. Members had been solicited to bring with them heirlooms or articles of historic interest more than one hundred years old, and from the offerings a list was selected and the exhibitors asked to explain their choice in five-minute talks.

Jennie C. Saunders read from a letterbook of Joseph Saunders dated 1766 many interesting and illuminating comments on the non-importation agreement of the colonists and the stamp tax.

James G. Biddle exhibited the marriage certificate of John Biddle and Sarah Owen in 1730.

Anne T. Scattergood read many sprightly extracts from the diary of Mary Wheeler in 1806, describing a journey to New York to attend Quarterly Meeting.

Richard T. Cadbury exhibited a Bible belonging to one of his ancestors, traditionally believed to have accompanied this ancestor to prison in 1683 when he suffered for the cause of Truth. He had also the diary of Ann Warden and a pipe box for holding church warden pipes.

Samuel C. Eastburn brought a collection of deeds, autographs and books which might have held the interest of the gathering for several hours and whose study would take months.

James Emlen had a beautiful glass "tumbler" with cover which stood about eighteen inches high and was almost ten inches in diameter.

Henry D. Paxson produced the tomahawk presented to James Logan by one of the Indian chiefs in token of amity. This relic came from the collection of Watson, the author of the Annals.

George Vaux, Jr., showed us two walking sticks, one belonging to Daniel Smith who came to this country in 1691, and the other belonging to John Head, the latter, those present were eager to believe, being the cane on which he stamped away from Robert Morris, throwing back over his shoulder the directions of how to find the key and unlock his strong box. His conscientious scruples not permitting him to encourage war by loaning or giving money to the Continental Congress, when he returned, Robert Morris and 60,000 pounds had disappeared.

Albert Cook Myers exhibited a bronze handle of a knife, a figure in Dutch costume of the seventeenth century, which had been found in an Indian grave.

Margaret Jenkins held up to the admiration of the meeting a wonderful sampler of a pastoral scene, worked by Elizabeth Guest, in which the figures were particularly life-like and in which a great variety of complicated and beautiful embroidery stitches were used.

Joseph B. Turner exhibited what may be the unique surviving copy of an indenture by which William Penn conveyed to his creditors at a time of financial stringency the Province of Pennsylvania. Fortunately, as the happy possessor of this instrument remarked, the conveyance was never completed.

Walter Brinton exhibited a handsome surveyor's compass made by Benjamin Rittenhouse, the brother of the famous David.

The following officers were elected:—President, Lucy B. Roberts; Vice-Presidents, Charles F. Jenkins and Amelia M. Gummere; Treasurer, Mary S. Allen; Secretary, Joseph H. Haines; Councillors to serve two years—Walter Brinton, Elizabeth B. Jones, Arthur N. Leeds, Sarah E. P. Mickle, Albert Cook Myers, Francis R. Taylor.

WHAT A PAIR OF BOY'S PANTS WILL DO.

Quite an ordinary man appeared one day in the Clothing Department of the Friends' Mission in Vienna. His face was thin and anxious, his manner helpless and depressed, and he wore the remains of a military uniform. By one hand he held his five-year-old son, and in the other a bundle of clothes which had just been given to him. The helper in charge of the counter took the bundle and began checking the garments from the list made out by the Austrian helper. Counting, "Eight, nine, ten—two garments for every person—have you got what you wanted?" she asked mechanically. It is difficult not to become mechanical, when the same thing has to be said three hundred times a day.

"I had hoped," said the man in tones suggestive of despair, "to get some trousers for my little boy, but the fräulein says that there are none left."

"Yes, that is right, I am sorry there are no more today," said the woman hastily.

She was well used to the tragedy of being out of stock of some particular garment, and hated to enter into a discussion that could only lead to nothing.

"What we have not got we cannot give," she said, a truism that she had carefully learned in Germany to be used for these occasions.

The man picked up the little shirt and knitted scarf that were the boy's share of the family bundle.

"I would willingly give up all the other things for a pair of trousers," he said; "my wife has made shirts for the children out of an old one of mine, but she has no stuff for their suits. If she were here she would know how to explain; but she is in the hospital and I am afraid I do not know about the making of children's clothes. The gracious lady may see for herself that Franz needs trousers very urgently."

He took his son by the shoulder and turned him around for inspection; and the young woman leaning over the table was at once convinced of the urgency of the need. Patching and darning are arts more practiced in Vienna than in other countries today; and the young lady had had ample opportunity to study much mended clothes; but such a marvel of patch-work as she saw upon the trousers of the boy had never come to her notice. It was impossible to see the original fabric of Franz's knickerbockers, for every pattern of cloth and serge seemed to be represented on them. The patches varied in size also from a walnut to a melon, and their shape was fantastic. The sight called up a vision of a careful mother, setting her house in order before going to the hospital, judging and contriving and using every shred of her little store of scraps of cloth.

The helper went to the Austrian fräulein, who unpacked and sorted the second-hand clothes from America, and laid the case before her. "Um Gottes Willen," said that lady when she saw the boy and his patches, and she fell upon her orderly piles, turned them all over, dug into half-unpacked bales, but all in vain. Every sort of other garment was there, but no trousers.

"The rush is over," said the helper; "could you find time to go over to the other depot and see if they have anything there? No new trousers have come in today, you know, but perhaps among the second-hand bale—" the fräulein waited for no further encouragement, but went.

The man still stood by the table, as though prepared to remain there forever, and Franz waited beside him, equally patient and quite unconcerned. It was near the end of the day and the work of tidying up the room went on.

At last Fräulein Schmidt appeared in triumph, bearing in her hands a pair of small blue serge knickerbockers. The people in the other depot had hunted through everything, and nearly in despair had found these at the very bottom of a bale. A look of intense relief came over the father's face as though the burden of life had been suddenly lightened. He began some broken thanks and gathered up his bundle. He bent over the hand which had given such a treasure to his boy. Franz carefully shook hands with the two women, and they went out into the late afternoon together.

Somebody in America brought that unspeakable happiness to that father's heart. Is there, after all, much that can bring more gladness to a father's heart than to be able to provide for his children's needs? Would you like to feel that glow of happiness which would come to you if you knew you were the cause of helping fathers to help their children like that? The way is very simple. Send to the Friends' Store-room at Fifteenth and Cherry Streets, Philadelphia, the clothing you will not let your little boy or girl wear any longer. You may not know whom you have made glad, but that makes no difference. You will create the happiness and it will live in the world.

X-RAY OUTFIT IS SENT FROM GERMANY TO RUSSIA.

In accordance with instructions from Philadelphia, Francis Bacon, of the German Unit, has purchased an X-Ray equipment and sent it to Arthur Watts in Russia. The equipment is the product of the Sanitas-Werke, Friedrichstrasse 31, Berlin. Although it was manufactured in 1914 it has been used very little, as its owner was in war service the entire time; and Francis Bacon purchased it directly from the former owner, Professor Fossbender, of the Technical School of Charlottenburg.

MURRAY KENWORTHY ILL WITH TYPHUS IN RUSSIA.

A cable received at the Service Committee headquarters Twelfth Month 28th, stated that Murray Kenworthy, of Wilmington, Ohio, who sailed in Eleventh Month to become a member of the Russian Unit, was taken with typhus in Buzuluk. A cable received at headquarters First Month 3rd, stated that on the eighth day of his illness his condition was favorable. A nurse was sent down from Moscow, and every possible care is being given him.

When Murray Kenworthy reached Russia the Philadelphia headquarters appointed him the Acting Chief of the American Friends' Unit; and he immediately began the organization of feeding 50,000 children in Buzuluk. His wife and three children are now at Wilmington, Ohio.

Dr. Mary McCollin Tatam is also ill with typhus. Two others of the Unit in Russia have already had typhus since Eleventh Month, they being Anna Louise Strong and Nancy Babb. Both of these are now entirely recovered.

CLOTHING WANTED AT ONCE FOR POLAND.

"The supplies of clothing at Baranowice are completely exhausted, especially clothes for women. The refugees are reaching our outpost stations with very insufficient clothing. The weather is now quite severe, and the lack of adequate clothing is causing many deaths. We can save lives provided clothing comes."

So wrote Oscar Moon from Warsaw, last week. Have you ceased to send your old clothing to the store-room? Has it seemed that by this time all human need for clothing must have ceased? But the reverse is true. Today, because the mills of Europe have no raw materials from which to manufacture cloth, and because the money of Europe has less buying power today than even in the winter of 1918-19, every bit of your old clothing can be used. The force of workers at the store-room has been increased, it can handle all you send. Look your old clothing over-today, and wrap up everything you can, sending it to our store-room, care of Elizabeth Marot, at Fifteenth and Cherry Streets, Philadelphia.

SHIPMENTS received during week ending Twelfth Month 31, 1921—104 boxes and packages; 1 for German relief; 2 from Mennonites.

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE.

IX.

Submarines: Shall they be increased and unlimited in number and size; or reduced and limited; or totally abolished? This is the question that has been the subject of animated debate within the Conference Committee during the past two weeks. France has demanded the right to increase her submarine fleet to 90,000 tons' displacement (the limit proposed by Secretary Hughes for Great Britain and the United States), without any limitation on their size; the United States has proposed a reduction in the present number of submarines of all nations and a limitation upon them in future; Great Britain has urged their entire abolition. The French have been victorious in the committee, and the Conference at its next open session will doubtless confirm this result. The American proposal, a compromise between the French and British positions, has not been successful; but, on the other hand, our delegation has succeeded in securing unanimous consent to the adoption of rules designed to curb in as drastic a manner as possible the operation of submarines when engaged in warlike activities. The British have served notice on the whole civilized world that they will carry their attack upon any use of the submarine into the open session of the Conference and on to success in the future.

The debate has been an illuminating one, with the balance of logic and humanity inclining to the side of the British. The arguments of the French are thirteen in number. They claim that public opinion, in the discussion of the Treaty of Versailles, during the League of Nations' discussion of the question, and in the Report of the American Advisory Committee, has shown itself in favor of the retention of submarines; that they are pre-eminently a defensive weapon; that they are the natural defense of nations scantily supplied with capital ships, that is, of the weaker and poorer nations; that the number of submarines possessed by any nation should be proportioned only to its national needs; that large submarines are more in accord than smaller ones with the dictates of humanity, since they can rescue the crews of torpedoed ships; that submarines of large cruising-radius are needed to defend distant colonies, and to maintain the lines of communication between these and the mother-country; that submarines can be used under honorable conditions just as any weapon can be used either honorably or dishonorably; that they cannot gain control and domination of the seas; that the recent war proved the utility of the submarines as a weapon against warships, since the Germans torpedoed three French battleships and five cruisers; that by necessitating a large defensive system, they can weaken the enemy's offensive; that as wireless stations they are very useful for scouting purposes; that the German submarines proved themselves useful auxiliaries to submarine mines in protecting the German and Gallipoli coasts from bombardment; that it is justifiable to wage war against the enemy's merchant marine, and even more humane than more direct means of using force.

The British met these arguments,—or rather foresaw and answered them in advance,—and stated arguments of their own, as follows: Submarines are not adequate to the defense of coasts against bombardment and the landing of troops, since these operations are conducted by swift-moving and powerfully-armed ships fully equipped to nullify submarine attacks. The ineffectiveness of submarines against war-ships is proved by the experience of Germany which, with 375 U-boats during the war, had 203 of them sunk and was unable by means of them to sink a single ship of the British Grand Fleet; to prevent British light cruisers from sweeping through the North Sea unhindered; to prevent the crossing and re-crossing of the English Channel by 15,000,000 British troops, without the loss of a single life; or to prevent the transport of 2,000,000 American troops across the Atlantic with equal safety. As for the defense of coast lines, the British argued that theirs are four times the circumference of the globe,—almost as long as those of the other four great powers put together; but that so convinced are they of the ineffectiveness of submarines for defending coast-lines that they are willing to give them up. As for defending maritime and other communications between colonies and mother-country, submarines are much stronger in attacking than defending them, and this is especially true when the defending country does not possess the command of the sea on the surface. From the point of view of defense, also, submarines are useless for defense against other submarines; hence, since Great Britain could also build submarines and possesses a large share of the control of the sea on its surface, she could launch a more effective submarine attack against the communications of other nations than others could launch against her.

Both reason and experience show, the British contend, that it is against merchant ships alone that the submarine achieves real success. During the recent war, German submarines sank 12,000,000 tons of merchant shipping, while achieving practically nothing against warships. Admittedly, Great Britain is most exposed to the menace of submarines against merchant-ships, and especially against food-supplies; for Britain's soil produces only two-fifths of Britons' food, and not more than a seven-weeks' supply can be maintained. Hence, starvation faces Britain in submarine warfare; and this is as grave a danger as any that can confront France. It is not an insuperable one, as Great Britain proved during the recent war. But it is ingratitude, to say the least, for the nations present at the Washington Conference to hint at "starving Great Britain into submission." Without the British navy, which was almost the keystone of the Allied arch, France and Belgium would have been ruined, and even the United States would have been impotent to intervene, or might have been obliged to abandon its army in France. Can France, of all nations, run the risk of a disaster to her near neighbor and only certain ally, should the circumstances of 1914 occur again? But other nations, too, have merchant ships and the need of food imported from abroad, which British submarines could attack. Hence Great Britain's desire to abolish submarines is not a purely selfish and unworthy one; for the British believe that they are fighting against submarines in behalf of the whole civilized world.

All the Allied world once believed, and the British still believe, their spokesmen say, that submarines engage in cowardly and inhuman war. Twenty thousand non-combatants, men, women and children, were drowned in the recent submarine war. This was in violation of laws, both human and Divine; but the excuse was then, and will always be, that necessity knows no law. Officers and crews of submarines may be honorable men, but they must obey their governments; and submarines by their very nature cannot rescue the passengers and crews of torpedoed ships. The submarine, then, is a weapon of murder and piracy. The Treaty of Versailles forbade Germany to construct any more submarines, whether for military or mercantile purposes, and it was intended thereby to banish all submarines from the sea. For it is not to be assumed that Germany is always to be bad, and other nations are always to be good; it is not logical to have one rule for Germany, and another for the rest of the world.

It is argued that "submarine warfare is cheap and within the reach of all." Even though this were true, warfare should not be made cheap; for when cheap, it is both easy and continuous. But, on the contrary, submarines may cause a very heavy expense to both the offense and defense. For example, there were only nine or ten German submarines at sea at one time, during the recent war, but Great Britain was required to maintain 3,000 anti-submarine craft to deal with them. Let us not, then, expend upon submarines and anti-submarine craft what we save on capital ships. Great Britain, with its very large number of steam-propelled, steel-built fishing boats, which can readily be equipped with anti-submarine devices, is already best equipped of all nations to cope with submarines. She probably has also the largest and most efficient submarine fleet. But she offers to scrap them all and disband their highly trained personnel, thus offering, she believes, a larger sacrifice than any made by her sister nations, and contributing to the cause of humanity a greater boon than even the reduction and limitation of capital ships.

Finally, the British argue, the menace of the submarine can be gotten rid of only by total abolition. Limitation is not sufficient; for submarines are essentially a weapon of offensive war, and a fleet of them can be rapidly expanded if the submarine industry be kept alive and a nucleus of trained personnel be maintained. Unlike poison gas and aerial bombs, the submarine is not the by-product of any industry; it can and should be unconditionally abolished.

The Italian delegation repeated some of the French arguments in favor of submarines for defense, and added that only five nations were represented in the Armament Conference, while many others could build submarines. To this argument, Chairman Hughes added the statement that the five nations represent the potency of competition in capital ships, but not in submarines, for in the building of these, other nations could compete with the five. To forestall this objection, Lord Lee, speaking for Great Britain, had said that the other powers were not likely to defy the opinion of the civilized world, if the five powers in the Washington Conference would abolish submarines; but should they do so and begin to build, the five great sea-powers would surely find some means of protection against the other, smaller ones.

The result of the long debate has been to place no maximum limit on the submarine or other auxiliary tonnage of any nation; and we may expect to see either a competition in the building of these instruments of war, and of devices designed to cope with them, or the development of "the public opinion of the civilized world" which will put an end in some future conference to the competition, and perhaps to the building itself. Friends, applying to the question their principle that all war, all agencies of war and all preparation for war, are wrong, will have no difficulty in deciding where they stand on the much-debated question. But it is well for us to know and sympathetically consider the arguments on both sides, so that we may do our share in bringing about the right decision.

The American proposition to restrict the size of auxiliary ships to 10,000 tons, the British proposition to restrict the size of their guns to eight inches, and the rules proposed for the curbing of submarine activities (including the outlawry and treating as pirates of any submarine crews who violate these rules) have been adopted in committee; and a new debate has just begun on the American proposition to abolish chemical warfare.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

A small audience responded to the invitation of the Social Order Extension Committee to hear Dr. Gregory Zilboorg at Friends' Select School on the evening of First Month 5th. The lecturer was one time Secretary to the Minister of Labor in the Kerensky Cabinet. Although speaking a fluent English his accent was unfamiliar, and not a few of those present could not follow him. He made it clear, however, that in numerous details Russian affairs demand a Russian experience for a full interpretation.

PRESIDENT ARTHUR MORGAN of Antioch College, Ohio, held a large audience for an hour and a half on the evening of the 6th, while he explained the "Antioch Plan" in education. Under this plan students spend five weeks at the college in academic work and follow it with five weeks in practical work in shops or business or professional offices.

THE Yearly Meeting's Extension Committee would encourage individual Friends to attend other American Yearly Meetings of Friends. We believe an interchange of visiting will help very much to spread a true knowledge of the principles of the Society of Friends. Some funds are available for traveling expenses. Please address William B. Harvey, Secretary, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

THE law of friendship is communion, and prayer is the fulfilling of the law. The thought of prayer as communion with God makes praying an habitual attitude and not simply an occasional act.—From "The Religion of Fellowship."

NOTICE.

FRANK D. SLUTZ of the Moraine Park School, Dayton, Ohio, will address a general meeting of the Friends' Educational Association at Friends' Select School, First Month 21st, at 2.15 P. M. His subject will be "The Creative Impulse in Education." He was the one chosen from the two thousand who offered to conduct this unique experiment in education which has for its aim "the mastery of the arts of life, which is education according to the Moraine Park conception." What he says about the Moraine Park School will be of great interest and worth hearing.

The afternoon meeting will be preceded by a conference on College Board Examinations, held at 10.30 in the morning. Speakers invited from colleges and private schools in Philadelphia and vicinity will state their experiences. This expression will range from the point of view of those who make out the examinations to that of those who prepare students for them. Such an exchange of ideas and experiences will be of much interest and profit.

Lunch will be served at Friends' Select School at 12 o'clock to those who notify Walter W. Haviland before First Month 20th. The cost, fifty cents.

FRANK D. SLUTZ gives an address at Friends' Central School, Fifteenth and Race Streets, at 10.30 A. M., First Month 21st. Any who cannot attend the P. M. meeting or who wish to attend both meetings are cordially invited. Subject:—"The Fundamentals of Progressive Education."

DIED.—At Moorestown, N. J., First Month 2, 1922, SUSAN P. LEEDS, aged seventy-one years; a member of Chester Monthly Meeting, N. J.

—, at Miami, Florida, First Month 3, 1922, ROBERT R. HULME, in his seventy-second year; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

READINGS FROM ENGLISH POETS

I am proposing to give eight readings from English poets at the Arch Street Centre, Room I, during the winter months. The purpose of the readings will be to bring home to the hearers the beauty of poetry; to recall to them the invigorating ideas that underlie all great poetry; to offer, in these days of hurried living, a few quiet hours of the company of writers who have permanently enriched the literary and spiritual treasures of humanity. No effort will be made to be learned or original. Most of each lecture will be devoted to reading poetry; such comment as is made will be confined to historical and biographical matters and to the introductory background that seems essential to the understanding of the poems. The readings, if successful, will sustain courage rather than add to the stock of information. Sincere effort will be made to refrain from the maudlin sentimentality that always haunts interpretations of poetry.

The following prophets will speak in due order: John Milton, William Cowper, William Wordsworth, John Keats, Robert Browning (twice), Matthew Arnold, Alfred Tennyson. No, I do not think that poetry died with Tennyson.

The readings will come on successive Saturdays from 4.00 to 5.00 p. m., from the thirteenth of First Month to the third of Third Month, inclusive. A charge of $2.50 will be made for the course. Tickets, good for any person, may be had by writing to the undersigned. Admission to a single lecture will be fifty cents. As few as six, and as many as fifty, persons will constitute a good audience. Please tell your friends about it.

EDITORIAL.

No one moving about in this world of ours can avoid stumbling sooner or later upon the word "economics." Turn in any direction one meets men who continuously conjure with the words "economical," "economies," "economic." What is it that makes these words so full of human interest?

As I pondered upon this matter the street car in which I rode came to a gliding stop. A door was whipped open by unseen levers, people dismounted and the vehicle moved forward with an evenly accelerated speed. Suddenly the reality of the laws of economics burst upon me. I was literally trapped by the innocent act of riding in a trolley. As one of the passengers on this large moving platform, I was traveling over rails not as an individual but as part of the public, humanity, transported from one portion of the city to another. Not only had invisible forces produced this movement, but they had built, fashioned, equipped and propelled the conveyance, a long green electric tram, producing the maximum public service at the minimum cost.

The thought of the street car brought me suddenly to the realization of how ramified and intensive are these influences. There is no escaping them in the simplest activity. A public service corporation, however, only partially represents the factors that make "business," industry, in fact most of our waking life, what it is.

Not long ago a traveling salesman exhibited a sample book of unusually attractive, embossed labels. The clearness of the impressions, the striking use of fine colors and the skilful workmanship that was reflected from the samples impressed one at once. When I learned that these labels were to be sold for what seemed next to nothing I was amazed. Either the German firm producing them was a hoax or else in most necessitous circumstances. The war and its economic dislocations, a violently disjointed exchange, the abnormal value of American dollars and the abnormal worth of the American market trooped before me like actors in a pantomime.

The above are two illustrations, accidental incidents, that show how intimately the economics of life really concern us, if we but see through the superficial screen of exterior appearances. Economics is a harsh clinking word. We should do well to refer to it as the knowledge of the activities produced by certain invisible forces of our life. Those strange forces which are responsible, first, for the movement of portions of this earth's crust, ores and minerals, to places where these rough inert rocks are converted, as if by magic, into metals and then into tools. Secondly, these same forces shift a vegetable and animal matter from places where it is un-reproductive and of no use to places where it is reproductive and useful to man. These movements are indeed great tides moving across the surface of the earth, with each human being adding a tiny share of work and consuming a tiny bit of goods.

The subject is obviously a vast one and any comments that may appear in this or later numbers must be confined to some special feature or particularly interesting phase. We suggest the serious consideration of: What makes value, The purpose of property, What determines wages, How foreign exchange indicates the flow of goods from one country to another, Capital—what is it, Why capital is the core of our current system, Labor,—the work of human hands, Why it can be considered the weather-vane of the future? If we venture upon an impartial discussion of wages, rent and profits, we shall strive for clearer ideas on such personally important matters.

There is one phase that we cannot afford to omit. We must never forget that the proper object of such study is genuine human welfare. If we are serious in our interest in the common weal we must be serious in gaining an accurate knowledge of economic fact. We must study the forces and the movements that affect mankind. For, after all, our world is not a world of mills, machines and money, but a world of human beings.

OUTLINE OF BUSINESS.

If one is seriously intent upon correcting the faults of modern life it is essential to understand what actually happens in business. In order to make any such analysis helpful the meaning of certain words must be clearly understood.

Utility may be defined as the power to satisfy want. If a thing is intensely desired, it is said to possess great utility. Potatoes and diamonds in their way are much desired. They each possess utility. Utility maintains a close relation to time, form and place.

Value is the esteem man gives an article or the measure of the sacrifice he is willing to make to obtain an article. To illustrate, air has utility, but, in an economic sense, no value, because it is so plentiful that it requires no human sacrifice to obtain a satisfactory amount. An article possessing utility, as defined above, and existing in a quantity insufficient to supply a demand will necessarily have a value.

Fundamentally, a community acquires wealth when as a whole it produces more articles of value than it consumes. We must ever remind ourselves that the value of such apparent wealth is always shadowy. Esteem is, in a sense, unreal and intangible. Yet it is this esteem (placed for purposes of exchange) of material and immaterial objects that creates a real value. Values continually fluctuate because men esteem things differently at different times and under varying conditions. Note the enormous decline in value, the change of esteem, that articles possessed under the Czar's régime experienced under the Soviet. As esteem rises and falls the value of any fixed object rises and falls. In this connection it is interesting to observe how value attaches itself to the service and character of individuals.

In every community we see some men richer than others. How is this condition explained? Is it not the result of the supply of talent, personal service or ability of the several characters in answer to the community's demand for these things? If this claim is true then the wealth attached to this man or that man is a conditional, invisible wealth and not a fixed material possession. Sometimes people speak as if this condition, supply and demand, were a physical object, or a voluntary action which could be removed or prohibited from the life of a community. Reflection will show that the esteem one individual or a group of individuals may have is quite intangible and as difficult to prohibit or inspire as the love in one's heart.

There are certain interesting conditions that affect our sense of value. For instance, an article may be intensely desired by a few people, or again, very, very many people may desire it moderately with the same result in either case—namely, that the supply is insufficient for the complete satisfaction of those desiring the article. If the supply lags too far behind the demand the value rises to the place where some no longer want the article. These two conditions occur continuously, and we as individuals are continually concealing our desires—we speak of it in a very matter-of-fact way—Oh, such and such a thing is entirely too expensive.

Another strange characteristic of people is that their wants apparently have no limit. This is one important reason why so many of us find it so very difficult to save. It also means that general overproduction of wealth is impossible. This statement may be misunderstood unless it is explained that although one thing may be too abundant there can never be too much of every thing. Why? Because man never fully satisfies his many, many wants. Yet we often see individuals, who have amply satisfied a particular desire, turning their wants in another direction, thus giving value to the new object. Looking at this matter in another way, whenever the available supply of an object or service increases without a simultaneous increase in demand the value drops. On the other hand, increase the demand without an increase in supply and the value rises. This operation is not only automatic but inevitable. Thus values are produced by things being supplied to meet the wants of you and me.

Consider the matter of wages. Within a community, for example, Philadelphia, the workers who supply a given type of talent secure in wages that proportion of the community's total income which represents the value of the service they render in comparison with the community's esteem for its other possessions. During the war period artisans were comparatively scarce. The talent they supplied was quite limited, hence we paid in wages to carpenters and plumbers relatively high wages. At the present time the artisan ranks are being rapidly refilled and the demand for their labor has slumped considerably with the inevitable reaction—a reduced relative esteem for their services—this is reflected by lower wages.

It is always possible for individuals or groups of workers to meet the new conditions and to readjust incomes either by stimulating a demand for their services or by limiting the supply of their service or limiting the number of workers offering the particular service in the given community.

The human tragedy cannot be overlooked, for we see people of great ambitions and desires born into communities where there is an abundance of the producing talent which they may represent. Education will partly remedy this mal-adjustment. It will dissuade men from entering crowded trades or professions and at the same time help those rendering a particular service to render it more helpfully, intelligently and ably—conditions increasing a demand and raising a value with the happy result of higher wages.

Industry as it exists today reflects endless examples of these conditions. Not only do we see the astounding production and trade of goods, but we can also detect disasters caused by an improper comprehension of the laws that underlie what we call business. We see, on the one hand, a union endeavoring to set the price of labor above its value; on the other hand, a corporation by monopoly trying to set the price of merchandise above its value. Both attempts are equally suicidal. The union by inflating the price of labor merely changes an apparent value, the wage, but it does not alter the community's esteem for its services. The result is obvious, wages go up, prices go up, and the worker is in the same relative position. There is always a period before the ultimate rise in prices, when an artificially attractive wage will attract extra workers who, if really not needed, will soon find themselves unemployed by the community. The monopoly that sets an artificial price on goods will promptly induce an excess of supply which will entail the inevitable boomerang reaction—the slump of the value of the merchandise. We must remember that these operations work sometimes slowly and sometimes swiftly, causing suffering amongst the victims who are taken unaware. A great deal of the success of our economic future will depend upon whether in appreciating these fundamental conditions we can so lubricate the operations of these forces that unnecessary suffering will be avoided, and at the same time the helpful and inevitable function of supply and demand be maintained.

J. PASSMORE ELKINTON.

"THE WAY TO INDUSTRIAL PEACE."

SYNOPSIS OF ADDRESS DELIVERED AT THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA, BY B. SEEBOHM ROWNTREE.

Just as the policy of the balance of power between nations makes the world's peace a mere contingency, so the policy of federated capital on the one hand and federated labor on the other, each trying to become so strong that it can dictate its own terms, has resulted in appalling instability in industry. Better methods must be devised and there never was a more favorable opportunity than the present for finding and adopting these.

The only effective way of dealing with industrial unrest is to get down to its root causes, and then seek to remove them.

An unbiased examination will show that there are certain minimum conditions which any satisfactory scheme of industry must provide for the workers. These are:

1. Earnings sufficient to maintain a reasonable standard of comfort.

2. Reasonable hours of work.
3. Reasonable economic security during the whole working life and in old age.
4. A reasonable share with the employer in determining the conditions of work.
5. An interest in the prosperity of the industry.

1. The first condition implies the payment of wages to workers of normal ability which, in the case of a man, will enable him to marry, to live in a decent house, and to bring up a family of average size in a state of physical efficiency, leaving a margin for contingencies and recreation. A woman should be able to live in accordance with a similar standard of comfort, providing for herself alone. To fulfil this condition will involve a considerable advance in wages in some industries.

At a time like the present, when employers everywhere are trying to get wages down in order to reduce the cost of production, it may appear Utopian to suggest that wages should be increased. It is not suggested that it is possible to increase wages at once. The important point is that employers should do everything in their power, by improving industrial processes and organization, to render industry so efficient that such wages can be paid in the near future, and not rest content until this has been achieved. It would have a striking effect on the relations of capital and labor if employers on their own account took the necessary steps to enable them to pay minimum wages on the scale proposed above.

2. REASONABLE HOURS OF WORK.—The workers should have sufficient leisure for recreation and self-expression outside the factory, and their working hours should not be so long as to prejudice health. On the other hand, if they are too short it will be impossible to raise the wealth production per worker to the point necessary to enable adequate wages to be paid. A working week of forty-eight hours proved to be a satisfactory general standard, and any deviation from it either up or down should be justified by special circumstances.

3. REASONABLE ECONOMIC SECURITY.—(a)—Unemployment. Until the menace of unemployment is removed we can never hope for industrial peace. After the State, the municipalities, and employers have done everything possible to reduce the volume of unemployment, there must still remain a considerable and fluctuating amount of unemployment which is unavoidable. This can only be dealt with by a system of insurance. In order to remove the menace of this involuntary unemployment from the minds of the workers the benefits payable must be adequate. B. S. Rowntree suggests that these should be fifty per cent. of average earnings for unemployed workers, with an addition of ten per cent. for a dependent wife and five per cent. for each dependent child, with a maximum of seventy-five per cent. of average earnings. This insurance may either be undertaken by the State, by industries, or by individual factories or small groups of factories, or by a combination of these methods. The advantage of action by the State is that its application is universal. The advantage of organization is that administration will probably be less costly, and the responsibility for avoiding unemployment is placed directly on the industry. Insurance by individual factories or small groups of factories would only be undertaken in default of any more general system. It is, however, quite a feasible scheme, and is being applied successfully in B. S. Rowntree's own works which employ 7,000 people. The match industry in Great Britain has adopted a scheme on these lines, and other industries are considering it. Experience in Britain points to the fact that it is possible to introduce administrative checks which will keep abuse of an unemployment insurance scheme within small compass. B. S. Rowntree estimates that the cost of providing benefits on the above scale universally would amount to about three and one-half per cent. on the wages bill, and suggests this might be shared between the State, the employers and the workers. Against this added burden on industry must be set the important reactions which would result from removing the menace of unemployment from the workers.

(b) Sickness.—Probably it will be possible for workers to make their own arrangements for insurance against loss of wages through sickness. There is, however, a good deal to be said in favor of a national system of insurance against sickness. In Britain the benefits are 15s. a week for men and 12s. for women, and the contributions 10d. for men and 6d. for women, of which the employer pays 5d. in each case. Even where there is a national scheme, it will probably be necessary to develop a system of sick clubs for paying supplementary benefits.

(c) Old Age.—No system of industry can be considered satisfactory under which a worker who has been reasonably thrifty all his working life finds himself nevertheless in want in old age. Action either by the State or by individual employers should be taken to insure against this risk.

4. Giving Workers a Share in Determining Working Conditions.—Everywhere workers are demanding a greater share in the determination of their working conditions. Probably this movement has advanced further in Britain than in America, which may partly account for the different attitude adopted to trade unionism in the two countries. In Britain the right of workers to collective bargaining is never questioned, and a vast number of employers regard it as an advantage that workers should be organized in trade unions. Experience shows that as the employers' opposition to trade unionism has been removed, so the antagonism of the unions to the employers has disappeared. Besides the universal recognition of trade unions, employers in Britain are feeling their way towards methods of giving the workers in their own factories a greater share in determining their working conditions. It is necessary to move cautiously so that the efficiency of industry may not be lessened. Satisfactory results are being obtained in many cases. It is essential that the workers shall have a share in determining matters which are of real consequence—not just welfare matters. They should have a share in the legislative and judicial functions of factory administration.

5. The last conditions of industrial peace is that the workers shall have an interest in the prosperity of the business in which they are engaged. It is important to be clear as to what it is expected to gain from the introduction of a system of profit sharing. It will not be an effective substitute for payment by results, nor must it ever be introduced in order to undermine trade unionism. Its purpose is to create a psychological atmosphere in the works favorable to harmony between capital and labor.

If the antagonism between capital and labor is to be replaced by co-operation, the five conditions outlined above must be met. Some employers may argue that the workers are never satisfied, for they have tried sometimes one and sometimes another of the methods referred to above, with unsatisfactory results. The mistake has been in not applying the whole remedy.

The present situation calls not only for bold action for imagination and sympathetic insight on the part of those who conduct industry, and the first step for dealing effectively with the problem of industrial unrest must be taken by employers.

TOWARD THE COMMUNITY OF LOVE.

[Feeling that there is much of the most vital Quaker spirit apparent in the work of the small group of people, Christian experimenters, mostly members of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, who have been working in the neighborhood of Chrome, N. J., and that Young Friends ought to know more about this endeavor so similar to the ideal of many of us, we asked them for an article and received the statement of their principles which follows. While some of us may not be able to agree with this expression of service, we ought to admire the spirit of love, of abandonment, of consecration. Let no one turn away from such an experiment without asking in his own heart: "Am I as willing to serve with my whole life, with the same determination to make Christ's way of love real on earth?" We feel that it is a strong and sincere expression of a dynamic Christian faith such as one hundred per cent. Quakerism ought to be, and as such deserves the sympathetic consideration not only of all younger Friends but of all our senior partners also.—EDS.]

People have not ceased to dream of a new world, although they are saying less than they did about the "present crisis." Men are always longing for freedom to live in the presence of the beautiful and the true and the good. All the consciously upward striving people are dreaming of a world in which they will be related to each other in amity for the accomplishing of life's purpose. They dream of a world in which no nationality, no race or no class will be disinherited; in which there is no false distinction between brothers; no fear of poverty and no desire for wealth to turn men from seeking to walk the path of good; no desire to be masters over other men, and no necessity to obey anything but the voice of God in the heart. What they want is the brotherly world and all the people in it, with love toward each other, seeking truth as they now, with love for themselves, seek for good.

We, with the rest of the dreamers, have foreseen that Community of Love which some call the New World and some the Kingdom of God. Having seen it we have loved it so well that we wanted only to live in it and so have dared to begin. Our desire for God, our love for the good in men had been cramped in the old unhappy ways of life. Our love longed to go out to all freely, unhindered by any desire for self or any of the materialistic considerations which ordinarily bind people to the ugliness they resent but are helpless to accept. So we set out on the career of love resolved to follow it wherever it might lead us. It has led us to give away all our property, the desire for which separates people from each other's love. It has led us to give everything freely, our labor as well as any product of it. We would work to satisfy human need—not thinking of our own first, but remembering and answering lovingly to the needs of all, as if they were our own. It has led us to entrust all our needs to this same love in other people, which rises in response to our belief in it. We make no appeal to our own or any man's desire for personal gain by buying or selling. That an exchange of goods should be the condition of people's relations with each other is foreign to universal love which seems always to go forth regardless of a return. So we have found ourselves gradually discontinuing the use of money and losing our dependence upon it. This love has led us to live much of the time with the most forlorn of the earth, sharing their homes and giving them our labor and our love in the hope that suffering might not be their only teacher. Most of all it has created in us a spirit of search which is never satisfied and before which things that other people never question stand self-revealed. And it is probable that all of these things, part though they are of living true, are less serviceable to the good in men than the hunger of soul which has thus been sent among people. If indeed we serve at all, we serve by this, that we are learners, learners who would build on what we learn not only a philosophy but a life.

There may have been in the beginning a possible thought that we were proposing another solution to social ills—that we would take love and with it create a new world. But we have learned that we cannot "use" love for any purpose. We may just love. Then a new world is brought to birth—though few enough people see it.

That, of course, is the secret. We have felt the folly of trying to fit a new world to the people whose hearts belong to the kingdoms of this one. Dreamless they are and fearful, and they think of life in the terms of its material possessions. And we lovers of that hidden good in them know that until it stands revealed and revered no outward creation can last. For that buried love is the true creator and it fashions its own pattern perfectly. The Community of Love comes by releasing that spirit of God in the hearts of people. We began on ourselves who were the people first at hand. We want that Spirit of God. We want to liberate it so that it will live in us and grow. It will grow if we take off the chains and let it go free of our scattering, disintegrating personal wishes. And in their place we would take the wish of God and try to learn more about that for the purpose of living God's way more fully.

We feel that God must be the spirit of all life—and so in all life whether it is God-conscious or not. It seems that the universe of which we are fragments, has a soul which is God, just as we have souls which are part of God. We are united with God in proportion as we yield ourselves to universal love and the desire for universal good, which makes unity and harmony in all life. The thing which frustrates our unity in God is our desire to be personally and individually significant, and to save something for ourselves. As we grow in devotion to the community we are more wistful for its beauty and would pour into it all that is ours, and would make none of the old, old excuses; That we have bought land or oxen or have married a wife and so cannot come.

We speak much of the spiritual, the inward reality. Confuse us not with the people who dream true, whose faces are turned upward and whose lips speak for the Community, but whose hands give the lie to the song in the heart. We know that the invisible principle of life demands that it be made visible in our lives. It seeks integrity. The outward must be as the inward. Any effort to provide for one's own security must be recognized for what it is and turned into effort for the common good. It is larger. Any activity which does not accord immediately with the love which "seeketh not her own" is to be given up, for there is a greater. Any affection, any comradeship, any love which has in it any seed of self-seeking must be lost for there is a higher devotion, which is to the Kingdom of Love. Jesus was unafraid when He said that all we need will be added if we seek the true way of life.

Much of this way of life would be beyond all reach save for a conscious summoning of the love of God. Much is coming to us slowly as we long for it and live for it only, and wait for it with eager patience. But we are given no hunger which cannot be satisfied if we hunger enough. Remembering that God is within us all, we look for a miracle. But we have not forgotten that perhaps the greatest miracle of all is in the slow growth of life through love toward union with God. We are all called—one no more than another—to share in that miracle and to perform it. Of that miracle is the Community of Love toward which we are going, and of which all men will finally be citizens.

ALICE EDGERTON.

OLD PHILADELPHIA

There is something very adventurous about showing a stranger Philadelphia. There are obviously things of interest that a visitor wants to see and there are the reactions on the side of a tourist that a guide loves to witness. In this respect a recent trip through old Philadelphia with a Japanese journalist from San Francisco, was a peculiarly delightful experience. A more sensitive and appreciative visitor has not fallen to my lot to conduct.

Carpenters' Hall is a most excellent start. There is something mysterious about the Hall tucked in between great buildings which grudgingly leave a narrow lane of approach. That in itself shows progress and tragedy. A good bit of time can be spent examining its niceties, most of which are visible outside, nevertheless go in, inspect a few marked pieces, such as the Windsor Chair and the presiding officer's desk; omit the detailed scrutiny of the various framed documents that hang on the wall; evade as graciously and as quickly as possible the guardian and all will be well. Three things always stick in my memory as burrs. First, Carpenters' Hall is the purest example of Georgian (Colonial) architecture in America. Why? Because the carpenters and builders imported from England by the Colonists to build the handsome houses of the colony constructed for themselves a meeting-house correct in line and detail to the careful legend of their trade. The modillions, cornices and above all the tower on the roof bear witness to architectural orthodoxy. Secondly, the hall being a hall of persons in no way connected with the government, it was just the place for the insurgent radicals of the time, the fathers of our Revolution, to meet. These gentlemen were not invited to use the buildings of the Crown. The third thing which has always touched me is that at the time of the Separation in the Society of Friends, 1827, those seceding sought a hall to meet in. "Carpenters' Hall served their purposes very well.

The best exterior view of the Hall can be had from the corner of Orianna Street and Stock Exchange Place, but this plunges one into the very heart of Harmony Court. A powerhouse now occupies all of the court, leaving just enough room for men to squeeze by on one side and sufficient space for the imposing sign of Bank Avenue on the other. If the sign-maker had arisen to the situation he would have dubbed it Bank Boulevard, insisting on enough room for a wheelbarrow. Few visitors will believe that the sorry lot of buildings that now greet the eye stand on the site of the banking centre of the United States. A good look at the Girard National Bank building from the corner of Third and Dock Streets gives much strength to this historical fact. It is still a very substantial bank and could very well have been considered the finest building in the Colonies when it was built.

Then the best part of the journey begins. Sauntering down Third Street one leaves the rattle of traffic quickly behind, allowing chance to inspect the detail of old houses, the degeneration of store fronts and above all the interesting iron work which is visible at almost every doorway. This was a matter of much interest to my Japanese friend, as craftsmen of great skill prosper in his country. Philadelphia was well noted in the early days as the city of wrought iron. It still holds laurels in this respect and retains abundant examples of most interesting cast and wrought iron hand-rails.

At Pine and Third the story of two rival churches comes up for recital. It is evident that St. Peter's rests upon a hill at the foot of which is or was Dock Creek. Directly opposite on the far hill stands Christ Church, two edifices that claimed the church element in the Quaker town. Between them at Second and Market, Friends erected an ample meeting-house seating two thousand. It, alas, has vanished. Christ Church has the honor of having had George Washington as a worshipper, while St. Peter's certainly ranks as the most dignified and beautiful house of worship.

It is only a step to the old Second Street Market. To appreciate this market one must go back to the time when Second Street was the spine of Philadelphia, running from south to north along the high ground overlooking the river. It was the period of the three markets, South Second, North Second and High Street in the middle. The old Market Street (High) Market has long since been swept away by the irrepressible sweep of city expansion. The southern reflection, however, is still extant doing noble duty as an excellent example of Georgian market-house architecture. Because of the substantial sobriety of line, the beauty of detail and the excellent proportions of the old Market House front, it might serve a better purpose than is now assigned to it. But after all the market is a fundamental necessity, witness the Agora of Athens. The builders of Colonial Philadelphia understood this.

The Mecca of Old Philadelphia is Independence Hall. I always like to approach the Independence group of buildings from the southeast corner of the Square. From this angle one can see the fine square block tower that houses the clock, the blind alley archways, and the good lines of the supporting buildings on the respective corners of Sixth and Fifth Streets. Anyone who does not appreciate the beauty of these buildings, especially when the sun smites the soft red brick, releasing a thousand choice shades of grey, brown and red, must have a very blind sense of beauty.

The historic features of Independence Hall are obvious. In fact they are so very obvious that the City of Philadelphia has paid guardians to shepherd the flocks of pilgrims who visit this shrine. My Japanese friend and I happened to slip in the back way, inadvertently stumbling into the middle of a discourse on the virtues of the Liberty Bell. The guide by a skillful intinnabulation followed the deep tones of the object. He described with accuracy of a practised sexton, his throat boomed out the facts and figures with an astounding evenness and swing. He did not even cease the stroke of his delivery to invite us around front, but pushed it into the middle of his remarks without stop, period or comma.

"The thickness of the bell just above the rim is three inches, the total weight of the casting is three tons. Any questions? Ladies and gentlemen, now we shall go into the next room."

I am sure my Japanese friend had considerable difficulty in cutting the words apart. After a similar recital of all the important features of old Congress Hall, our guide again imperiously demanded questions. A venturesome spirit was inspired to ask about the furniture, with a very marked decline of oratory in the answer. In fact, this austere cicero went so far as to suggest that the radiator grills artfully concealed in the floors of the old fire-places furnished the venerable hall with all the hot-air save that which he himself furnished. But feeling instantly that this bit of wit had overstepped his dignity, he hustled us all, man, woman and child, into the room of the Supreme Court.

The Ferris pictures on exhibit in the Sixth and Chestnut building serve as an excellent reminder of the life, costume and character of the Colonial period. One can show a visitor these paintings as one can read a last paragraph in which all the main points of preceding pages are rehearsed. But a visit to Old Philadelphia cannot stop here.

One step further across Sixth Street up broad marble stairs into the hall of modern life, the hall of the Curtis Publishing Company. As one looks into the mosaic picture of the Maxfield Parrish Fairy Mountain Valley, Old Philadelphia is most certainly to the rear. In front is not only a most extraordinary picture of color imagination and workmanship, but also a pool of water to reflect and intensify this picture. It serves as a sturdy contrast between the romance, tragedy, jumble of an Old Philadelphia that has been a fact, that has left its debris, that has built its fine buildings and the New Philadelphia that dreams beautiful dreams, but is still unformed.

My friend, a son of old Japan, active journalist in San Francisco, new city of a new west, although very appreciative, was very silent over this prospect. He stood a long while looking into the mirror's reflections that hid in the depths of the pool.

OUR TASK FOR 1922.

We wish our readers a Happy New Year and something more! Five thousand five hundred persons in all the States of the Union and in Canada, England, France, Germany, Austria, Serbia, Poland and Japan are now receiving our little bulletin. The number is not great; the potential influence is incalculable. You are leaders of thought. You are creators of public opinion. You hold important positions in the life of your nation. What some of you think to-day large groups will think to-morrow. If you fail in your duty to think to-day and to think clearly, those who look to you for leadership will falter in the pursuit of the ideal. The success of a democracy hangs upon the wisdom of its leaders.

The Washington Conference has nearly finished its work. Whether or not it marks a turning-point in history will depend upon the way you follow it up in 1922. Public opinion is fickle. It swings from one extreme to another like a pendulum. To-day all America is talking disarmament. The substitution of law for war in the settlement of international differences is looked upon by all classes in America as a practicable goal. Whether this will be the case still in the remaining months of the year that lies before us will depend upon you. You cannot delegate your responsibility to others. Unless you hold with fixed purpose to the ideals that now are clear but to-morrow may be dim in the popular vision, we shall sink back into the militaristic faith in battleships and guns out of which we have so recently emerged.

We cannot stand still. We must go forward. We must undertake together a campaign of education through schools, libraries, churches, public meetings and private conversation, reaching the smallest community and the remotest streets of the great city, not only in our country but in every country, and cultivating everywhere the "will to peace."

To unite the people of our country and other countries in the movement which is to substitute law for war in the settlement of international differences we must:—

1. Consolidate and organize the peace forces by States and communities.
2. Educate public sentiment for "the new day" through schools, libraries, churches, and all other groups, working in co-operation with our member-organizations.
3. Utilize and extend our Speakers' Bureau for nation-wide and intensive service.
4. Develop internationally by extending to other countries the co-operation already existing with England and Japan; in this the foreign branches of our affiliated groups can aid greatly.
5. Maintain a legislation committee for the study of measures before Congress in the interest of world peace.
6. Continue our bulletin as a bulletin of the world movement.

How much can be done depends on how many people help with work and with money.

BOOK REVIEW.

"WITH THE QUAKERS IN FRANCE," BY OWEN STEPHENS.

If one is about to paint a picture a very good thing to do is to view the object with half-closed eyes. In this way the important features stand out boldly while the unimportant details drop away. Every picture should be constructed about essential features. After reading a book one can very helpfully practice a like exercise.

To my mind the outstanding characteristics of Stephens' book are, first, the chronicle, the story of the work of Les Amis in France, and, secondly, the views of the author regarding the life that surrounded him and the civilization of which we are each a part. There is no question that the chronicle feature of "With the Quakers in France" stands on its own legs. No similar account has been published to-date. Rufus Jones' "The Service of Love in War Time" appeared as a survey. The difference between a survey and a chronicle is the difference between a Rand-McNally map and a kodak photograph. Both are obviously useful. We have to thank Owen Stephens for the intimate accurate pictures of pen and pencil that are bound between the two covers of his book.

The description of Esmerly Hallon, the people of the village, the work of the boys, the sudden intrusion of the approaching cannonade, the dazed wandering of soldiers, the haphazard retreat of everyone before war, ranks high as descriptive narrative. The Great War was a jumble of terrible and petty incidents. The author has shown much skill in depicting both. Space does not permit the citation of other examples of able description. It is much better to find them at the source.

In regard to views, volumes could be written. If one agrees with another's published opinion one will invariably glow with the realization that wise men are still on the earth and some have managed to write books. If one disagrees then conditions, experience, youth or a hundred other things may have twisted the author about a most misguided finger. It is always thus.

Many subjects of prime importance to our generation are discussed by the author. Pacifism, non-resistance, the creative power of good-will, the function of politics, democracy, the destiny of civilization, these and many other topics receive intimate, frank, honest comment. It is wrong to despise frankness. We should rejoice that there are those who speak out boldly and honestly just what they think.

"With the Quakers in France" not only gives an accurate average experience under the American Friends' Service Committee operating in France, but it also reveals the searching thought and fine ideals of young men of this generation. Others who were in the French work owe a debt to Owen Stephens.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ATLANTIC CITY, Twelfth Month 30, 1921.

EDITORS Young Friends' Number of THE FRIEND:—

The presence of numerous golf-playing young Friends at our local meeting recently brought to mind a newly invented way of teaching golf through the motion pictures.

The golfer is "shot" by the movie machine while taking strokes. There is nothing unusual in the production of the pictures. It is in the reproduction that one is amazed to see what has happened at the hands of the inventor. Production was made on a "Broadway Limited" scale, but the reproduction came down to "Boardwalk" rolling-chair speed. The player sees his mighty strokes reduced in minute detail to a snail's pace.

By this method the instructor is enabled to teach his protégé to advantage. "See here," he might be heard to say, "You did not hold your stick properly. Keep your eye on the ball. You see you are looking too far ahead. Carry your strokes to the finish. The ball would have gone much farther if you had. Your feet are too far apart in this one. A 'Brassie' would have been better for that stroke. Watch the other players. The ball nearly hit that party down there."

And so we might well reflect upon our daily strokes and drives in "Meeting," while the Instructor points out not the good points particularly, but lends encouragement and suggestion as to how we may improve our playing in everyday life.

Very truly,

PAUL M. COPE.

NEWS NOTE.

MEETING OF PEACE COMMITTEE.—Those who attended the Meeting of the Friends' Peace Committee, the evening of the 16th, were refreshed by reports of work to-date and impressed with the responsibilities of the future. Francis Pollard, representative of the Society of Friends in Great Britain to the Peace Conference and Frederic J. Libby, Secretary at Washington of the National Council for the Limitation of Armaments, both dwelt on the necessity of continued peace work. The Washington Conference and a ten-year naval holiday mean little more than a good start on a ten years' stretch, the goal of which is the substitution of law for war. Finance always appears at most every important meeting as the uninvited god-mother. The Peace Committee meeting was no exception. The National Council needs funds. Friends in supporting it face an immediate emergency that will close with the Conference and the continuous appeal of educational peace work during the coming decade.

We admire and respect the great teachers of the East, but the central fact of Jesus Christ is that He claims to be a Saviour from sin. This may be expressing a theological view in terms which are meaningless to many, but it is only because of His spiritual power—and His "converting" power, that we are entitled to present Jesus as superior to the ancient teachers of the Orient. If, however, we are not ourselves convinced of the reality of evil—in our own lives—selfishness, moral superiority, pharisaic complacency, just as much as gross vice or "notorious evil living" we cannot be expected to care overmuch whether the Good News about Jesus is carried, either to our neighbors at home or to the uttermost parts of the earth. We are all indifferent to the worth of any great man or woman until they touch our lives personally. We are indifferent, also, to the pressing claims of Jesus of Nazareth, unless He has touched our lives and opened our eyes to the greatness of His message.—MAURICE WHITLOW.

"THE LATER PERIODS OF QUAKERISM."

WILLIAM CHARLES BRAITHWAITE.

The present article does not attempt a review of this remarkable book, which lays the Society of Friends, both in America and England, under a lasting debt to Rufus M. Jones. My narrower purpose is to give some expression to the thanks we owe him for his fine treatment of the English side of Quaker history in its later periods. His intimate knowledge of conditions on both sides of the Atlantic, has, indeed, given him unique qualifications for his great task. The history of Friends from 1725 to 1900 could only be adequately told by a man whose broad outlook included both the Old and the New World. The All-Friends' Conference of 1920 gave corporate expression to the vital relations between British and American Quakerism which have existed from the first and have again and again determined the course of our history. We gave America of our best in the founding and colonizing of the Jerseys and of Pennsylvania. In return, America gave Quakerism an utterance impossible under the cramped conditions of English life in the Restoration period. The Holy Experiment of Pennsylvania, in spite of all its imperfections of execution, showed that our principles were equal to the high task of founding a Christian State, and proved the potency of a policy of good-will and fair-dealing in the treatment of native races. During the succeeding generations, as is shown throughout the book under review, there was constant interaction, for good or ill, between English and American Friends. The withdrawal in Pennsylvania from the responsibilities of government in 1756 was largely determined by the advice of London Yearly Meeting. The arousing of the Quaker conscience to the evil of slavery and to the deeper issues of social reconstruction owed its greatest stimulus to the work and writings of John Woolman, and to Anthony Benezet, whose "Account of Guinea," says Clarkson (see page 318) was "instrumental beyond any book ever before published in disseminating a proper knowledge of the slave trade." Rufus Jones rightly says that the itinerant ministers "were without question the makers and builders of the Society of Friends" during the greater part of the period covered by his history (page 195). His chapter on their work (pages 194-242) is one of the most entertaining in the book.

"One natural result of this extensive itinerancy," he says, (pages 236-237), "was the eventual prevalence of a single type of Quakerism throughout the far-sundered communities that composed the Society." It was as though a common pollen fertilized every spiritual flower in the entire garden. There was no written creed, there were no fixed forms or ceremonies, nobody could quite describe what constituted the essential marks and characteristics of the Quaker 'faith,' and yet wherever Friends maintained a group-life . . . there was among them a similarity in ideas, in phrases, in conscientious scruples, in emotional tones, in spiritual perspective and emphasis, in garb and manner, in facial expression and vocal modulation. . . . Some subtle influence, without their knowledge, had transformed them all into one profoundly marked genre. That unifying influence is to be found in continuous inter-visitation of the spiritual leaders of the Society and in the moulding force of their Journals."

When we trace the influences that formed the characters of the great Friends of the past, we see again and again the important part taken by ministers from abroad, traveling on religious service. The English Friend, Deborah Darby, greatly helped young Stephen Grellet (page 207). William Savery, of Philadelphia, was the spiritual father of Elizabeth Fry (pages 351-356). William Forster, of England, and other visiting Friends, awakened the eager spirit of Whittier (page 649). John Woolman died at York, and John Pemberton at Pymont, in Germany, while the remains of William Forster lie at Friendsville, Tennessee, and of John Wilhelm Rowntree at Haverford. No less noticeable, though not always so salutary, was the part played by Friends from abroad in the upheavals in America that issued in what Rufus Jones calls

"The Great Separation" and "The Second Tragedy of Separation" (Chapters xii, xiii). In the support of philanthropic causes and of Quaker education, Friends of the two hemispheres have always worked hand in hand, and we can never forget the vast relief work in Europe undertaken by American Friends since the Great War.

It is very significant that one of the great lessons of Quaker history should be to show how closely Friends of all lands and of varying points of view belong to one another. Common traditions kept living by common intercourse, and still more a real community of vital religious experience have held us together as sharers in one great spiritual heritage. The fact that our Quaker history has been written, and could only have been rightly written, as one common history of the whole Society is the last proof of this, and it must be our care to see, as Pennsylvania governors used to say to the Indians, that the chain of friendship between us should never grow rusty, but be scoured and made strong, to bind us as one people together.

I have left little room for commenting on the purely English side of the "Later Periods of Quakerism." I endorse what John William Graham has said in his review in the Manchester Guardian—"The work of this history has been remarkably well done. It is a monument of research into facts hidden in ancient and generally dull journals. It is imbued throughout with the spirit of fairness and with a real sympathy for both sides of a controversy. . . . One might have supposed in advance that it would have been better to entrust the English portion of the story to an English writer, but no feeling of that sort remains after a perusal of the volumes. Rufus M. Jones has many English affiliations, and may almost be said to live on both sides of the sea."

Any reader of the book who studies the chapter on the work of the London Meeting for Sufferings, or the account of the Beaconite controversy, or of the influence in England of the Adult School movement will see how thorough is the author's knowledge and how wise his judgments. We, in London Yearly Meeting, have our own parochial tendencies, our own incapacity for seeing the wood because we are so occupied with the trees; and it is because the writing of this history has been in the hands of a man with a world-outlook on philosophy and religion and life that Friends have now the great opportunity of studying their two hundred and fifty years of experience as a great experiment in spiritual religion of world-wide significance.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS OF WILLIAM BACON EVANS, RAS-EL-METN, SYRIA.

(NOTE.—Emily Oliver and W. B. E. attended an Educational Conference in Jerusalem in March, 1921.)

On Third-day morning, Emily Oliver, Christopher Naish, two ladies from the British-Syrian Mission and self left Beyrouth by auto. We soon entered a vast orchard of olive trees on the plain, through which we rode for miles and miles, with the blue sea to our right and rocky, shrubby mountains to our left.

On nearing Sidon (where the plain narrows) one passes through orange and lemon groves, filling the air with fragrance, while the matured fruit also hangs. We stopped long enough in Lidon to wander through its narrow, arched streets and buy our lunch of thin bread, rose-oranges (the kind with a tang of pomegranate), cheese and halawie (an oily sweet). The "Ladder of Tyre," a steep pass on account of the projection of mountains seaward, has, during the late wars, been made passable for autos. To visit Tyre itself would have involved a three-mile digression, so we passed it by.

Below Tyre, the country was desolate, but enlivened by bird life and pretty flowers. We neared Acre, where there are some traces of the Crusaders' occupancy. Here we took to the beach. At one point in order to cross an entering stream, our driver carried us over by turn on his back, and ran the auto safely through. We passed the night at Haifa.

Next morning, turning east, we crossed the immense plain of Esdraelon, bright green with its corn (wheat). This is yet plowed in the old way—a crude, wooden plow, with cattle to drag. Then women must carefully weed the ground. Who will introduce modern plowing, etc.? At one point the plain narrows, where, 'tis said, Deborah et al. overtook the army of the unfortunate Sisera, while above on the right is the traditional site of Elijah's altar on Mt. Carmel, where Baal's prophets fared ill.

In front are the hills of Galilee. These we presently climb, and coming to the top of one, we have a wonderful view of another part of the great plain, like a soft, green and brown carpet, and on the north rises Mt. Tabor. Nazareth was hid in a circle of hills. Larks sang and flowers lay in sheets. We reached Nazareth, which is larger than I expected, about eight thousand souls. The spring, which has probably not changed place in 1020 years, was of real interest. Near the town was an encampment of Indian soldiers and it did go hard to see there the stuffed sacks for bayonet practise.

Turning south we recrossed in another direction the great plain, passing the slight eminence which was Jezreel, and could imagine the watchman looking over the plain to mark Jehu's furious riding which led to Jezebel's untoward end.

Then over the bare hills of Samaria, past Jacob's well, with high mountains on either hand. We passed occasionally a rusty auto truck abandoned in the hasty Turco-German retreat and saw bundles of barbed-wire which marked a line of defense, also a village in ruins from the bombs of an English airplane. The Judean hills are much like those of Samaria, only higher. Sheep and goats fed together in flocks, and the dark-faced shepherds smiled, showing their white teeth (or the want of them) when one waved. At length, to knowing eyes, appeared the two towers set on the Mountain of Olives, and when we came over a hill-crest, there lay Jerusalem.

I have wandered about the city a good deal, visiting the whole, rather than reputed sites. Jerusalem, they reckon, has been besieged forty times, and eight times destroyed, four of these times razed. So one can't be too sure of "authenticated sites," etc. All the same one's feeling of the actuality of the history of Old and New Testament is strengthened by a visit,—at least that's the effect on me.

One day our guide—a converted Jew from the so-called American Colony, of which I may say something later—showed us a corn (wheat) field near the city and asked that we notice the ashes mingled with soil. Here had been deposited the ashes from the temple sacrifices. In his recollection the pile was forty-five feet high and four hundred feet in circumference. Nearly all has been removed now for making mortar! So the old order changes.

Jews are flocking in again, and they are much in evidence. The most devout (or fanatical) wear long side-locks of hair, generally curled, and broad-brimmed hats. On Seventh-days, the hat is lined with fur, and there is generally more color about their garments.

Street signs are generally in English, Hebrew and Arabic. Moslems, of complexion from fair to black-African, shoulder their way along the narrow, thronged streets. Another will clear a small space in the front of his little open shop, and begin his devotions—first on his knees, then bowing his forehead to the floor, again returning to the kneeling position, apparently quite oblivious of the pass in the street, whose elbows almost touch him. Hawk-eyed, thin Arab or Bedouin women, with tattooed faces, walk erect under burdens while their husbands ride comfortably on little tripping donkeys, just high enough to keep their dangling feet from the pavement. Next come three camels in a string, chewing their cud with a side-ways lower-jaw motion, and apparently much bored by all they see and hear.

Fine Fajra oranges sell three for one piaster, i. e., three for about five cents. The fruit is a trifle thick-skinned, but delicious. Olive-colored Indian soldiers with dark beards, and clad in khaki—on their heads bulky turbans of like color—pass in companies; Greek and Latin priests, Franciscans in drab, hooded cloaks; tourists, red Bædeker in hand, etc., etc., etc.

A few words now about the "American Colony" where we stayed nearly a week. In all ninety members, men, women and children, live there, having their money "in common." Founded about fifty years ago by enthusiasts who felt the time for preaching had passed in view of Christ's expected return, they have prospered in material things, and I hope in other ways too. They conduct an orphanage of thirty girls, an industrial school, a farm well stocked with fine breeds, a paying store, a photographic bureau, and one might add a hotel—though they have no charges—you pay what you like. Much of the work the members do themselves. Things are spotlessly clean. Meals not fancy but beautifully served and dishes brought around twice. They have an hour's religious "service" in the middle of every morning, seem to have time to serve as guides to any desired point, or to do any kindness or service. A bunch of fresh flowers is a feature of your bed-room. Writing paper and ink are also provided. During the war, at the request of the Turkish authorities, they took over the care of all military hospitals. They have the confidence of Bedouin sheiks from beyond the Jordan who make the colony their home when visiting Jerusalem.

To-night the bright stars shine down on Palestine and Syria as did that other star 1000 years ago. Still men labor and love, live and die in those Near Eastern countries without recognizing the saving Christ in their hearts, without sufficient bread for their bodies, or labor for their hands. From Ras-el-Metn W. B. E. writes (Tenth Month 31, 1921): "We cannot turn out the orphans." Dare we not give while men, women and children suffer—and wait?

PEACE NOTES.

"THE FOLLY OF THE NATIONS"—FREDERICK PALMER—A BOOK REVIEW.

This book belongs with the work of Will Irwin and Philip Gibbs. Like their books it is fascinatingly written by a man who is master of his style as of his subject. Like theirs it is a condemnation of war by a man who has seen war. Colonel Palmer has been reporting wars for twenty-five years. He has had more direct experience of war than any now living except a few professional soldiers. As an expert, his testimony about what war is like, what causes it and how it may be avoided, is invaluable.

1. He calls war, the most monstrous, alluring and foolish of human dramas." In the first chapter he relates how he met an old campaigner with one eyebrow scarred, a man who had been in the Sudan, at Majuba Hill, and in the Chilean and Chino-Japanese wars. From him the young enthusiast afoot for his first adventure received the astonishing comment, "There are no good wars. All wars are bad wars." And again, "You reporters of war should be the real missionaries of world peace. So learn war—learn war from war." In the second chapter he goes back to his boyhood and the lady who influenced him as he was growing up. She had lost her husband and brother in the Civil War. She was an idealist who felt that the "world is young yet" and that in time "the war devil" will go in spite of the "stick-in-the-muds" who "try to prevent dreams from coming true and the world from growing up." At first her teachings and the remarks of the old veteran had no place in the mind of the young reporter to whom the folly of war had not yet come as "the acid of personal experience eating deep into my consciousness." Now it is a proud thought to him that he is carrying on for them both.

2. As to what causes war he has an interesting paragraph. In talking to an old Greek peasant he finds that the man regards war as an inevitable thing, like lightning, and he makes the comment—"all around us are his betters who share his views. They are products of the colleges, who read their daily papers, books, and magazines. War has become absurd to their modern mind. They hate to pay taxes; they shrink at the thought of their sons being sent into war's shambles; yet they say that you cannot stop war. Wars always have been and always will be! I know why the old peasant held that view. Why should they? Why? The question runs down through the ages of suffering humanity. Why? I have asked from dressing stations to headquarters where generals played with human lives as chessmen. As a prospector struggles over mountains and fords streams looking for gold, so on marches and campaigns I have sought the answer."

3. What causes war is very close to how it may be avoided. Frederick Palmer has no special panacea to propose. He suggests something simpler and harder. He makes out that the blame rests with all of us. We must face in the opposite direction spiritually. "We must not allow our minds and emotions to be lured into another international situation which will make such a cataclysm inevitable." He is well aware how much the war spirit is deliberately manufactured. He had charge of the A. E. F. censorship during the Great War. This is his comment: "I commend all to the censor's office who would like to taste the distilled broth of the folly of nations." "There, in obedience to regulations, one must suffer agony as he strangled the truth and squirm with nausea as he allowed propaganda to pass."

This is an honest book. It is a record of experience. It is interesting. Take this review as a taster and read it.

WHAT WE HAVE DONE IN POLAND.

Arthur Gamble.

The following is the story of what our Mission accomplished in the Powiat of Hrubieszow.

1. Thousands of morgs of land are under cultivation, due to the work of our tractors and horses.
2. The oats and barley crops of this and last year were increased by the distribution of seed that we made in the spring of both seasons.
3. Farmers are using tools, such as plows and harrows, from our distribution.
4. Twenty-five farms have been entirely set up with a full outfit of horses, carts, seeds and tools.
5. The section has a harvest of flax of excellent quality, due to the seed which we brought from the Wilna area.
6. The village schools have been developed in a large measure by our efforts, and a gardening school for boys is now running on a firm foundation. Funds are being left in the hands of a local committee to aid in the founding of an industrial school.
7. During the period of this constructive work, the returning refugees, who have arrived helpless, have been given food and encouragement to make a new start by the loan of tools and material and the gifts of medicine and clothing.

WHAT WE CAN DO IN POLAND.

The constructive work which has been done in the district of Hrubieszow, can be duplicated in many other districts as needy as was this one when we began it.

But the great field for service to-day in Poland is among returning refugees. Penniless, half-starved, diseased, these people who have for five years been away from their homes are arriving from the horrors of the famine in Russia, being pushed farther and farther west in the search of food and finally returning to where the ashes and charred bricks of their homes are covered with inches of snow, and where the fields, unplowed for five years, are covered with a mass of tangled barbed wire.

In hordes of 2,000 a day they are passing through the great disinfecting camp at Baranowicz and with wasted bodies and hardly any clothing they drag themselves over the weary miles of desolate snow and ice either on foot or in broken-down wagons drawn by dying horses.

Will you aid in bringing to these people the life and hope which came to the people of Hrubieszow because the Quakers had money to help them?

X.

The American proposition to prohibit chemical warfare did not become, as was anticipated, the subject of prolonged debate. On the contrary, the committee adopted it by unanimous vote, the day after it was presented by Secretary Hughes, in spite of the report of ten experts from the five great powers that it is unwise to try to prohibit the use of poisonous gas. The experts agreed that no nation could promise not to use poisonous gas so long as there was danger of an unscrupulous enemy using it; that, since high explosives also produce toxic gases, there will always occur doubt and reprisals; that, because gases are used in peace-time industries and are the by-products of various industries, it is impossible to prevent or restrict their manufacture; that fewer persons are killed by non-toxic gas than by high explosives or any other weapon of war; and that gas warfare, like the use of bombardment, can be restricted to combatants.

On the other hand, the American Advisory Committee presented a report to the American Delegation which pictured the horrors of gas warfare in the past, pointed out its increasing deadliness in the future, and declared the impossibility of restricting it to combatants, since it passes beyond the control of the belligerent agent and may involve a sacrifice of innocent lives over a wide area. The report concluded: "Whatever may be the arguments of technical experts, the committee feels that the American representatives would not be doing their duty in expressing the conscience of the American people were they to fail in insisting upon the total abolition of chemical warfare, whether in the army or the navy, whether against the combatant or non-combatant. Should the United States assume this position, it would be no evidence of weakness, but of magnanimity. Probably no nation is better equipped by reason of scientific knowledge among its technicians and by means of its material resources to use chemical warfare effectively."

General Pershing and Admiral Rogers, the technical heads of our army and navy, signed this report, and were perhaps chiefly responsible for it. The General Board of the United States Navy also coincided with it; and this is especially gratifying, since it is a reversal of the American opposition at the Hague Conferences to the Russian proposal to abolish the use of projectiles exclusively designed to diffuse asphyxiating or other deleterious gases. The American delegation was, in fact, the only one at the Hague Conferences which refused to accept the prohibition, and it did so on the arguments of Admiral Mahan,—arguments which were used by the Germans fifteen years later, and which "the experts" are still insisting upon. Our American experts, at least, have seen a new light; and this light has evidently come from the terrible experiences of the World War and the reaction to them of an outraged public conscience. American public opinion as thus far registered at Washington is indicated by 306,795 votes against gas warfare, and 19 votes for its retention with restricted use. It may be noted, also, that 395,000 votes have been recorded for the abolition of submarines, 6,300 for their limitation in size and numbers, and 3,700 for restricting their activities.

The Treaty of Versailles (Article 171) forbade Germany to use, manufacture or import gases for military purposes, and the same prohibition was laid by the Allies upon Austria and Hungary; now that this prescription is being adopted for the Allies themselves, there is hope that some more wholesome medicines prescribed by them for Germany,—especially in the reduction and limitation of land armaments,—will be taken by themselves. With the prohibition of gas warfare, for example, the United States can close its gas plant at Edgewood, Maryland, where facilities exist for producing unlimited quantities of the deadliest gases known to science, and can incidentally save $4,500,000 which are asked for the chemical warfare appropriation for the coming year.

It may be noted in passing that, while submarines were not abolished, the rules adopted for the curbing of their activities provide as a penalty the treatment of crews violating the rules as pirates, but that the prohibition of the use of chemical warfare is accompanied by no penalty on nations or individuals resorting to it. Thus, in another agreement, the Washington Conference is relying upon the conscience and public opinion of the civilized world. There is a tendency to deprecate these agreements as mere scraps of paper, supported only (!) by the moral sanction; but here again it is possible that reason, experience and religion will convince men that "cheating does not thrive." At all events, the world is brought face to face with a challenge to its sincerity, civilization, and belief in the righteousness and omnipotence of God.

Submarine warfare having been restricted, and chemical warfare prohibited, the question of aerial warfare was next considered by the Armaments Committee. Its sub-committee on aircraft presented a report which emphasized the great desirability of developing by all legitimate means the science and art of aviation, since this would promote commerce and communications and thereby peace among the nations. The report expressed the opinion that no rules could be devised, or would be observed, whereby civil and commercial or pleasure aircraft can be differentiated from military aircraft, and that to attempt to limit the number and character of any kind of aircraft would interfere with the desirable development of aeronautics. The sub-committee recommended, therefore, that no such limitation be attempted, but that a future conference should be held for the codification of rules designed to restrict the military operations of aircraft of every kind.

This report was adopted without debate by the Armaments Committee which passed a resolution that "it is not at present practicable to impose any effective limitation upon the numbers or characteristics of aircraft." At the same time, Secretary Hughes admitted that "in aircraft there is probably the most formidable military weapon of the future," and he expressed what he believed was felt by all the delegates—namely, "a deep disappointment in being unable to suggest practical limitations on the use of aircraft in war or on the preparation of aircraft for military purposes." This disappointment is bound to be most keenly felt by the world at large, which will look with dismay upon a competition in means of aerial warfare. The Conference will probably refer to a future conference the question of what rules can be adopted for the safe-guarding of non-combatants from aerial attacks. One who is opposed to all war, by whatever means, cannot but hope that when the world comes to appreciate the difficulty, perhaps the impossibility, of devising and enforcing adequate rules for this purpose, and when it envisages the frightfulness which aerial warfare in the future would involve, it may be helped rapidly along the pathway of abolishing all means of warfare by the abolition of war itself. Fortunately, the ten years' "naval holiday" and the prohibition of chemical warfare should point the way and give a decided impetus toward the goal.

As to the remaining tasks of the Conference, there are various explanations of the delay in their fulfillment. Premier Briand's resignation will probably cause some additional delay, and further progress on Shantung and other Far Eastern questions is desired before another open session of the Conference is held.

BOOKS AT FRIENDS' INSTITUTE.

The books now for sale on the center table at Friends' Institute deserve the attention of Friends. There are books by Friends and about Friends; books on disarmament and other subjects pertinent to the Washington Conference selected by the Secretary of the Peace Committee; books on social questions; and some charming children's books. Friends will find there the little book on Jordans recently reviewed in THE FRIEND by Janet Payne Whitney, and A. Neave Brayshaw's latest book, "The Quakers, Their Story and Message," of which "new classic," as she calls it, Elizabeth Fox Howard writes: "It is a remarkable achievement to have condensed into 148 pages the whole story of Quakerism from its rise to its latest developments in 1921, and to have avoided dullness or over compression." "It is so interesting all through that there is no desire to skip any part of it." "—but you must buy and read it for yourselves and lend it right and left." Seeborn Rowntree's last book is there with the story of his experiences and experiments in the Cocoa Works at York; Harry Emerson Fosdick's "Meaning of Service," as remarkable in its way as his much-read "Meaning of Prayer;" also Arthur Gleason's pamphlet describing the Workers' Education Movement in this country and abroad. There is William Littleboy's striking little book, "The Day of Our Visitation," which sheds light on a subject much to the fore in these days, the second coming of Christ; also Canon Street-er's book containing the message of that remarkable Eastern saint, Sadhu Sundar Singh.

Edith Darnell, in the Institute office, will be glad to take orders for any of these books, on behalf of the Book Store, 302 Arch Street.

THESE TWO TERMS—self-expression and self-sacrifice—are the two sides to man's personality. Self-expression is the personal side; self-sacrifice is the social side.—ERNEST E. UNWIN.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

A NEGRO COMMISSION ON HOUSING, ETC.—The Missouri Negro Industrial Commission is of unusual suggestion and significance. This Commission gives to its colored citizenship their first independent state department and right of investigation with recommendatory privileges. That colored people are reporting on conditions affecting their own race is the significant fact. That bad housing makes for bad morals is evident, and also that the attitude of most landlords in increasing rents and in being unwilling to repair property, arouses a spirit of antagonism in the tenant.

The report uses the expression "homeless houses," there are many such outside of Missouri—contributing to the degradation of life in all classes of society. The aim of the social worker, who is also the rent collector, is to aid in building up the Negro from within, out—not from without, in.

There are 125,000 Negroes in Philadelphia to-day and 83 applicants for two houses of The Whittier Centre Housing Company. Is it any wonder we want to journey forward?

WE often send out slit samples o Tannate Round Belting, like that shown in our trade-mark. Pulling on one of these gives a better idea of Tannate toughness than any words can do.

In this connection, a salesman tells a story like this: He handed a slit sample to the "boss," who tried it, and then turned to a big colored helper just entering.

"Here, Jim, you've got plenty of muscle, pull this apart."

"No, yo' don't! I got caught on dat befo'. Can't nobody pull dat open. I know what dat is, dat's Tannate."

CARE IN INSURANCE

The PROVIDENT was founded in 1865 by a group of Friends for the purpose of protecting the estates and insuring the lives of members of the Society of Friends.

Later the services of this Company were offered to other people who were known to be of careful habits. A careful company insures only those people who are good moral as well as health risks. This results in a low death-rate, which is one of the elements of low cost of insurance.

Care is important—in insurance as well as in other things.

IS IT VISIONARY?

One, whose use of the superlative is so free as to cause his friends to discount at times his statements, has said that the two most outstanding events in American history centre about, first, William Penn's humane plans for the founding of Pennsylvania, and second, the return on the part of the United States of its share of $320,000,000, the indemnity the Chinese government agreed to pay to the allied powers as stipulated in the treaty of 1901, closing the incident of the Boxer rebellion in North China.

Every student of our country's history knows that so long as the Constitution of the United States stands, and so long as any of the great world movements that have been stimulated by the spirit of that Constitution continue to exert an influence, just so long will it be possible to trace back through them to the principles which William Penn implanted in the colonial plan of the government of Pennsylvania.

It is claimed with great assurance by high authority that Pennsylvania has contributed more to the scheme of our federal government than any other one of the thirteen original colonies, and so every republic of Europe and, in fact, every republic that takes the United States as a pattern is under no small obligation to the righteous planner of Pennsylvania.

As regards the Boxer rebellion—the history of the uprising of the nationalist society, the effort to drive out the “foreign devil” of western influence, the assassination of the German minister, the siege of Peking and the imprisonment of two hundred and more foreigners in their city, is common property. Everybody also knows how the affair ended, and how the United States, instead of accepting her share of the indemnity, returned it in full to the Chinese government to be used in meeting the expenses of Chinese students attending at universities and colleges in this country. The influence of this movement has just begun. The good fellowship it has occasioned is apparent in many quarters and there are likely to come from it results of the most salutary character.

As the Washington Disarmament Conference has developed a spirit of mutual consideration on the part of nations and peoples, such as no previous congress or conference has approached, it is not altogether unreasonable to hope that another statement of our superlative friend may have an element of truth in it which is worthy of some consideration. It is probably not original with our friend, but he has given it shape and has offered plausible arguments in its support.

When the world was ended these astounding figures were revealed:—Great Britain had advanced her indebtedness 27½ billions of dollars, France something more than 39½ billions and our own country 24 billions. At the same time that these immense sums were being piled up as war debts, the United States, the only large nation not in the war until 1917, was offering to its citizens almost unprecedented opportunities for amassing private fortunes.

Until we entered the war, money that went abroad as loans, was from individuals and was in the form of contracts between foreign governments and individuals in America; but with the entering of our country into the war as a participant the United States lent to Great Britain, France, Italy and other smaller nationalities in sympathy with the cause of the allies a sum equal to a little less than one-half our increased indebtedness.

Now here comes in the suggestion of our visionary friend—“Would not,” he said, “a full remission of this great load of indebtedness to the allies be the wise course for us to take at this time; would it not be alike right, honorable and even expedient for us so to do?”

That such a course is likely to be taken, except it may be as a forced measure in the future, is to most of us unthinkable; but it involves certain considerations that can be set forth in a few words.

Of all that has transpired at the Disarmament Conference, so far as the public has known it, has there been anything to compare with the opening address of Secretary Hughes? And what is the feature of his address that has so impressed the public mind? Is it not that he gives expression to his faith in the better side of human nature, that he appeals to that instinctive element in the most cynical among us and tells us that there are things, positive and active at work here and now, that are making for good and not for evil? What a wonderful impetus to the spirit of brotherliness the world over, such a willing surrender of our just rights would yield! The nation, if not in spirit, at least in act, would be putting into effect one of the cardinal truths long ago enunciated by our Lord. As to the honor of such an act, as men measure honor, where can a richer opportunity ever present to practise it than in such a generous regard for friends in distress as the present condition of our late allies affords?

And finally on the economic or money side of the proposition; let it be remembered that during the period of the war prior to our entering it, there was a drain upon the countries abroad, which we who have not seen the effects, can but faintly realize. During this period we were growing rich at an unheard-of pace and let it be remembered also that after we entered the war, the money we loaned them was in large measure returned to us, it simply flowed back in exchange for the war supplies that we shipped them.

Study this great question broadly and I believe none of us will regard it simply as a schoolboy's dream. It is worthy of serious thought and is even to-day receiving a measure of favorable consideration on the part of some who stand high in our country's confidence.

If the debt is ever paid it will not be for a long time—the burden must fall upon a generation other than our own. If it is remitted from motives of unselfishness it is not possible that this generation will be leaving to the next a vastly richer inheritance than the collection of this great war debt, which not a few wise judges believe will never be collected?

There are surely great possibilities wrapped up in this proposition which our friend has presented, and when it has received a fair hearing on the part of a thinking people who are far more likely to think correctly than falsely, who can foretell what the issue will be?

Since the writing of the foregoing Dr. Eliot's review of the argument hinted at in this paper has appeared in The Independent for First Month 7th. It is too brief to be satisfying and hardly carries with it the element of conviction one would expect from such a source. Again in the issue of the 14th six or more judgments are given which compel thoughtful consideration, the reading of which should help clarify our conclusions.

D. H. F.

PROPORTION.

Sometimes I wake, and lo! I have forgot,
And drifted out upon an ebbing sea,
My soul that was at rest, now resteth not,
For I am with myself, and not with Thee.

A larger life needs a deeper faith. Are we "with sloth that slays and torpor that is crime," living on the freedom won for us by others without recognizing that, as freedmen, we have duties and responsibilities of which the slave did not dream? And, more solemn thought yet, do we forget that only by living in the spirit can we hope to have eyes pure enough to look at the whole of life undefined, and that, apart from the life of the Spirit, we lose the sense of true proportion which alone gives value to our knowledge?

It is because we know something of a truer freedom and a larger scope, that we need, more than ever, a firm hold upon those spiritual realities which are the only power that can give directness to our course.

I believe that every earnest soul must recognize the need to strive for the highest life, and the need also of self-restraint in order to be able to wrestle for it.

Spiritual vigor demands of us to renounce some things which we would not dare to label wicked.

The necessity of holding in balance the two sides—that the world is God's and very good, and yet that we dare not wholly give ourselves up to the enjoyment of it—is what constitutes the peculiarity of the problem of today and tempts some of those who keenly feel its difficulties to give up all hope of solution.

Do not the following words of Dean Paget bring into vivid relief this attitude of mind? "Cowardice is evinced whenever a man declines a task which he believes, or even suspects uncomfortably, that he was meant to face, whenever he looks along the way of faith and thinks it will ask much of him, and takes the way of comfort, and security, the way where he can be sure of continuous company and indisputable common sense. It may appear either in acting or refusing to act, according as the demand of faith is for the patient waiting, or for the prompt advance; but the central wrong of it is the withholding of the service, the self-sacrifice, a man was born and bred and trained to render; it is the sin of the 'children of Ephraim, who, being harnessed and carrying bows, turned themselves back in the day of battle?' . . . The worldly way of doing things seems sober, unexact, business-like; it keeps in sight of land; there is plenty of company along it. The other way, the way that depends step by step on God, and that goes uncompromisingly by the disclosure of His will, soon brings a man where the ordinary maxims and methods fail; where the advice of men is hard to get, and where he must solve his difficulties by the light of heaven or go back."

It has been well said by an able modern critic that "if we never commit ourselves we never express ourselves," and we need not be in much doubt about the truth of the saying. If we look at this self-committal, in its contrast with the slothful, drifting cowardice just described, we shall see that faith is its groundwork, and courage and effort are its upholders.

Whilst believing, most fully, that no discoveries will ever overthrow the fundamental doctrines of Christian belief, it is also clear that these fundamental doctrines need to be continually expressed anew.

We must strive in life, perhaps also in words, to restate, more fully to grasp in its intensity, the meaning of Christ's life and death. And as we do this, I believe we shall find that one of the great needs of the present-day is a truer appreciation of the spirituality, and therefore the reality of His presence.

It is this freedom to use every good gift, combined with an intense sense of personal relationship—bond-service St. Paul called it—to a personal God, which is the attitude of mind best calculated to overcome the peculiar dangers of the present-day dangers,—on the one hand of critical carelessness, easy indifference, or artistic self-indulgence, and on the other of morbid Puritanism, or the pursuit of an ideal too narrow to fit the facts of life.

Only it is imperative that those who call themselves Friends should remember what membership implies, and forever cast aside the wholly false notion that it makes but little demand upon those who claim it. On the contrary, the true Friend is emphatically committed, not once for all to the consequence of a creed, but to the living of a life of conscious relation to the Divine. His belief cannot be expressed in a few sentences but is not, therefore, a nonentity. Strong, deep and growing, it clothes itself, now in word, now in action, and now in that subtle garment—character, and is ever the thread upon which are strung the varied beads of life.

To some the word "consecration" best brings home the idea, to others, "faithfulness," whilst others again feel that "walking in the Light," or "the Truth" are metaphors which mean most to them; but perhaps we need not greatly fear variety of language, if only we all know something of the unity of the Spirit, something of that directness and power which come to a soul whose petty self-will and ignoble isolation have vanished in an all-absorbing sense of devotion to the Divine Guidance.—From "Drifting" in "The Way of Peace and other papers," by Joan Mary Fry. Arranged for THE FRIEND by Jane W. Barlett.

"Be not afraid to pray, to pray is right;
Pray if thou canst with hope, but ever pray,
Though hope be weak or sick with long delay
Pray in the darkness, if there be no light."

—HARTLEY COLERIDGE.

Our freedom is for service. It is here that we solve the problem of self-expression. Liberty and love are the two aspects of a complete life.—ERNEST E. UNWIN.

"In the spiritual world I cannot believe there is any such thing as suspended animation. I sometimes fear that some Friends are attempting spiritual cold storage.—From "Life of George Lloyd Hodgkin," page 85.

THE EXTENSION MEETING.

We have come away from the meeting, held on the 14th inst., under the auspices of the Extension Committee, feeling refreshed, encouraged and strengthened, and yet realizing that comparatively little was said about Extension.

In the preliminary devotional part of the proceedings, not that any part was not characterized by the devotional spirit, a chord was struck which might have received more attention to advantage, and which strictly was in unison with the concern which brought about the appointment of the Extension Committee.

Inquiries with regard to the Religious Society of Friends are coming from all points of the compass. Never before, or at least since the rise of the Society, has so much attention been called to our mission and doctrines. Using a phrase now current, we are on the map. The thought should humble, not exalt us.

The opportunities now within our grasp were brought before us clearly and vividly by the figure of the building of bridges. If we have ever been inaccessible, now is the time to make the approach more easy of access. There must be no compromise of right principles, but there should be a readiness to go forth to meet the earnest inquirers who are looking in our direction with longing for a message which may satisfy their aspirations. The time may be ripe for the "lengthening of the cords and the strengthening of the stakes." Why not now "lift up the banner for the people?"

It was well that we were earnestly exhorted to discharge our duties within our own borders. We ought to cleanse our own household before we invite others to enter. We discount no word spoken for our purification.

But we must not disregard the call from without. There is a danger in becoming self-centred.

We listened to most intelligent and inspiring addresses on the duties and mission of ministers, elders, overseers. The meeting was solemnized by the presentation of ideals of service to which many may have felt they had not yet fully attained. The following queries are not suggested with any thought of offering criticism.

Have our ministers fully responded to calls to declare the Gospel to those without our borders? Have they realized that our message may at this time be especially needed by a multitude of seekers for righteousness? I am not answering these inquiries. But are we the only people to whom it is necessary to bring the good tidings?

Are our elders concerned not only to foster the spirit of harmony among our members, but also to encourage any well-directed efforts to enlarge the bounds of our influence?

Do the overseers extend the right and proper care to those who are just beyond the border of our membership? Do they take counsel in their meetings how we may best extend the measure of our influence? Do they extend the welcoming hand, and do they say "Come with us and we will do these good?"

All these questions may be answered affirmatively in many individual instances. But have we fully availed ourselves of the many opportunities which have been offered? Are we awake to the call of the hour?

It is fully understood that we must not go forth in the Lord's work in our own strength but are we craving strength to accomplish what must surely be the will of our Heavenly Father?

Some gratifying reports might have been made with regard to the distribution of our literature in response to calls from many sources; however, such information may be confidently expected at an early date. That there is a wide-spread desire to have fuller knowledge of the principles we cherish affords an opportunity we should not ignore. I do not think it is our object to enter upon a campaign for the purpose of making proselytes, but in a simple way to promulgate what we consider to be the fundamentals of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. If any convinced persons should desire a closer union with us, let us be ready to extend the right hand of fellowship.

A. H. VOTAW.

THE GREAT ADVENTURE.

The Great Adventure is open to all. Not to every life comes the happiness of a heart-understanding with another. All are not equally prosperous, educated or content.* But not so with the Great Adventure, from which (except by their own choice) none are excluded. The Great Adventure surpasses all else. It transcends riches, honor and human happiness. It is more than life—more even than the full life. The Great Adventure is the adventure of faith.

Let none turn away disappointed or sorrowful at this. Faith is not a leap in the dark;—it is a turning of the face towards the light. It is not a limiting of the understanding;—it opens the understanding. It calls for no blind and servile submission;—it says only, "Come and see."

The queen of the South had "no more spirit in her" when she had seen the treasures, the glory, the wisdom of Solomon and the appointments of his service, but a greater than Solomon is near. He who spoke in the first century, still speaks.

Perhaps we say, "I have yet to meet with anything very definite or positive,—nothing to compel the judgment or to stir the imagination. It is true that when I did wrong I felt uneasy. I can even see how at times I have been kept from evil. But were these checks more than the results of early training or perhaps the instincts of inherited right conduct? Morning and night I pray,—but never had a definite answer. In brief, I am without the genius for religion which I believe some others have."

Here is a candidate for the Great Adventure! "And the Spirit and bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will . . . But it may be asked, "Come to what?"

Directions for entrance upon the Great Adventure might be stated thus:—Cease to seek the little, even if in the great. Seek instead the Greatest, even if in the little. This is impossible without faith.

No faith worthy of the name is required to follow the glittering lights, the baubles, the sweets that turn to worm-wood, the immediate "heavens" that lead only to hell. Nor is the highest faith necessary to arrive at an estate, an empire, or any peak of earthly fortune. And still further, without heaven-born faith men may discover the poles, new planets and great natural laws.† They may write epics, and found religions which hold millions of men for thousands of years. All this may be accomplished without faith.

But faith is required to enter at "the strait and narrow gate,"—to harken to "a still, small voice,"—to see the glorious promise in an immaterial "mustard seed,"—to be content, for present needs, with the light already granted,—to accept the guidance of an unseen hand. Who will adventure?

WESTTOWN SCHOOL NOTES.

A change has recently been made in the seating arrangements of the meeting-room, with a view of bringing the adult members of the meeting, as well as visitors, into a closer meeting-fellowship than the semi-segregation in the rear of the room permits. In place of the former arrangement of two rows of benches with a middle aisle, there are now three rows toward the front of the room,—full-length benches in the middle with a row of short benches on each side. With visitors occupying this centre row, it gives to the pupils rather more of a sense of mingling with older people as in a meeting-house, and has the added advantage of lessening the distance between the gallery and the adult members of the congregation.

Following somewhat the plan of last year, the Young Friends' Committee at the School has arranged for a week-end Vocational Conference, to bring thoughtfully before our pupils the claims of various professions, as well as the opportunities for service which each offers.

Arrangements have recently been made for work in conversational French under Madame Paulette Lacoste of Philadelphia. She spends one day a week at the School, meeting each of the various French classes. Before coming to this country two years ago she had given private lessons in Paris, and she has since coming here done considerable tutoring for college examinations and has had private classes for advanced pupils.

During the vacation Samuel H. Brown attended the convention in St. Louis of the American History Teachers' Association.

The winter has already afforded considerable coasting, together with several days of skating. The tendency in skating at the School is now toward the international style, and as heretofore Egbert S. Cary is very helpful in demonstration and instruction.

Under Albert L. Baily and James F. Walker, work has begun in clearing and improving the "arboretum,"—the piece of woodland east of the soccer field. A large number of valuable trees, with some rather rare varieties, have been planted here in past years, but there is a good deal of accumulation of underbrush and native growth which interferes with the normal growth of the more valuable planting. Quite a number of boys have volunteered to help in this work, and it is hoped that considerable will be accomplished in the course of the winter.

HUMAN RELATIONSHIPS.

FRIENDS' CONFERENCE AT DEVONSHIRE HOUSE.

From the Report in The Friend (London).

The Conference held at Devonshire House, Eleventh Month 24th-27th, was called by direction of London Yearly Meeting. The subject was Industry for Service. J. Edward Hodgkin, who presided, reminded Friends in his opening remarks of the great changes that have taken place since the last big "War and Social Order Conference" in 1916. He suggested that very little pre-war complacency is left to-day, either within or without the borders of the Society of Friends.

Maurice L. Rowntree spoke next on "The Approach to the Problem." Humanity, simplicity, and sincerity underlay his words. He appealed to Friends to take no limited view of the social problem, and especially to those who disagreed with some views expressed to unite in this time of sore need in giving of their best, help that we might all find the right way together. In conclusion, he re-emphasized the way of Jesus—namely, the way of showing love both to the rich man and the outcast, and thus bringing each to a sense of their common humanity—nay, more, of their common divinity—in a way that would impel them to seek a new way of life expressive of that relationship.

C. Delisle Burns, who was a member of the Ministry of Reconstruction during the war and later of the Ministry of Labour, spoke on "The Breakdown of the Present System." The present system is still working in spite of its defects, but there is a general and growing sense of uneasiness abroad. This is reflected in the various Commission Reports which have been issued in recent times. Why does this uneasiness exist? Monotony of toil makes it almost impossible to develop true men and women. Payment is too small. More care is needed in securing an equitable distribution of existing wealth. The denial of cultural advantages under existing conditions is another source of disquiet. These and other points he dealt with were brought out in the Minute of Record at the close of the discussion, as follows: "The discussion has focussed attention upon the responsibility of the whole community for the faults of the present system. Education of all classes is urgently necessary that we may grasp the possibilities of industry as a public service education of taste, of ideals, and above all of will. The cure for over-production is increased and more discriminating consumption, which in turn depends upon securing for the worker, both manual and technical, a larger share in the value of his product."

More than two sessions were devoted to "Experiments in Industry." Arnold S. Rowntree was the first speaker on this subject. The purpose of industry, he said, might be stated as the production of commodities of such character and under such conditions, and their distribution in such a way, as in the long run, would result in the greatest human happiness. The present was a time for experiments, rather than for dogmatizing with regard to the ultimate structure of industry. A wage sufficient to enable a man to live a full human life was the very foundation of any industrial system. As to hours, the Rowntree firm in 1895 adopted the 48-hour week. In 1919, the hours were reduced to 47 and later in the year to 44, no alteration being made in day wages or piece rates. A plebiscite being taken, it was decided to work a five-day week. Each regular worker is entitled to six public holidays in the year and to a week's holiday in the summer, with pay. The effect of the shorter hours had been varied; where the work was purely hand-work scarcely any reduction of output was noticed, and in some of the machine departments there had been a pro rata reduction. Time-keeping had been improved. The Works Doctor and Welfare Officer said that the effect on the health of workers had been good. There was an ethical need for shorter hours, that man might have leisure to develop his personality. He described the means taken to make the position of the manual worker less insecure. These include the Unemployment Benefit and Partial Unemployment Benefit. Details of these will be found in B. Seeborn Rowntree's latest book "The Human Factor in Business." He urged that Unemployment Insurance should be tackled by the whole community on really broad lines. A. S. Rowntree, in conclusion, outlined experiments made in the direction of sharing "control." Broadly, their policy had been, first, to have the widest possible consultation, and, secondly, to give a real share of responsibility in certain defined directions.

William Dent Priestman gave an exposition of the Priestman Scheme of Co-operative Production. The scheme, in brief, is: a standard of output for a given period, working under normal conditions and agreed to by employers and employed, is fixed. Any increase in this output is followed by a corresponding increase in the earnings of everybody employed in the works. The system was formed on the basis that if a number of men in a given time were capable of producing on the ordinary day rates pay a certain quantity of finished machinery called the standard output, then if by greater collective individual effort, without adding to the number of men or working more hours, the output was increased, it was only equitable that the day rates wages be supplemented by a percentage equal to that by which the output exceeded the standard. Up to the present some fifty or sixty firms representing more than a score of different industries have adopted the system entire or in modified form.

Joseph Smithson described a Co-Partnership Trust. The scheme at Halifax (350 work-people) proceeds on the basis of labor remunerated at market rate as the first charge, capital at 6 per cent. (cumulative), being the second charge and interest not paid in a lean year being made up in a fat year. Thirdly, the surplus is divided between capital in the mass and labor in the mass.

Fred Rowntree outlined the nature of industrial experiments in connection with the Jordans Village. The building of the village began early in 1910 and has steadily proceeded until there are now twenty-six workers' cottages occupied, seventeen residential cottages built or in course of erection and four more or less temporary huts. A subsidiary society is the Jordans Village Industries, Ltd. This Society has thus far initiated three industries,—building, horticulture and the stores.

W. H. Close, General Manager of New Town, explained that New Town was no longer a dream but a reality, having fused its interests with Welwyn Garden City. An Agricultural Guild and a Guild of Builders have already been formed. Scientific farming and the introduction of the Guild plan into agriculture are among the valuable contributions expected from this interesting experiment.

E. F. Wise, who was second Secretary to the Ministry of Food and one of the representatives on the Supreme Economic Council, spoke on War and Post-War Experiments in Industrial Organization. The purpose for which industry was organized during the war was production. Whilst the pre-war motive of private profit was the central force that made the machinery of civilization work, that principle was departed from during the war. A standard of life was reached then higher than before the war and higher than the standard which exists now, and at the end of the war we had a larger capital equipment and stock in hand than when the war began. Industry was largely nationalized during that period, there was central organization and a new motive, for private interest was subordinated to a common purpose, that of service to the community. Whilst the keynote of industry during the war was production, the post-war keynote is, give labor a greater share in the management and control of industry. In conclusion, E. F. Wise stated that his main purpose was to indicate that the whole experience of the war is that if you get the right motive in industry it is certain that you can get the results, the actual delivery of the goods.

Henry J. May, the Secretary of the International Co-operative Alliance, spoke on the Co-operative Movement. The previous speaker had referred to experiments, but the co-operative movement had long ago passed out of the experimental stage. It was not only national but international, and there was something like twenty-five million co-operatives throughout the world. He claimed that it was the only industrial system that had established and justified itself in this country besides the capitalist system.

Canon Hewlett Johnson spoke on "The Redistribution of the Purchasing Power." By way of illustration, he suggested that half Lancashire was unemployed and wanting boots and half Bristol was unemployed and wanting sheets, and there seemed no way to set them to supply each others' needs.

Malcolm Sparkes was the last speaker. He said that the Yearly Meeting had already declared that "service not private gain should be the motive of all work," and the purpose of that Conference was to discover the real meaning of that declaration. Industry organized for service he took to mean, first, that industry must be organized to give service and not to get it. Surely the true conception of industry is that of self-governing public service?—a great union of science and skill to do the work better than it has ever been done before—to transform a sordid scramble into a great adventure, in which all sections pull together for the common object—the organized service of the community, and no longer to pull in different directions for the division of the surplus product.

He asked for a great decision. The Society was rightly unwilling to give its corporate approval to Guild Socialism—to the Co-operative movement—to the Douglas Scheme of Economic Democracy or to any other specific plan. But believing as we did in the splendor of human personality, might we make up our minds upon this fundamental question. As followers of Jesus, could we continue to sanction the government of industry by the owners of its property merely because they were the owners? Must we not declare that the ownership of industrial capital must not confer the right to control the lives of men? Management must become leadership, and derive its authority from the whole personnel of the service. If that principle were accepted, it must be worked out in different ways for different industries.

In the Building Guild the experiment was already well advanced, and was demonstrating by the quality, speed and cost of its work that it was beginning to realize the great possibilities of a real self-governing comradeship of service. The Guild was only a year old, but it was a lusty infant. It started without any capital of its own. The Co-operative Wholesale Society Bank advanced 2 per cent. on the value of each contract, a loan which was being steadily reduced, and would be entirely cleared off on the completion of the contracts.

The annual pay roll of the Guilds now operating was £600,000. The whole endeavor was an attempt to swing the motive of production from the acquisitive to the creative: its watchwords are: Service, Adventure, Comradeship.

The last three sessions were devoted to general discussion, final considerations, and the opportunity. The Report passed for Yearly Meeting was in part as follows:—

"As Christians we believe that we must make service rather than self-seeking our chief aim. Life is of infinitely greater importance than property. Our deliberations have led us to the following conclusions, which we believe to be in the direction of a true industrial order:—

"(1) The industrial system must aim at the satisfaction of the needs of all before it supplies luxuries to any. The worker should be supported, even when there is no work for him. The responsibility for unemployment insurance must fall ultimately upon the community, either through industry or through the State.

"(2) To every man and woman should be secured the fullest opportunity to use, in and through his work, the facilities given him for the service of all.

"(3) If the worker is to do this he must be given such educational assistance in his own branch of industry as will enable him to assume an even larger share of responsibility.

"(4) The ownership of the means of production should not, as is largely the case at present, carry with it the control over the lives of the workers.

"(5) The present serious conditions in which many willing workers are unable to find employment or to obtain the bare necessities of life, coupled with the existence of large stocks of unsalable commodities, point to the urgent need for a public inquiry into the whole system of finance and industry."

ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE.

A DEPARTMENT CONDUCTED BY JOHN T. EMLEN.

TWENTY YEARS AFTER.

A Letter From Agnes L. Tierney to Leslie Pinckney Hill.

[The following letter, written by Agnes L. Tierney, after an interesting visit to the South, has been adapted to our columns by the kind permission of the writer.—Eds.]

118 WEST COULTER STREET, Germantown.

When I read thy poem in the Ledger this morning my heart thrilled to its message. It was written in a moment when thee walked and talked with God and thy heart burned within thee. But alas! hard it is to go on and keep courage when the Master seems to have departed and the scorpions pierce and sting by the way.

I just last week returned from a Southern trip with my cousin, Caroline Hazard, formerly President of Wellesley College. First to Hampton, where the usual delightful hospitality was extended. Then to Atlanta, where we spent a pleasant and interesting day and a half with prominent members of the Inter-racial Commission. Its spirit and work are beyond praise. Dr. Moton told us he looked upon it as the most important work being done for the Negro at present. The educated Negroes, and the educated whites have never come in touch with one another in the South. Education for the Negro has proved a separating rather than a uniting element, as far as association with the whites is concerned. So the record of work already accomplished by the Inter-racial Commission under the consecrated leadership of its Secretaries is full of compelling interest. It is sad it is so hampered by lack of funds.

On First-day evening we were taken to the famous Big Bethel Church to hear Dr. Singleton preach. My cousin and I agreed that it was one of the best sermons we ever heard. As you [at Cheyney] know, they are trying in Atlanta to pass a law forbidding white people to teach Bible classes of colored people or to preach to them or even in their churches. The Mayor vetoed it, but the Council is trying to pass it over his veto. It can't succeed because public sentiment is against it.

From Atlanta we traveled eight hours on a slow train to Albany in south Georgia. The school there is the one my cousin is specially interested in. Her father helped the principal, J. W. Holley, to get his education, and our great-aunt, Anna Hazard, of Newport, R. I., gave the first money for the school. Like Cheyney, it has just been taken over by the State, but alas! Georgia is so poverty-stricken that no schools, white or black, are getting their appropriations. Albany's was the only appropriation not cut, however, so the funds will undoubtedly come in time. The school has strong friends in the legislature. Two Representatives and a Senator met with the Board while we were there, and vowed eternal fidelity to its interests. To our amazement when the silent Senator at last opened his lips, he spoke in the mellifluous accents of the City of Cork. We found he had won his seat on a good and just local issue which was so bound up with hoary tradition that no native had dared to touch it. His defeated rival, a fine-looking Union man, was one of the Representatives present. The President of the Board is an old type Southerner. I was delighted to see in the flesh what I had so often read of in books—the genuine old-fashioned Southerner with his flowery phrases, his Greek and Latin quotations, classical allusions and, from our Northern point of view, exaggerated gallantry toward the "fair sex." I was limp with mirth (which he seemed to appreciate) whenever he honored us with his presence. When we were called out to see the drill, he arose and in his most courtly manner announced "Venus will now gaze upon Mars." Humor, delicacy and the milk of human kindness were so mixed in him that we loved him and admired the Christian nobility with which he and his wife in their declining years had taken reverses which compelled them to sell their fine ancestral mansion.

Dr. Holley is highly respected by everyone in the beautiful town of Albany. He came into the hotel to greet us on our arrival, which, as you know, is an unusual liberty. His strong religious faith has made a deep impression. The editor of the Albany Herald, a fine type of man, to whose influence, personal and through his paper, a great deal of enlightened sentiment is due (he, too, is a member of the Board) said Holley had strengthened his own faith. A conductor on a train sat by him the night before we arrived to ask advice on a problem of Christian conduct.

Albany is in the centre of the newly-started pecan nut industry. The editor and his wife took us out to a great orchard which has just begun to yield returns. The picturesque wagon-loads of pickers were just coming in—whole families of colored folk, with their bags of nuts, the last of a 400,000-pound crop. Next year they expect over 1,000,000 pounds. The owner says he pays his taxes from a few scattered trees on his front lawn. Over $4000 from one acre is his record at present.

Then on to Tuskegee, where we had a royal welcome. My cousin is very musical and a fine critic of music. Her address to the students on the qualities of Negro singing and its contribution to musical art was a gem. Tuskegee was delighted. The choir gave her an ovation and the next morning when dawn's rosy fingers were just fluttering above the horizon, the men of the choir gave us a wonderful serenade. We visited Prof. Carver in his laboratory and saw some of the peanut and sweet potato products which so amazed the Senators and Representatives at Washington. He has several fortunes locked up in his cabinet and every mail brings requests from capitalists asking leave to manufacture one thing or another. He intends gradually to "release" his secrets. I sent for a Boston Post which tells of his work, but every copy had been sold. My cousin had to leave for California on Seventh-day afternoon, but I stopped on until Second-day morning.

On Second-day morning the ever-attentive Colonel Wolcott, whose kind ministrations made our visit doubly pleasant, accompanied me in the motor to Chehaw, where I took the train for Montgomery. I spent the afternoon at Montgomery Industrial Training School. It is a little bit of New England dropped down in the middle of Montgomery. For thirty-five years the principal and her colleague have carried on this school for colored girls. She is a survival of the old-fashioned New England school-mistress and should be preserved in alcohol for the enlightenment of future generations. She reminded me of my own beloved New England teacher, and irresistibly recalled "Miss Ophelia" in "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Those two hundred and fifty little Alabama girls are receiving a full-strength baked-bean and brown bread course instead of their native diet of "hog and hominy." They told me every detail of the Pilgrim and Puritan history of Massachusetts. I wondered if they knew a thing about the history of Alabama. She took me to a cupboard and showed me the little bean pots and the one-quarter pound baking powder tins in which the children prepare the orthodox baked beans and brown bread to take home to their parents as an exhibit of what real food is. It is all perfectly delightful.

The children were attractive in their uniforms of blue percale with white dots and white turn-over collars, each child and uniform as clean and neat as a new pin. You can imagine what the school has done for the colored homes of Montgomery. The able and charming Dean of Women at Tuskegee attended this school.

The Principal has a wonderful parrot named "George," who has one hundred words in his vocabulary and sings a hymn. I used every blandishment to get him to speak to me, but he was dumb until I was leaving, when he called "good-bye" as I went out the door. His mistress keeps him with an uneasy conscience, feeling she ought to sell him for the benefit of her cause. I begged her not to part with her dear deliverer from monotony. She can get one hundred dollars for him, so I wish someone would send her that amount to be, as it were, a ram caught in a thicket.

The next morning before sunrise I took the only train to Calhoun, the 6.50, and joined some of the children with their shining morning faces on the mile walk up the hill to the school. What a beautiful spot it is, all those green-shuttered white houses among the trees. They were just finishing the installation of electricity, and the formal pushing of the buttons the next day was to be accompanied by an illuminating and appropriate celebration. The huge engine had to be snaked up the long mile from the station with skids and mules. It took weeks. Once it broke through a little bridge. When the colored man who had charge of it was asked how he felt when that happened, he replied, "It's jes' tamperin' with my religion." Isn't that a choice phrase to save up for a moment of exasperation?

In the afternoon I was taken for a drive in an open buggy (the roads are impossible for motors) to see the pleasant little homes of the colored people round about the countryside. The school bought up large tracts of land and has been selling it off in little farm lots to colored people, who are allowed to pay for them gradually. The result is that from one of the most degraded country neighborhoods in the South it has come to be one of the most moral and self-respecting.

Wherever we went I made it a point to ask every man and woman, colored or white, how the race situation stood, compared with twenty years ago, when I made practically this same trip with that beloved friend of us all, Emily Howland. One and all responded instantly, "Things are far better now." To me the change seemed extraordinary. Terrible things still happen and unnecessary segregations, petty oppressions and insults abound, but the educated gentle-folk of the South are beginning to see a great light, and when it fully breaks they will, I believe, be far wiser than we in the North. I could give you many instances to back up my impressions. Dr. Moton had been in Mississippi just before our arrival at Tuskegee, and in the course of his speech to a colored audience, turned to the white group present and told them just how the Negro felt about lynching and Jim Crow and other injustices. They told him they had never thought of those things before from the point of view of an educated Negro. The Mayor of Albany presided over the meeting given at the School in honor of my cousin. The Mayor of Cuthbert, another Georgia town, had a few days before gone to the meeting of a Negro Convention, welcomed it to the town and expressed hopes for better race relations. Two Negroes were lately empaneled on a jury in Savannah for the trial of another Negro. Governor Kirby, of Alabama, had recently motored over with his wife to call on Dr. Moton to explain certain legislation to him. These things couldn't have happened twenty or even ten years ago.

So let us take courage and in the spirit of your beautiful little poem go forward with faith. A race which everywhere sings with so much feeling, "Lord, I want to be more loving—in my heart—Lord, I want to be like Jesus—in my heart," must eventually conquer its enemies, not with its enemy's weapons, but with the sword of the Spirit.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

FOUR BOYS WHO BECAME DISCIPLES.—If boys had a chance to select the place where they were going to grow up and pass the period of their youth, most of them, I think, would prefer to have their home on the shore of a lake. The four boys about whom I am going to tell you now were born where they had this happy privilege without even choosing it. When they first opened their eyes on the wonder of the world, they saw the many colored lights reflected from the ripples of the lake, and the first noises they ever heard were the noises of great waves breaking on the rocky shores. The first thing that attracted their notice in their homes were the catches of fish which their fathers brought in—fish still alive and flapping.

These boys were named Andrew, Simon, James and John. Andrew and Simon were brothers. So also were James and John. The two pairs of brothers lived in homes close together. Their fathers were life-long friends and fellow-fishermen. James and John were twins. Andrew was the same age as they were, while Simon had been born a short year after they were born. Their homes were little houses with flat roofs near the edge of the lake of Gennesaret, just outside the crowded town of Capernaum. Still nearer the lake their fathers had a large boat-house in common, where they kept their boats, oars, sails, anchors, nets, fishing-tackle, and a multitude of other things which interest boys. Here the four boys had played ever since they could remember anything, and most of the great events that had come to them had happened in this same boat-house.

These four boys were very different from each other. James did not seem like a twin brother of John. Simon was not a bit like Andrew. Their mothers found out very soon that these boys were not made the same way. Each one had his own peculiar disposition, set and fixed. What pleased one did not always please the other. They all loved the lake, but they had different ways of showing their love for it and different ways of acting under all circumstances.

John was from the very first the sweetest natured of the group. He was a lovely child, beautiful to look at, and always happy. His mother, who was named Salome, knew when he was a tiny baby that "there never was such a child." He didn't cry, except when something "real" was the matter. He smiled so beautifully that he seemed like a little cherub that had strayed away from heaven. Simon was quite the opposite. He cried over the least bit of trouble. He got angry and broke things. He passed from one scene of difficulty to another. All the accidents seemed to happen to him. Nobody ever called him a cherub. He meant well but he was unlucky. He had a way of doing the wrong thing and of having even his good intentions turn out to be bad blunders. When he appeared, a storm was expected to follow soon. James and Andrew, on the other hand, were somewhat alike. They were just ordinary boys. They were neither very good nor very bad. They did not stand out like the other two. Of course James had an easier life at home than Andrew did, for it was much easier to get on with John than it was to get on with Simon, who always wanted to play but who was sure to make trouble before any game was over, because he always wanted to play the leading part.

At first they were not allowed to go out in the boat because they did not know how to sit still and keep quiet while their fathers were fishing. So they played in the sand on the beach, splashed and paddled in the water, caught minnows and tadpoles, ran races, made sand forts, and helped sort the fish when their fathers landed and pulled in their boat. They tangled each other up in the immense nets and little Simon found plenty of things to cry about.

As they grew bigger first one and then another was allowed to go out in the boat on the fishing excursions, though they were never taken out together. John was the first to go because he was sure to be good in the boat. It was a wonderful experience and very thrilling. They used the sail to carry the boat out to the fishing grounds, but when they came back with the wind against them and the boat loaded with fish Zebedee and Simon's father both rowed with all their might. Little John sat in the stern of the boat and was taught how to steer with the rudder. You can imagine how the other three boys felt when they saw the boat coming in with John, quite wet with spray, proudly steering the boat to its port as the two strong men sent it forward with their powerful strokes.

Soon each one of the boys had a lesson in steering, then in rowing and finally they were taught how to handle the dangerous sail, and how to throw out and pull in the small nets. The big nets came later. Simon was the littiest, but he was never behind the others. In fact he pulled in the small net full of fish before any of the others had made a catch. The time soon came when they were allowed to go out all together and to take regular part in the management of the boat and in the work of fishing. It was hard work, but it was at the same time the greatest possible fun. It was full of excitement. There was often danger about it and there was always something new happening.

These boys quickly lost fear. At first the big waves frightened them and the tipping of the boat in the trough of the sea scared them, but this sense of fear soon passed. They came to love the motion of the boat and they cried with delight when the big waves broke over the boat. The element of danger added something to their joy. After they had learned to swim they gained a sense of power over the water. Occasionally, however, they had terrifying experiences. Gennesaret was a treacherous lake. The hills and steep shores acted like great funnels through which the wind rushed down and plowed the water into furious furrows. Sometimes the lake would change in a few minutes from almost calm to the wildest scene of turmoil, and the boat would seem like an egg-shell swept along at the mercy of angry billows. Sometimes in these sudden squalls the boys were forced to throw all their fish overboard to lighten the boat and enable it to ride the mighty waves. John never showed the least sign of fear in these times of crisis. Sitting at the rudder, as he usually did, with a fine color on his face, he held the boat as well as he could across the waves so as to avoid the dangerous hollows, and showed the nerve and spirit of a man.

XI.

The topic of most interest in Conference circles this week is China. Secretary Hughes proposed to the Committee on Pacific and Far Eastern questions a series of four resolutions designed to "open the door" into China and to keep it open; or, as the Secretary himself phrased it, "to make the open door in China a fact, and not merely a motto." The resolutions define the open door as "equality of opportunity for the trade and industry of all nations." When asserted by our Secretary of State, John Hay, twenty-two years ago, it was designed both to secure this equality of opportunity for foreigners and to prevent China from becoming dominated, politically as well as industrially, by any one or more outside nations. This two-fold object is sought by the four resolutions of Secretary Hughes; and to secure both the opening of the door and the keeping of it open, the resolutions provide for the creation of a Board of Reference to which any question regarding the open door may be referred for investigation and report.

This Board of Reference is a concrete plan for carrying out in practice what is agreed upon in principle; and it forms an interesting development of the plan adopted at The Hague for the creation of International Commissions of Inquiry. It was argued at The Hague Conference that if you investigate before you fight, in nine cases out of ten you will not fight at all. Hence commissions were agreed upon for international, impartial investigation of international disputes. A number of these commissions were resorted to, in the years preceding the World War, and met with complete success in the settlement of several difficult and dangerous disputes. When the Austrian Archduke was assassinated in the fateful summer of 1914, and Austria accused Serbia of inciting the crime, efforts were made to have the question of fact submitted to an international commission of inquiry, in order that the truth could be arrived at, published broadcast, and allowed to prevail. But the nations believed themselves by that time to be "armed to the teeth" and, consequently, "invincible;" hence the appeal to the Sword instead of to the Word. Once more at Washington, this promising device for securing justice and maintaining peace is resurrected for specific application in the Pacific; and as this time it is to be accompanied by a reduction and limitation of armaments, it should meet with a constantly increasing measure of success.

The fourth resolution proposed by Secretary Hughes provided that there might be submitted to the Board of Reference those concessions already made by China which are inconsistent with the principles of the open door. Since these concessions date back to 1842 and continue down to 1915, and are of grave importance to the political and economic life of China, as well as to the amicable relations of the outside powers with China and with one another, this fourth resolution was at first considered of great significance. The Italian and British delegations at once accepted it; but the French and Japanese delegations opposed it, and on the suggestion of the Canadian delegate, the American delegation withdrew it. This withdrawal was featured in the daily press as a defeat for American diplomacy. Secretary Hughes explained in an interview yesterday afternoon that the unanimous acceptance of the first three resolutions, embodying the principles of the open door and the creation of the Board of Reference, was evidently dependent upon the withdrawal of the fourth resolution; and that in his opinion the first three resolutions were of far greater importance than the fourth. Governments, of course, could not be compelled by outside force to live up to any of their agreements; and the fourth article provided simply that past concessions might be submitted to the Board of Reference. Hence, the frank, free, definite acceptance of the principles of the open door was the chief essential. As for the past, every nation would reserve intact its right of protest, and every other right that it has heretofore possessed, in face of whatever it may consider an infringement, past or future, of the principles of the open door.

In order to drag out into the full light of publicity all the concessions secured from China by the other powers, Secretary Hughes further proposed that a complete list of these concessions should be prepared by each of the nations concerned, and laid before the conference and the world. This proposal was unanimously adopted, as were also the three resolutions embodying the principles of the open door and the creation of the Board of Reference. This result was preceded by a long debate in which the origin, history and meaning of the open door was very fully and unmistakably set forth; so that in future there can be no dragging forward of secret treaties, past or future, as a bar to justice, and there can be no room for misunderstanding or evasion in regard to the open door, while the solemn acceptance of the agreements regarding it should solve, if they are lived up to in good faith, the most serious of China's foreign problems.

The problems associated with Shantung, such as its railroads, mines, and telegraphic connections, are now on the eve of satisfactory settlement; but Manchuria, Mongolia, Thibet, and Siberia are still to be grappled with. As a by-product of the Conference, the questions relating to the Pacific cables, and especially to the much-disputed one connected with the island of Yap, have also been answered to the satisfaction of all concerned.

The completion of the treaty relating to the reduction and limitation of armaments still hangs fire, and for two apparent reasons. A strong difference of opinion has arisen between Japan and Great Britain as to whether or not the agreement to discontinue the strengthening of fortifications in the Pacific applies to the important British naval base at Singapore and to the Japanese islands of Bonin. The two governments are trying to come to an accord on this question; and meanwhile, the fall of the Briand ministry and the accession of the more militaristic Poincaré as Premier of France has caused some anxiety lest France should repudiate the agreements on armaments which Briand promised at Washington to accept. Poincaré is determined to exact from Germany all the reparations provided for in the Treaty of Versailles, and to maintain and use for this purpose, if necessary, the army of 800,000 Frenchmen and colonials now under French colors. If this great army, with the materials offered by Germany, could be set to work at the task of reconstruction, in the spirit and effectiveness of the young men and women who worked in France under the star of the American Friends' Service Committee, for example, there would be far stronger hope of the speedy reconstruction of France, the pacification of Europe, and the reduction and limitation of all kinds of armaments on land and sea, and in the air.

The new Premier, it is true, has written to Secretary Hughes that "we are earnestly desirous of collaborating closely with you, as did our predecessor, in the work of peace being carried on at the Washington Conference." It is greatly to be desired that the French statesmen would follow up their acceptance of the American proposals "in principle," by applying the principles they profess to the actual needs and duties of our time, and would make their performances square more nearly with their promises.

But, while preparing for the worst, we must hope for the best. How prayer also is coming to the aid of hope in behalf of the Conference, is indicated by the fact that 10,093,845 Americans, out of 13,871,671 who have addressed it, have said that they were sending up pleas for Divine guidance and aid in the accomplishment of its tasks.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

THE report of the Representative Meeting is held over till next number.

CONFERENCE OF MINISTERS, ELDERS AND OVERSEERS.—After lunching together, which did much to dispel any possible stiffness that might have attended such a meeting, the large and representative group of Ministers, Elders and Overseers of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting gathered in the West Meeting House, Fourth and Arch Streets, on Seventh-day afternoon, First Month 14th. Members of the Extension Committee, under whose auspices the conference was held, were likewise in attendance, and the body of the house was well filled.

A devotional period of half an hour preceded the Conference proper, which was presided over by the Yearly Meeting Clerk, Davis H. Forsythe. The subject of the Ministry claimed our attention first, and was introduced by Alfred C. Garrett. He showed how, in the first days of the Church, the prophetic ministry had characterized their worship. This "prophetic ministry" included the three groups mentioned in Ephesians as "apostles, prophets and teachers." Alongside of this was the "official ministry" of "elders, overseers and servants," who, when the prophetic fire began to burn low, supplanted the first group. The early Society of Friends had been concerned to revive this "prophetic" ministry, under which we should do well to recognize the several variations.

Ann Sharpless followed, on "The Lack of Women Ministers." She called attention to the fact that this disproportion had probably always existed, so that we should not be too much disturbed about it, and pointed out that a numerical increase in ministers was less interesting than the attainment of a spiritual condition amongst the membership out of which a living, adequate ministry would spring. If we fail in this, we shall be but wanderers in the wilderness.

Max I. Reich bade us consider the "four-fold ministry," as developed in Ephesians iv: 11, 12. (He grouped "pastors and teachers" together.) Is the dearth of anointed ministry to-day due to a more meagre outpouring or to gifts being quenched? The true evangelistic ministry is one form almost absent from our meetings to-day, nor do we have much teaching. What we hear is mostly in the line of exhortation.

Alfred Lowry next spoke, touching upon some aspects of the itinerant character of Friends' ministry, and the important part that "traveling in the ministry" had played in the Society's history. Meetings should be quick to encourage every right concern of this character, once they are convinced it is right.

The next general subject was that of the Eldership. Sarah W. Elkinton felt especially that Elders ought to be open to new aspects of truth and to fresh kinds of ministry, not feeling that the Divine current must flow down certain set channels. Carroll T. Brown contrasted the popular idea of eldership twenty years ago with to-day's conception. Then it was considered to be largely negative, now it is regarded as something constructive and positive. A minister, he felt, is not one commissioned to speak to a group or to go to a certain place, but rather a channel by which the collective yearning and aspiration of the meeting finds expression. The ministry is soundest when it is voicing this united spiritual aspiration, and the elders should do all in their power to further and encourage this sort of expression. Eldership should mean the creation of the spirit of Christian fellowship in groups, out of which arises the true ministry. (This, in a way, linked up with Ann Sharpless's thought, as outlined above.)

Anna Rhoads Ladd felt that individual ministers, elders and overseers are often lonely in their own lives. They feel their duty to the flock and strive to fulfill it to the best of their ability. Elders should seek to encourage other members of the three groups. Walter T. Moore called our especial attention to some of the implications of the brief paragraphs on eldership in our Discipline. We hope to be able to print his paper in a later number.

Paul D. I. Maier, of Western District Monthly Meeting, spoke on the functions of the Preparative Meeting of Ministers and Elders. He felt that the period of worship, while it ought to be a time of serious retirement, should not be too long, so that the business of the meeting could be taken up while the members were still spiritually fresh. To "labor harmoniously for Truth's honor" means that ministers and elders should look into the problems of the Monthly Meeting and its best life. He outlined, by way of practical suggestion, some of the questions which his own meeting had thus examined. This does not trespass upon the work of the Overseers or other committees.

Mary C. Roberts, Francis R. Taylor and George Vaux, Jr., spoke on the problems of the Overseers. The Book of Discipline was quoted, with its clear, forceful wording on the subject. Suggestion was made that the burden and privilege should be shared, and the overseers be changed oftener, instead of being re-appointed after every three-year period. Should the positions of Elder and Overseer be held simultaneously? One speaker outlined the duties of the Overseers, calling attention to the fact that they are not a "Board of Managers" to whom is exclusively assigned some special work. But the third speaker felt that Overseers should make a report of their activities to the Monthly Meeting, because they are, after all, administrative officers. Overseers should accept the appointment with gladness: "I will gladly be a door-keeper in the house of the Lord." Ministers, Elders and Overseers should, all three, "revamp" their conceptions of their functions.

In the general discussion which followed many valuable thoughts were expressed. Mary J. Warner felt we must be willing to venture our faith more, to stand alone with God, when necessary—in spite of being misunderstood, ridiculed, persecuted. "We must push out our frail barks into the river." Susanna Kite referred tenderly to the experience of Edward Burroughs and John Woolman. Bernard Waring felt we were too "socially crystallized" and instanced a newly-established meeting where no one is allowed to sit in the same place twice in succession! Edward Wistar, Benjamin S. DeCou, E. Maria Bishop (of England), Susan Mendenhall, Hanson Holdsworth and William H. Zellely likewise contributed to the discussion. The value of the now almost extinct practice of "family visiting" was dwelt upon by two or more of these Friends, in the hope that it might be revived.

Arrangement had been made to adjourn shortly after four o'clock, so, although discussion might have continued for some time longer, after a brief pause, the meeting concluded. However easy it might be to point out weaknesses in the Conference, the outspoken frankness of expression was refreshing, and there was, uniting those in attendance, the strong bond of a deep, common interest: the best life of their "beloved Society" and the extension of the Kingdom of God.

SOME of our members continue their interest in the Housing problem as a ready-to-hand avenue of expression of community interest and real brotherliness. We are indebted to Harriett J. Randolph for notices of six weekly lectures (on Third-days until Second Month 21st, 2.15 to 3.45, at No. 1222 Locust Street) on Housing. Such subjects as "Renovation of Old Houses," "Model Houses" and "Garden Cities," should have a wide appeal.

WE are indebted to a member of William Lloyd Garrison's family for an unexpected item of Friendly News. Westtown scholars of the '70's will have grateful memories of "Master" Isaac N. Vail. His wide range of knowledge seemed equal to every problem that was carried to his desk in the "Study Room" by perplexed youth. Occasionally he let individual students in conversations, or the whole school by lectures, into his theory of "annular evolution." He believed the rings of Saturn to be water and that similar rings once surrounded the earth. The fall of these rings caused the flood, and accounted for numerous unsolved geological riddles. In addition the theory was, to our enthusiastic friend, a key to numerous difficult Scripture passages. All this was fully set forth in a large book circulated after Isaac N. Vail's retirement to California. We are disappointed not to find a copy of this book in the Westtown library.

The point of present interest called to our attention by F. W. Garrison, is that a weekly journal, The Equitist, published in Bay View, Skagit Co., Washington, quotes Professor Vail's theories and recognizes them as authoritative. The editor, W. E. Brokaw, is evidently a well-convicted advocate of a theory that some of us have not heard mentioned for thirty years.

DOERS OF THE WORD.

When some weeks ago a prominent German was quoted as saying that in all the sad débâcle that had befallen his country the Quakers only had proved to be "doers of the Word," we were inclined to look upon the statement as one of those very natural exaggerations, sure to come in the wake of self-sacrificing food-relief. Since that time, however, there has been some reason to conclude that this imported observation was actually a product of a carefully analytic mind. If, then, we make such a choice, it may be in a helpful way self-revealing to us. Indeed, it may assist to an understanding of certain implications of "our profession" from a new point of view. Doers of the Word, then, as intended by our German Friend, did not mean merely "doers of good deeds." Even at this distance we know that in Germany Quakers as elsewhere have no monopoly of good deeds. The characterization, so far as it is valid at all, has reference to a method rather than to a motive or a result. On the negative side Quakerism has been in protest for more than two hundred years against the expression of the Word in ritual, dogma or creed. Any Quaker, however, that goes no further than a negative position is at best a reproach to Christianity. To be vital Christianity must have positive expression. It cannot live otherwise. And what is it that Christianity must express? Naturally enough we say Christ. To very many that means the Christ of history, the Christ of the Gospels. And in order to express Him those who make this the starting-point construct theories of salvation, systems of organized church life, and of personal service in accord with these. The real Friend, we take it, would not wish to belittle such processes. He might be brought to a place where he could heartily co-operate with them. But he does have a different starting-point. "The Word" is a "lamp to his feet," for every act of every day. He lives enough in the "light of His countenance," the countenance of the revealed and revealing Christ, to know how often and how miserably he fails in this expression, but the "Word is his life," and leads him safely step by step, as he surrenders to "the safe guidance of His witness." This divine vision or Word has an inexhaustible potency.

It turns back to the Christ of history with adoring discipleship, it turns forward to the Kingdom of God, in the making of the doers of the Word, with recognizing fellowship. It is after all the rock upon which Christ said He would build His Church.

The necessities of these latter days—these unprecedented war times and post-war times, have greatly emphasized the need of what is commonly called "group functioning." Against calamities like the Russian famine, or the economic collapse of Europe, what does an individual count—the whole of his wealth, the whole of his life? Only as multitudinous units become appreciable aggregates, mobilized by Associations or by the nation itself, can one see a ray of hope. Even then millions must perish—the sum of miseries must be incalculable. At such a time when the call to be, individually, doers of the Word, seems to be lost in the necessity for corporate action, the personal obligation actually has an increased value.

All the necessary machinery of organization to give food to a million hungry German children, did not conceal from one on-looker at least the fact that so far as the Friend was concerned it was done to express God. He was a doer of God's Word. So it may well be in all the minute details of everyday life. Only so can Christianity retrieve its lost prowess. The organization may become an instrument of service, but it cannot absorb nor release the individual from personal responsibility.

What the Society does may seem to cover us with some glamour of satisfaction. We may point to relief work in Germany or in Russia with pride, but just across the street, or next door (at times under our very roof) are those who know, and who are saying, we are or we are not "doers of the Word." We must administer a sacrament of life or of death, whether we have taken "Holy Orders" or not.

THE MEETING FOR WORSHIP.

Now silence broods o'er all. With one accord
All lowly bend to hear the Inward Word.
The worshippers within Thy shrine behold,
Without a veil, what never can be told.

With kindred spirits, yet alone with Thee,
We feel the pulse-beat of eternity,
Where deep calls deep—let images depart—
Thou'rt art the satisfaction of the heart!

In mystic fellowship with saints in light,
Whose lonely quest has melted into sight,
We hail the nearing consummating grace,
The crown of all, the vision of Thy Face.

ELDERSHIP.

[This paper was read at the Conference on the 14th ult., at Fourth and Arch Streets. It is printed at our request.—Eds.]

In approaching the subject of the Eldership, it is well to bear in mind that the Religious Society of Friends is founded on the principle of a pure democracy. We find Spiritual power and Church organization are closely inter-related. Organization, however, is subsidiary and not an objective in itself.

This means that a measure of responsibility rests upon each individual member. We cannot all be apostles, we cannot all be prophets or teachers, but each one can contribute something to the common welfare of the body and the advancement of the Kingdom. Herein lies our great opportunity and privilege.

We are members one of another and are enjoined to watch over one another for good.

The strength of a meeting rises or falls according as this Gospel order is observed, and as diversified gifts are cherished and brought into action throughout the body. We want to develop and deepen this sense of responsibility in things spiritual as well as in things temporal.

Furthermore, the central and outstanding feature of our congregational life is the Meeting for Worship, and the life of such meetings, if it abounds, finds expression in the ministry of the Gospel which may be exercised in various ways.

Now in all this, the Elder is assigned a real place and one of great value if rightly filled. The Book of Discipline does not present much in clear outline as to the duties of Elders. The words are few, but the implications are large.

Broadly speaking, they are to look after the spiritual life of the meeting and the ministry. In the effort to discharge these duties worthily, we are often brought to realize that we are not sufficient of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God.

As a vital element in our conception of worship, we want to create an atmosphere conducive to the growth and fruition of the true ministry.

"Feed my lambs," "Feed my sheep"—what a deep meaning is conveyed in these words spoken by our Divine Master! Now as to some practical thoughts by way of suggestion:

1. Elders and Overseers as well should so far as possible attend regularly all of our Meetings not only for their own refreshment, but as a helpful example to others.

2. They should cultivate the personal acquaintance of the members and attenders of their respective Meetings. The visitation of families in their homes opens a wide field for mutual helpfulness and a warm fellowship.

3. Our sympathy and attention should be extended in a special manner to the younger people who by the written or spoken word or by their daily lives give evidence that the hand of the Lord is upon them.

4. As to the ministry, Elders should take counsel together, conferring freely and candidly among themselves as to the best course to follow in the direction of constraint or restraint for the help of those who engage in vocal service. In a multitude of counsellors there is safety when dealing with the affairs of the Church.

Let us then pass on these aims with gladness and singleness of heart, and in that Gospel love which seeks only one another's good, remembering for our encouragement that the promises of God are exceedingly great and precious, particularly to those who turn others to righteousness.

WALTER T. MOORE.

AFTER all, we have to come back to the personal side of the matter (the spread of Quakerism) and ask our own hearts some searching questions. Have I myself given my Quaker faith and practice a fair trial, and thrown all my best energies into it? Have I done anything personally to pass on the Quaker message with enthusiasm to others? If we can honestly say yes to these questions, we are not likely to be among those who look forward with fear and pessimism into the coming year.—ELIZABETH FOX HOWARD, in "Have We a Message for To-day?"

GOOD MEDICINE FOR THE TIMES.

EXTRACTS FROM THE "CONCLUSION" OF THE "MIRRORS OF DOWNING STREET."

It is to be hoped that the children of the present generation of aristocracy may grow up with no taste for the betting-ring, the card-room and the night club, or, at any rate, that a certain number of them may find their highest happiness in knowledge and wisdom rather than in amateur theatricals and fancy-dress balls. The human mind, after all, cannot rest in triviality, and after so long a period of the most sordid and vulgar self-indulgence it is reasonable to hope that our aristocracy may experience a reaction.

If men would ask themselves before they rush out to seek her, What is pleasure?—and consult the past history of humanity as well as their own senses and inclinations, they could hardly fail, except in the case of the most degenerate, to discover that the highest happiness is not of the nursery or of the kitchen, but rather of the living spirit.

Observation of nature, love of beautiful things, delight in noble literature, gratitude for the highest forms of wit and humor, sympathy with all sorts and conditions of men, reverence for the majesty of the universe, kindness to all, love of children, and devotion to the home, these operations of the human spirit bring peace to the heart of man and continue their ministrations to his happiness with an increasing power of joy as his personality enlarges itself to receive the highest revelations of Life.

Religion in these days is obviously too complaisant. To watch the Church in the world is to be reminded of a poor relation from the provinces sitting silent and overawed in the gilded drawing-room of a parvenu. There is no sound of confidence in her voice. She whines for the world's notice instead of denouncing its very obvious sins. She is too much in this world and too little in the other. She is too careful not to offend Dives, and too self-conscious to be seen openly in the company of Lazarus. It is impossible not to think that a coarse world has shaken her faith in Christian virtue. She clings to her traditions and her doctrines, but she has lost the vigorous faith in spiritual life which gave beauty to those traditions and has ceased to set that example of entire self-sacrifice which rendered her doctrines less difficult of interpretation by the instructed. She has ceased to preach, even with the dying embers of conviction, that a man may gain the whole world and yet lose his soul alive.

Where is there now among the possessing classes an example even of simplicity in dress, modesty in behavior, temperance in conduct, and thrift in living. As for any higher example—an example of wisdom, duty, self-sacrifice, and moral earnestness—it is nowhere visible in our national life to those who look upward.

We need the Puritan element in our characters, the Hellenic element in our minds, and the Christian element in our souls. We must set a higher value on moral qualities, on intellectual qualities, and on Christian qualities. We must learn to see, not gloomily and heavily, but with joy and thanksgiving, that our world is set in the midst of an infinite universe, that it has a purpose in the scheme of things, that we are all members one of another, and that there is no grandeur of character, mind, or soul which can ever be worthy of creation's purpose.

QUAKERISM, as we are often reminded, can be as slack and lazy a form of religion as exists. Even if a man still keeps the habit of attending meeting, he need only sit there and occupy his mind as he chooses. The nominal Quaker can carefully keep out of all the activities and obligations of the Society and then complain that it is a dying concern. He can live on a second-hand reputation, and criticize the keener spirits who try in times of war or in matters of social reform, not only to be true to the faith of their fathers, but to strike out new lines for this generation. This type of Quaker naturally has no Gospel for the needs of the day. Has he one to meet his own needs?—ELIZABETH FOX HOWARD, in "Have We a Message for To-day?"

CONFERENCE ON EXAMINATIONS.

An investigation of the College Board Examinations and the criticism called forth by them was the basis of a most interesting and illuminating conference of the Friends' Educational Association, Seventh-day morning, First Month 21st. The subject was viewed from all angles, Stanley R. Yarnall opening it with detailed information on the preparing of the questions. Work is begun eighteen months before they are to be given, by five examiners in each subject. Months later this work is submitted to ten other experts, generally from the schools, who review it carefully. Only one of the five examiners is changed each year. They are watching with interest the new so-called scientific types of examinations.

Richard M. Gummere welcomes a test that comes from outside the school as being less personal, less subjective. He believes in starting as low down in the school as possible with preliminaries, to stimulate scholarship. More variety in the Latin authors should be allowed, lest too close following of tradition kill the subject. Every type of examination should be given. Dr. Gummere concluded with the statement: "One hundred and twenty per cent, teaching will make for success in any of the examinations."

Emma D. Roberts (Germantown Friends' School), from the standpoint of the proctors, wished the time of year for giving the examinations could be changed, as it was impossible for candidates to do themselves justice writing six or seven hours a day in a room with the thermometer at ninety degrees.

Samuel H. Brown (Westtown) spoke for the Readers of History papers. He noticed the absence of the arbitrary frame of mind. The readers meet and figure on the scale of grading, but the personal equation causes variety in grading, especially in that begun with questions: "Identify, etc." Critics might not be so sympathetic with those who fail if they saw some of the atrocities submitted. Picking out all facts from accepted text books and "pounding these in" seems the only sure way of passing these examinations.

Dr. George C. Chambers and Dr. George W. McClelland spoke for the University of Pennsylvania; the former thinks the new form examination a step in the right direction, but fears a tendency to make teaching too formal; he disapproves of the questions to be answered by "yes" or "no," and thinks no single type should be the test. Dr. McClelland believes the "power to do, without the guiding teacher at his elbow," should be the aim. He considers the comprehensive examinations better because they are less definite, and seconded Dr. Gummere's remarks about more latitude in the classics, saying "they are standing in their own light."

Dr. Eunice Morgan Schenck, of Bryn Mawr College, considers the comprehensive plan better because the papers are read in entirety.

Frederic Palmer, Jr., Dean of Haverford College, believes the difference in marking is largely due to faulty or ambiguous questions. He considers the College Board questions too difficult and not often a test of the candidates' power to do college work.

L. Cheney Smith (Friends' Select School) finds the College Board questions not varying much from year to year in Mathematics—they are valuable as a motive for work.

Ruth S. Goodwin (Friends' Select School) regrets the prodigal waste of vitality for college girls.

Carroll T. Brown prefers the comprehensives as allowing more latitude to the teacher. He suggests that unless the examination seems too easy to the examiner it is too hard, and favors limiting the ground covered in information.

Jane S. Jones (Germantown Friends' School) says the readers gain much by finding what other schools are doing in the same subject. All teachers should try to give children confidence in meeting the test.

The "percentile" instead of the "percentage" method of rating pupils was then discussed, and a table for percentile grading will be available soon.

The excellence of the addresses, which said much in few words, bore witness to the earnest spirit of real education that exists in our schools and colleges to-day.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL NOTES.

The School Meeting on Fourth-day mornings this winter has had the privilege of visits from William Littleboy, Dr. William W. Cadbury, Gurney and Elizabeth Binford, and Wilbur K. Thomas, in addition to regular Committee members.

The School of Education of the University of Pennsylvania and the Illman Kindergarten Training School have been sending quite a number of students to us for observation, for which credit is given.

Recent lecturers and speakers before the School have included Kaji Yajima, "The Grand Old Woman of Japan," her companion and secretary, Azuma Moriya; Professor William Lyon Phelps of Yale University, who lectured on "What There Really Is in the Bible for Boys and Girls;" I. B. Stoughton Holborn of Edinburgh and Oxford, who lectured on "The Need for Art in Life;" William Webster Ellsworth on "The Joy of Writing."

Public evening lectures have been delivered by Anna J. Haines on "Russia Now;" President William W. Comfort on "Dante;" President Arthur E. Morgan on "The Antioch College Experiment;" and Frank D. Slutz on "The Moraine Park School."

A number of new pictures have recently been placed in the School. Some of these are enlargements of photographs of Greek and Roman subjects taken by Walter F. Price and H. Arnold Todd.

Alice Owen Albertson has been appointed Alumni Editor of the Caidron, the School magazine.

Jacob R. Elfreth of Lansdowne, who was at the School from 1848 to 1854, has recently sent in a list of the boys who were in school at the same time with him. This list includes one hundred and sixteen men, of whom six are still living, Marcellus Balderston, Stephen G. Collins, John W. and Joel Cadbury, John E. Carter, and Ezekiel Hunn. John B. Garrett left the School about a year before Jacob Elfreth entered, and Charles and Francis Richardson were also almost contemporaries. Any information about other men and women who were at the School about the same time or before 1870 will be gladly received by the School.

FRIENDSVILLE ACADEMY.

ELBERT RUSSELL.

Friendsville Academy is located in East Tennessee, twenty miles south of Knoxville. The village of Friendsville lies in the Tennessee Valley, between the Cumberland plateau on the west and the Great Smoky Mountains on the east. It is a favored location, both in its scenery, climate and soil. My father described it in these words:

Where's a climate so kind and so bracing an air,

And mountains so pure and so blue?

Where are caves that for beauty or wealth can compare

Or scenes so enchanting to view?

Where's the country encircled with mountains so grand?

Where can valleys so beautiful be?

And where rivers that roll by so fertile a strand

As the streams of our East Tennessee?

Blue skies that bend down over hills evergreen,

Where the vines thrum the tall tree tops run;

And streamlets leap down in the wild glens between

To wander away in the sun;

Where the cornfields are lying like dark speckled isles

In the waves of the golden grain sea;

And the snow of the cottonfelds glistens and smiles

Like the foam on the blue Tennessee.

The Academy was first organized as a Monthly Meeting school by the Morgan brothers, who afterwards founded Penn College.

"About 1870 Rebecca Allinson, accompanied by Marmaduke Cope and Sarah Cope, his wife, visited the eastern part of Tennessee, and seeing the need of boarding facilities for the students that attend the Academy at Friendsville, assisted by Robert B. Haines, Sr., and his wife, Margaret Haines, Edward Scull and Yardley Warner, who also had visited the Friends of Tennessee, they built two boarding places, one for the girls and the other for boys. The girls' home being named in memory of the distinguished English Friend, William Forster.

"About 1900, Elizabeth Farnum, having visited Friendsville Academy and seeing the need of better educational facilities, built a new Recitation Hall that was named Farnum Hall in memory of the donor. It was destroyed by fire in 1914, and the new Farnum Hall stands on the old foundation."

The school is supported by Friendsville Quarterly Meeting, which comprises a membership of about eight hundred, scattered through the valley, and foothills, with some meetings running up into the mountains. Friendsville Quarterly Meeting was originally a part of North Carolina Meeting, the Friends belonging to it coming from over the mountains and bringing their Quaker convictions and customs with them.

Before the Civil War some Friends had a considerable influence in the East Tennessee Valleys in creating a sentiment against slavery and perhaps deserve some credit for the fact that the East Tennessee regions as a whole remained loyal to the Union. However, there were a good many southern sympathizers, especially among the cotton growers in the valleys who held slaves. There was guerrilla warfare between the different factions in this region and it was the theatre of a good deal of fighting during the Civil War. As usual Friends suffered severely from both sides, but succeeded in maintaining themselves until the war was over.

About 1870 my father, William Russell, moved to Friendsville, and in 1871 became principal of the Academy. He continued this work for nearly ten years, dividing his time between the school and the ministry among Friends. I can remember yet the weeks when he was absent holding evangelistic meetings in the outposts and among the mountain meetings. He grew very fond of the people here and felt deeply their needs and the great opportunity for service the school afforded. He wrote:

Rolling afar the green hills run;
Rocks stand boldly out in the sun;
High o'er the hills the wild woods rise;
Mountains beyond them prop the skies,
Home of the honey-bee, land of the vine,
Never was climate more lovely than thine.
I am a child of the far North West
But I love my home in the South Land best.

Peace brought Liberty in on her wings
And out of the chaos a New World springs.
If by my influence there shall yet be
One more leaf upon Liberty's tree,
One less weed in the garden of life,
One sword less for a future strife,
Happy will I be, tho' child of the West,
In loving my home in this South Land best.

The Academy was conducted in his day in the original brick building. The school is the center and mainstay of East Tennessee Quakerism. The leaders of the different meetings are in many cases students of former generations, and the teachers in the schools have always assisted in the work of the meeting and many of them have rendered very good service in the ministry.

The school has been not only a center of Quaker influence but of genuine home missionary work in the foothills of the mountains. It has provided means of education for a very large number of people who would not otherwise have received it, and this continues to be the case. The boarding homes for boys and girls enable numbers of them to live more cheaply than they otherwise could and this puts the means of education within reach of a large number. This school has the confidence of the leading educators of the South.

One of the great influences in Friendsville Quarterly Meeting and in the life of the school came from the visit of William Forster, an English Friend, who there while on a religious visit to this country, died and is buried in the Friends' burial-grounds. In a poem upon "Friendsville," my father refers to his grave and to his work:

And graves are here now long unknown,
The tombstones mossed and rotten,
But the flowers that bloom on Forster's tomb
Shall never be forgotten.

In the love of God for the love of man
He died at his post of duty
Three thousand miles from the sea-girl isles
That guarded his home of England.

William Forster's sacrifice to his interest in the outposts of American Quakerism is paralleled by that of Harriet Green, buried at another center of educational influence in North Carolina. About 1890, Friendsville Quarterly Meeting was transferred to Wilmington Yearly Meeting in southeastern Ohio and is now a part of that Yearly Meeting.

JAPANESE NOTES.

A YOUNG JAPANESE FRIEND.

Our hostess and her friend met us at the station, and we walked home with them over the rough, pebbly streets of the little industrial village. It did not look at all like an "attractive residence district," with its narrow streets and grey houses; but once inside our hostess's guest-room, we forgot the outer world, as we looked out on the pleasant enclosed garden. Four or five guests were already there to greet us. They were all, like their hostess, students in the Women's Christian College of Tokio, which opened its doors three years ago. We were urged to make ourselves perfectly at home, and to forget all the formalities of old Japanese custom. It was very pleasant, as we drank tea, to chat with the girls about college, to admire their knitting, and to hear Paderewski or the Philadelphia Orchestra play on the Victrola. Then came various games, in the course of which one of us, though totally untrained in such exercises, was required to perform.

As we were about to leave, our hostess said, "We are preparing a dinner, so please wait a minute;" and soon little tables were brought, and we sat around them on the matting. Delicious soup, roast chicken, and little bundles of rice done up with various delicacies, composed the feast, with fruit for dessert. The girls would not let us go until we had sung a hymn together. Then we bowed at the door to the mother of the household, put on our shoes, and all set out through the dark streets for the ride home. As we talked together on the way, we realized not only the jolly comradeship of these college girls, but the earnestness of their reach after the new riches that education is offering them. Their very eagerness to talk English with us proved it. Moreover, it is not, with most of them, a matter of simply "going on to college," as planned by father and mother; nor will custom allow them to work their way through as freely as in America. Family traditions are strong in Japan, and one of them is that a girl's place is in the home, and that she shall do what her parents see fit, marry whom they choose, and, if there are no sons, carry on the family name. These girls have not rebelled, but by patient determination they have managed to enter college. Sometimes the pressure has been so heavy that they have wondered if they could stick it out; but they keep on, with all faith in the possibilities of a glorious future. Our hostess wants to become a social worker, one of her friends expects to do Christian work of some sort, and others will doubtless become teachers of younger girls as eager as themselves.

First came the thirst for the freedom that only knowledge can bring; it urged them on, restless and persistent under every restraint, until the doors were opened, and, through first one door and then another, the light came in. Happily for these girls, one great door opened for them among the others—the door that let in the light of the knowledge of Christ. They are seeing the vision of God's plan for the world; what changes it must bring, in home life first of all, in the conditions of marriage, then in industrial and political life! The call of that wonderful City is surging up in their hearts, and they want to be prepared to help in the building of it. Our hostess of the other afternoon has joined our Monthly Meeting, and so taken her stand on the side of Christ. Her family do not yet understand what she is doing it for, nor why she goes on quietly with her studying, when they would like to see her a proper Japanese lady at home. But she must feel the same thrill that moved the Quaker pioneers of another time and place; despite conflicts and discouragements, she must see the light streaming in upon up-turned faces, and must go on in the strength of their eagerness.

"OLD TRAILS AND NEW BORDERS."*

Those who wish to have a bird's-eye view of present conditions in Continental Europe, should read Edward A. Steiner's graphic account given in his book: "Old Trails and New Borders." From newspapers and through magazine articles, one gets one-sided and hurried glimpses of the situation across the sea, but here is a trustworthy, first-hand report by an intelligent, sympathetic observer of men and of what he saw and experienced in recent European travels.

Many readers of THE FRIEND have heard Edward Steiner speak and know something of the background of this remarkable American. Born in Hungary, he came as a youth to this country, caught the best spirit of America and is now, as someone has said, "A citizen of which any country might be proud." Knowing from actual experience, the trials of the immigrant, his sympathy and understanding of their problems are complete. He stands for justice and brotherhood and has consistently lived and preached these ideals. He is a lively, interesting speaker, presents facts learned at first-hand and people listen to him gladly. We all know how changed was the attitude of the public during the war. Edward Steiner was, however, not prepared for this change. He was stupefied to find that the sentiments that had been applauded were now branded "socialistic," "anarchistic." Close self-examination followed and he was forced to the conclusion that the change was not in him, but in the audiences.

Discouraged and heart-sick, but still believing in America, he decided to go away far enough to get a perspective of his beloved country. He visited the countries of Europe and saw what war had done to lands and people. He traveled through France, Germany, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Austria, Poland and Russia. In vivid style he reports the situation. His words palpitate with the tragedy of it all. He anticipates going back to his old home. "I thought," he says, "that I would kiss the soil of Czechoslovakia, freed from the rule of the Hapsburgs and now forever sacred," but bitter is his disappointment, and the temper of the man is well shown by his verdict: "I still love the Czechoslovak Republic and wish it well. I still believe that President Masaryk is one of the greatest statesmen in Europe and the Abraham Lincoln of his people, but, to quote a Slovak patriot: 'What does it profit us if the landlord is a good man, if the agent and janitors are rascals.'"

After an extensive survey of the continent, he thus summarizes his experiences in the chapter entitled, "The Mind of Europe:" "There is no outstanding experience; no visit to some quiet spot where the war has not torn, hurt, maimed or killed something or some one. The war has standardized Europe, the great steam-roller has pressed it flat, the mills of the gods have ground both fast and fine, and have produced the same grist everywhere." He hears men say: "Had the churches functioned, had the nations been penetrated by Christian idealism, had they been dominated by the power of holiness, the great war calamity might have been averted." Sermons now are full of assertions that militaristic force is futile in settling quarrels between nations, that besides being un-Christian, it is impractical, and not only the ministers say it, but also professors, political economists, sociologists. "They are saying it," he adds, "between wars, however, when it is safe to say it."

He found hostility to Americans among these European peoples. They know of our shameful treatment of the immigrant and the Negro, our bigotry and cruelty toward conscientious objectors, our corrupt politics and our many failures to be true to our call and profession. These they threw back as a challenge when any criticism was made of their conduct.

Edward Steiner is not ignorant of America's faults, but he loves her and with glad heart he turned homeward and concludes that, "As an American I was never more in love with my country than now, coming as I do out of the tombs of empires and from the grave of a civilization. If I could, I would save my country from the doom of Europe, and to that end she must think with the international mind and feel with the inter-racial heart." No pessimist, this man who knows at first-hand the present condition of America and of Europe. His book closes on this high note: "Beyond the years I see an integrated humanity, not melted into a bell, but shaped into chimes, each nation rallying around the note which woos its heart, out of which come its songs of cheer, and comfort songs for the dark days, but all the notes shall blend with each other, to the praise of a common Father. This day is coming, and it will come sooner, if America attunes herself now to the great exology."

The book is "affectionately dedicated" "to my friends 'The Friends,' both English and American."

J. W. B.

"THE ENGLISH PRISON SYSTEM."

The famous penologist De Tocqueville who nearly a century ago went to study the solitary and separate systems of imprisonment in the State of Pennsylvania (with the introduction of which Friends had so much to do) warned prison reformers of "a tendency which is always asserting itself to exaggerate the necessity for moral and spiritual reform at the expense of the other essential attributes of punishment." Sir Evelyn Ruggles-Brise, for a quarter of a century chairman of the Prison Commission of England and Wales, in his book, "The English Prison System" (Macmillan), quotes this sentiment, and while one would hesitate to say that he wishes to make it entirely his own, yet the fear that he may lose sight of it seems to have lurked in the background throughout the writing of a book which has a great deal of value attached to it.

His brief history of imprisonment, to which the preface is devoted, reminds us that prison as a punishment in itself is a new feature of Penal Law, for up to the time of the French Revolution, goals were merely places of detention. "Le système pénitentiaire" is the direct heir, he claims, of the Penitences of the Church, and was largely introduced under religious influences and the desire to effect moral reform. The introduction of the cellular system was mainly due to the religious zeal of Pennsylvanian Quakers, who tried to utilize deprivation of liberty as an instrument for effecting the spiritual regeneration of the offender, almost impossible of achievement in the indiscriminate association which had hitherto prevailed. (Elizabeth Fry, as Rufus Jones reminds us in his latest book, refused to recommend, as did some of the Quaker reformers, absolute solitary confinement with its attendant horrors.) He passes on to a recognition of the effects of modern education, social conditions, etc., in reducing the prison population, and closes on the note that "the future lies with preventive science, and the individualization of punishment."

So far so good, but useful as the rest of the book is, one cannot help comparing it to a religious treatise written by a very capable theologian who knows all about the subject he is dealing with, but has never had the vivid personal spiritual experience. Sir Evelyn knows all about prison—no one more so—but though he has been in it, he has never been of it. For instance, he declares: "Since 1808 there has been no law of silence strictly so-called"—which will convey a very different impression to the ex-prisoner who remembers his three days' bread and water from the one conveyed to the sympathetic but uninitiated reader. The latter will also get the impression that organized talking, which the governor is allowed to permit, is a common thing, instead of being practically unknown. The author is very much too optimistic, too, regarding the religious influences brought to bear when it is remembered that "the regular visitation in the cells," when the least spark may be re-kindled works out in many prisons at about three minutes a month. "In the upright and manly attributes of our warden-class a great reforming influence is to be found." Perhaps. But as one Principal Warden complained to me: "Regulations on every side prevent me helping men in just the ways that might be most efficacious." The Commissioner rightly in theory dwells on the importance of "individualization of treatment" and the introduction of divisions and grades, yet the prisoners know how trifling these differences are in practice.

The book contains chapters giving important data on Penal Servitude, Prevention Detention, the Borstal System, the Children's and Probation Acts, vagrancy and inebriety (he has some straight things to say on the efficacy of the Liquor Control restrictions), but undoubtedly the most important chapter in the book is the author's digest in a handy and understandable form of Dr. Goring's epoch-making book, "The English Convict," first published as a Blue Book, and more recently issued in a more popular form, in which he refuted Lombroso's theories regarding a criminal type.

The Chief Commissioner is indeed altogether both too optimistic and too cautious. Personally, I fundamentally disagree with him in his insistence on the necessity of an element of punishment, but even ruling this out, he sees the matter through too rosy glasses. It is welcome to hear his approbation of the introduction of lectures, with which many Friends have helped so much, and to find the frank confession that the old method failed. Remembering interviews with Sir Evelyn's aides-de-camp, the prison inspectors, one is amazed to see it recorded "that the C. O.'s generally bore the restraints of bondage with courage and patience," and to know that "no doubt their experience has given an impulse to the prison reformer, who in his honorable zeal to soften the lot of the unfortunate captive is apt to overlook the necessity for strict rules and regulations." I hope it has, Sir Evelyn, but I believe that if he and others were less in thrall to rules and regulations and the need of deterrents and punishment, their eyes would not be helden that they could not see prison is the place which, despite all alleviations, continues to crush and embitter every man and woman, whether unfortunate, deficient or adventurous, who comes within its walls. Something of their side we hope to get from the book by Stephen Hobbhouse and Fenner Brockway early in the new year. The Prison Commission should then compare this book written from the experiences printed upon the heart of men and women who have been in prison, with their own official record given in this book printed by some of their charges in Maidstone Prison.

THE Quaker interpretation of the Christian faith is not a vague attenuated version of the "old Gospel," but a way of life which includes all that was best in the older evangelicalism and more besides.—ELIZABETH FOX HOWARD, in "Have We a Message for To-day?"

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

FOUR BOYS WHO BECAME DISCIPLES.

As time went on and the boys grew big and strong the lake became almost the whole of their life. They seemed to be as much a part of the scene as the hills were. Everybody knew them and everybody learned to count upon them. When their boat put in to the shore everybody expected to see a pretty catch of fish. The years as they passed improved Simon. He was still a strange youth, but there were fine traits in him. He was quick and rash, but he would often do brave and generous deeds. He seldom stopped to think. Ideas flashed into his mind and with a rush the thing was done. Sometimes it was right and sometimes it was wrong. If it turned out to be wrong he would be very sorry afterwards and decide never to do such a thing again, but alas, another flash would come and he would rush once more into a foolish act. Many times as the boat neared the shore with its load of fish, Simon would suddenly drop his oar and leap into the water and swim like a great fish alongside the boat. It upset all order, splashed the others with water, and made it difficult for John to steer the boat. Simon promised each time when he was scolded that he would not do it again. But as soon as the impulse came over him he was pretty sure to "forget" and leap in once more, especially if there were people on the shore who would see him do it.

These boys did not always talk about boats and nets and fish. They had another interest which was very great. They talked about it almost as much as they talked about the lake. That was the coming of the Messiah and His wonderful kingdom. They all had different ideas about it, but they all thought He would come soon. They used to lie on the grass by the shore of the lake after they had eaten their luncheon of bread and broiled fish and imagine what the new kingdom would be like. "The new kingdom will teach us how to love one another," John would say. "I think He will smite these Romans and set us all free," was James' guess. "I believe He will purify the temple and give us better priests in Jerusalem so that we can worship God as we ought to do," Andrew would declare. "He will be a great King like David," Simon would say, "only He will be much more wonderful, Divine and heavenly. When people see Him they will bow down before Him and obey His last word. He will do miracles which will surprise everybody and He will make Jerusalem a perfect city and it will become the capital of all the world. I wish He would come soon and call me to be one of His men."

When John the baptiser came out of the wilderness and stirred the people with his preaching, the four fisher boys, now grown into young men, went all together to hear him. His words moved them as nothing else ever had. They had lived in a town where there was much that was evil and wrong. They saw and heard wicked things, and they often did things themselves which something in their souls told them they ought not to do. Simon especially felt that his whole life had been full of mistakes and failures. He was ready to take John's baptism and wash all his past life away. They all confessed their sins to John, were baptized and returned to Capernaum with lighter hearts. But they soon found that they slid back very easily into their old ways and habits. They still lacked something. They did not have the power to be as good as they meant to be. Simon still found that he kept doing things which he "didn't mean to do."

One fine day when they had come from their fishing trip, their two boats empty, for they had fished all night and had caught nothing, though their nets were badly torn, they found a host of people on the shore and a remarkable looking stranger among them. While they were washing their nets and getting ready to mend them, the stranger stepped into one of the boats and asked Simon to row him out a little way from the shore. Then he sat on one of the boat-seats and began to talk to the people. It was a most unusual and wonderful talk. The people had never heard anything like it. It made God seem perfectly real and like a Father to them all. Simon listened as he had never listened to anything in his life, and John's face grew more beautiful than ever.

When the stranger finished speaking he turned to Simon and said, "row out a little farther and let down your nets." "It won't do any good," Simon answered, "we have fished all night and we know that there are not any fish out there." Jesus, for that is who the stranger was, said no words but looked Simon straight in the face with such a look that at once he took the oars and rowed the boat to the place where Jesus pointed. Then he and Andrew let down the nets. When they tried to pull them in they caught so many fish that the nets were in danger of breaking and they called to James and John to hurry out with the other boat to help them land the great catch. There were so many fishes that the boats almost sank under the weight of them.

Simon was powerfully moved. He saw at once that this was no ordinary visitor. He fell on his knees before Jesus and said, "I am no good. I keep sinning; I try and fail." And Jesus quietly said, "fear not, Simon. The time is coming when thou shalt catch men as thou hast now caught fish." He promised Simon that instead of being fickle and weak and impulsive he should become as solid as a rock, and He began at once to call him "Peter," which means "man of rock."

Then He turned to the group of four fishermen and asked them to follow Him. They loved their lake, their boats and tackle as they loved their life. But they felt the power and grace of this wonderful person and without any delay they forsook their nets, their boats and their happy life on the borders of Gennesaret and went with Jesus.

SCHENECTADY FIRST HEARS OF THE SERVICE COMMITTEE FROM MOSCOW.

A Russian electrical engineer living in Schenectady received a copy of a Moscow paper from some relatives and there read a glowing report of the work of the Friends in Russia and for the first time heard of the American Friends' Service Committee. It is simply an example of the old truth that it is not the bigness of a deed which alone insures its worth, but the quality of it. Not even a distance of 4,000 miles and a strange country and a foreign language could stop the story of an act of good-will. The story in the Moscow paper gave the Philadelphia address of the Service Committee. Whereupon a native Russian, Shinkewich by name, who has been in this country for ten years and is now in charge of the foreign work of the General Electric Company, immediately wrote to the Service Committee asking if it would co-operate with him in raising funds from the people of Schenectady for Russian relief. He did not wait until someone came to him, he did not wait until someone talked with him for two or three hours trying to secure his co-operation, but he began the work himself. He then secured a committee of ten of the leading business men and ministers of Schenectady, headed by Dr. Richmond, President of Union College, and has since worked untiringly, practically giving all his time, outside of his business, to the task of raising funds. In this the Schenectady Committee has been eminently successful for a city of its size. We are sometimes led to think that because something we do is hidden and obscure it is of little worth. Perhaps some of the work you have done, or can do, is a little like that paragraph which some unknown reporter on a Moscow paper wrote one afternoon, never daring to think that what he had done would mean the children would live for fifty or sixty years more, instead of dying in childhood.

QUAKER WORKERS RECOVER FROM TYPHUS.

It was glad news that a recent cable brought. It said that Anna Louise Strong was able to walk from one room to another in the house in which she is staying in Moscow; that Nancy Babb had so entirely recovered that she was contemplating returning to work without a period of convalescence, and that Murray Kenworthy, the Head of our Unit in Russia, is now able to sit up for two hours each day. It is also reported from Poland that Dr. Mary McCollin Tatum is convalescing. Our rejoicing in their recovery is great, not alone because of the saving of their lives to us and to the work, but because of the great lesson they have taught us. What Christ meant when He said that when a man laid down his life willingly for his friends he had reached the ultimate height of all love—has been cut into the reality of life for us.

VIENNA MISSION DISTRIBUTES OVER $500,000 FROM FOURTH TO NINTH MONTH.

A report from the Vienna Mission states that $75,801.15 was distributed by the Friends for the relief of the stricken people of Vienna during the period noted above. This fund was from both the American and English Friends.

RUSSIAN HYMNS FROM THE VOLGA RIVER VALLEY.

(Where Fifteen Million People Are Starving.)

Collected by Beulah A. Hurley, Member Friends' Relief Mission in Russia.

[It has come to the notice of Friends recently that there are in Russia large numbers (reported as many as 1,000,000) of so-called Quakers. In many essentials they hold our views and have suffered persecution to the death for them during the war. Recently some of our workers held a meeting with them. This is a translation of hymns used at the end of the meeting.]

How happy this old world might have been! But men do not want to understand each other. Neighbors will not go to each other and say that all men are brothers. Let me hold your hand.

Why do we quarrel, and do not give up enmity? Why do we not form a single family? Each man would then be able to say that all men are brothers; let us hold hands.

You are rich and wear smart clothes. I am poor and wear a torn coat. Yet each of us possesses an honest heart, so let me hold your hand for we are brothers. You have not deceived either strong or weak and I keep my word like you do. I also burn with love for good. Come, we are brothers. Let me hold your hand.

You are deeply and tenderly loved by your mother. Mine lived and breathed only for me. Even if we stand on different levels, still let me hold your hand once we remain brothers.

To both of us life promises old age and death, which neither can avoid, and both of us shall pass into the dark grave. Yes, all men are brothers, stretch your hand to them.

My friend, in a moment of irritation, do not bury enmity in your heart. You must forgive, and like a fog let it all blow away. My friend, to those who do evil to you, return only good. Remember, they themselves regret perhaps and suffer for thoughtless acts. We are all subject to mistakes. We are all men.

With noble hearts and minds are those who forgive with simplicity of soul. You also forgive and learn to show your high gift and be not ashamed to be the first to stretch out your hand.

Hark! Speech is glowing, the hour is coming, the voice of God is calling us to stand up for the Truth. Be ready with free words or with deeds at your post. Be ready to confront a menacing death and accept. Since long ago we waited for the dawn, for long we lived in slavery, for long we waited for a beam of light to break the chains of darkness. But it is not enough for us to wait for freedom, we shall go to meet it, fearing not the thorny way, nor the menacing of the powers. The earthly power shall not rule over our conscience. Be ready to openly stand up for your convictions.

Do not give your oath, and do not use force, and yet be not a slave to any one. Return good for evil, caring not for military honor. Respect only the law of love and reject killing. Do not soil your hands with blood.

A cruel fight was fought against slavery to gain freedom. Most unmerciful enmity has been born everywhere, but we deny force. We go by a different way, and wrestling, we conquer darkness by light and evil by good! Not by force, nor by blood, nor with prison—only with truth and love shall we overcome the reign of darkness.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FIRST MONTH 21, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FRIEND:—

The Yearly Meeting's Extension Committee has published during the past year several brief talks on religious topics in leaflet form under the name "Pennsbury Leaflets."

That Friends have a message to the world to-day is attested from many sources. Suitable essays are welcomed by the Committee for future publication.

A "Pennsbury Sample Envelope" contains one copy of each Pennsbury Leaflet. A "Pennsbury Packet" contains a convenient number of one title. Every member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting and many other interested Friends should find Pennsbury Leaflets convenient for distribution to neighbors and friends. The habit of daily placing a suitable tract on life's serious problems where it will be read may bring great consequences for good in the lives of others.

Will the reader of this note, if not already provided, send to Friends' Book Store, 302 Arch Street, Philadelphia, for a Pennsbury Sample Envelope and follow this with a request for a Pennsbury Packet of each of the most interesting leaflets? A full set of Pennsbury Packets in thy home will prove convenient for daily use.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

THE RED CROSS WOULD ABOLISH WAR.

"To-day the Red Cross owes it to itself and to all its many workers to proclaim as an ideal and a practical intention, a struggle against the horrors of war, an attempt by world-wide help and unselfishness definitely to abolish war."

"At the suggestion of Senator Ciralo, Chairman of the Italian Red Cross, the tenth International Red Cross Conference, which met at Geneva on April 1, 1921, voted the following resolution:—

"The International Committee of the Red Cross and the League of Red Cross Societies shall address an appeal to all nations, exhorting them to combat the spirit of war, which dominates the world.

"These two organizations call, therefore, on nations and individuals to fight with all means in their power this maleficent spirit. May statesmen, writers, school and university, capital and labor, remember that it is their duty, in the interests of mankind, to help peace to conquer the earth. Above all children should be brought up in this fundamental belief. . . .

"This true internationalism cannot be attained without the active and intimate co-operation of governments, parliaments, voluntary organizations, the press, the clergy, and, above all, national Red Cross societies. To the union of these forces must be added a supreme factor—the power of individual conviction. Every man, as far as lies in his power, must contribute to make peace permanent in the world."—From the Advocate of Peace, Twelfth Month, 1921.

THE JUNIOR RED CROSS—A CAMPAIGN OF INTERNATIONALISM.

The Junior Red Cross News is a magazine published monthly except during the summer. It costs fifty cents a year. Subscriptions may be sent to the Junior Red Cross, Washington, D. C. If other numbers are like those from which quotations are here given, the magazine should commend itself to those who wish their children to grow up internationalists.

"And all mankind is beginning to share in it, for already Canada, Australia, China, Switzerland, Poland, and Hungary have organized their girls and boys and Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, Bulgaria and Portugal have plans laid to bring their schools into the movement—into a league of children, engaged in unselfish service for children and in inter-school correspondence, that may truly encircle the globe and hasten the mutual understanding and sincere co-operation of all peoples for world betterment."—From the Junior Red Cross News.

"One day in Jerusalem I saw a fine up-standing Arab boy with his camel just outside the Damascus gate. Through an interpreter I asked him to pose for me.

"Tell him the picture is for the American children. They want to know what boys in his country are like and what they do."

"I thanked him (for posing) and offered him money. But he pushed it back into my hand."

"He says he is glad to do it for the American children! said the interpreter. His father is chief in a village near the Syrian Orphanage and he has heard that the American children have sent help to the children of his people there."

"(He lives in) the village of the Impenitent Thief. For many centuries it has been a nest of bandits."

"And yet because even in the worst of places kindness breeds kindness a boy from the brigand village found a way to send a Christmas message to the American Juniors."—Description of the Christmas Cover of the News, 1921.

XII.

The final work of the Conference is being delayed by the problem of Shantung. This problem is not yet entirely solved; but instructions were received this morning from Peking and Tokio which it is believed will remove the last point of difference between the Chinese and Japanese delegations and enable them to come to a final settlement of the difficult problem.

It will be recalled that the Japanese, having driven the Germans from Kiao-chow, during the World War, were awarded the German rights or claims in Kiao-chow and the Province of Shantung, by the Treaty of Versailles. This treaty was accepted by President Wilson and by seven of the nine powers represented in the Washington Conference, the United States Senate and China alone having refused to accept it. To overcome this handicap, the American government has found to be a difficult and delicate task, and measured by this difficulty, the results achieved by its efforts have been noteworthy and almost entirely satisfactory.

Japan, too, has conceded much. At first, the Japanese delegation took the position that, the question having been settled at Versailles, it should not be revived at Washington. It consented, however, to negotiate the question with the Chinese delegation, the American and the British first delegates acting as counsellors and friends. Thirty-three meetings have been held under this agreement and a number of questions have been satisfactorily settled, such as the withdrawal of the Japanese troops from the province, the surrender of the German lease of the port to China, the ownership and control of the mines and other natural resources, land titles, telegraphs, post offices, etc.

The one remaining question is the railway which runs through the province from Tsingtao to Tsinanfu, the title to which the Japanese secured from the Germans at Versailles for the sum of fifty-three million gold marks. The first offer of the Japanese at Washington was to give the Chinese a one-half interest in the railway; the Chinese offered to buy it for cash; the Japanese offered to lend the Chinese the money with which to buy, provided they could retain a thirty years' control of the road; this term the Japanese reduced to twenty years, then to fifteen, then to ten, and then to five, and finally agreed to accept Chinese treasury notes with deferred payments extending over twelve or fifteen years, with the option of redemption at the end of three years.

The payment for the railway having been agreed upon, the question of its control during the years of deferred payment was struggled with. The Chinese offered to appoint (or accept) a Japanese associate traffic-manager and an assistant auditor, but the Japanese have insisted on nominating the traffic-manager and auditor, leaving to China the exclusive control of the associate and the assistant. The Japanese argument for this demand is that only thus can the financial and commercial interests of Japanese nationals in the railway be adequately protected against Chinese discrimination. There is a parallel argument in certain American commercial circles that a Japanese traffic-manager would discriminate against American goods.

With political and military control of the province and the railway in the hands of the Chinese, the remaining difference in view-point would seem to an impartial mind to be due to Oriental subtlety or to commercial selfishness, and to be capable of speedy and satisfactory adjustment. The Chinese minister appealed to President Harding, on the 25th instant, to use his good offices, for settling the problem, and the President offered a suggestion which may be reflected in the Pekin and Tokio instructions just received.

With the railway problem solved, the province will return to the control of China, twenty-four years after Germany secured it on a ninety-nine years' "lease." The British are willing to return Wei-hai-wei, also, and perhaps France will return Kwang-chow-wang; while the acceptance of the American policy of the "open-door" will mean the surrender of "spheres of influence" by the British in the Yangtse Valley and Thibet, by the French in Yunnan, Kwangsi and Kwantung, and by the Japanese in Fukien.

On the other hand, there appears to be no likelihood that China's other territorial losses to the European powers and Japan, which date back to 1842, will be restored at the Washington Conference. Great Britain will doubtless retain Hongkong, Burma, Sikkim, and Kowloon; France will keep Annam and Tonking; Japan will cling to the islands off the coast, Korea, South Manchuria and Inner Mongolia. A united, reformed and civilized Chinese Republic may regain these provinces in some unseen future; a reconstructed Russian Republic may aid her in this task, at the same time restoring what Old Russia took from China in Turkestan, Outer Mongolia, North Manchuria and Sakhalin; a democratic government in Japan, and less imperialism and more righteousness in every nation may be confidently expected to facilitate the triumph of justice, before China is overtaken by the fate of either an aggressive, militaristic transformation, or a complete decadence, division and annihilation. Meanwhile, the Washington Conference is doing what it can to redress some of the wrongs done to China in the past, and to set up standards of righteousness and justice for the prevention of further wrongs in the future.

As to Siberia, Japan has formally repudiated the charge that she intends to acquire any territory from her much-harassed neighbor, Russia, and has solemnly promised to withdraw her troops from Siberia "as soon as political stability is re-established there." Sad experience makes this promise not only indefinite, but far from reassuring. In the midst of our disappointment, however, we Americans should remember that it was on our own government's initiative that Japanese troops first went into Siberia, for military or anti-Bolshevist purposes; and that we ourselves are maintaining troops "until political stability is re-established" in Haiti, the Dominican Republic, Nicaragua and,—until yesterday,—in Cuba. The United States, while accepting at the Washington Conference Japan's promise in regard to Siberia, reserves of course its right to protest if this promise is not carried out in good faith, and this right is not only unimpaired, but is decidedly strengthened, by the Japanese pledge at the Conference. With the revival of mighty Russia, also, another Russian avalanche may be expected to sweep over the frozen lands of Siberia, and before it the Japanese colonists, who love the lands of the sunny south, would retire. And, best of all, with the dawning of the new era of diplomacy in the Far East, we may confidently expect at the hands of Japan, Russia, China, and especially at the hands of the Christian peoples of the West, who have taught civilization and set the example, the keeping of pledges in entire good faith and mutual participation in that righteousness which not only exalteth the nations, but which secures justice and preserves the peace among them. May the sun of this righteousness be indeed rising in the Far East to cast its life-giving rays around the world!

LETTER FROM DANIEL OLIVER.

RAS-EL-METN, SYRIA, Twelfth Month 31, 1921.
ARMENIAN REFUGEES.

In continuation of my letter of last week [not yet received] regarding the thousands of Armenian Refugees in Beyrouth and arriving, I want to tell Friends what we actually saw, and again to repeat that the urgent need of immediate help is beyond possibility of my pen adequately to describe.

"Pray that your flight be not in the winter time."

I know now what that means, as never before. The other day, William Bacon Evans and I went around visiting the camps of Armenians. The rain was coming down in torrents, indeed so violent was the storm that traffic was stopped for three-quarters of an hour. The wind was bitterly cold.

The first camp we visited was in the grounds of the Armenian school and church. There we saw hundreds of men, women and children. The buildings could not contain them, although they were sitting, lying and standing all over the floors. Outside there were numbers huddled against the walls where sacking or sheets had been nailed, affording a certain protection from the rain, but not sufficient to prevent their being drenched. They were cold and hungry, and many of them in rags,—a pitiful and most depressing sight. The one bright thing in that camp was to see hot soup and bread being served by an Armenian lady of Beyrouth, with a few helpers. They were giving the destitute one meal a day—soup and bread.

From this camp we went to another. Here under great vaults—the foundations of an uncompleted church building—in the dark, damp and cold, reminding me of the Catacombs at Rome, were a thousand men, women and children huddled together. All wore thin, ragged garments. All looked haggard and hungry. Most faces bore the signs of suffering and anxiety, and had lost all traces of smiles. And yet the little children (Oh, thank God for them wherever they are—they are the sunshine of the world) were playing. One was jumping in a nice pool of water barefooted, and was having a grand time.

From thence we drove to the quarantine camp. The government detains all arrivals in quarantine for five or six days. All are vaccinated, and we understood that the government gave some food while the refugees were in quarantine. But the mud was over shoe-tops from the incessant rains, and the discomfort, cold and wet in the tents with no fires, baffle description.

We visited still another camp, further out of the city. The general conditions were the same,—a sea of mud everywhere. In one tent a baby had been born the night before. The parents were refined people. In another tent I entered, there were twenty orphan boys, all standing. They have nothing, not a scrap of bedding, matting or any chair, only the wet earth to sit, lie or sleep on. They had no near relatives in the world,—all had been killed in previous massacres. But these boys were young and I imagine they were having some kind of game which we interrupted. They would all gladly have come with us, but we were only going the round to see conditions.

One young lad we met had escaped alone of all his family in a previous massacre. He had been in prison one and a-half years. He had no one in the world. He is coming to us, of course. We selected about fifty-five of the most desperate cases. They are to be transported by the "Near East" auto-lorries. We are to put them in empty houses here and shall feed them until we can find, if possible, work for them. They all want work. Alas! in this land of poverty and destitution, who can find work for all? We could take hundreds more and house them (for people here in Ras have been kind in loaning empty houses without charge). But can we feed them? That depends on those who read these lines. If there is a prompt answer in contributions, lives can be saved and great suffering at least lessened. We are told that over 100,000 have fled from Celicia,—Armenians, Greeks and others. Perhaps 30,000 have landed at Beyruth. Some have gone to Damascus and other points, hoping to find work. More are coming to Beyruth. There are many thousands at Mersina and at Alexandretta, waiting to get away. The small Armenian Committee in Beyruth cannot touch more than the fringe of the need.

LATER.—The first instalment has actually arrived in "Near East" motor lorries in pouring rain. They looked very miserable, but they are tonight safe. Can the reader know how precious is that feeling after what they have gone through. More are coming tomorrow.

DANIEL OLIVER.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

THE cycle of Quarterly Meetings will begin on the sixth of Second Month. The sessions of Philadelphia are on the 6th and 7th. The Third-day session is at 10.30 with an adjournment for lunch at 12 o'clock. The business is taken up in the afternoon session usually beginning at 1.30.

Abington comes in course on the 8th and 9th. The session on the 9th is at 3.30, with supper following.

WE are favored with an advance copy of the Nation for Second Month 1st, on account of a poem by William Ellery Leonard entitled "The Quaker Meeting House." Friends will be interested at what is in some particulars a very faithful delineation. The author evidently knows Friends who maintain the ancient "testimonies" and weaves these into the poem, but he also perceives that "high courage" goes along with "homespun grey," with "thee and thou," and "yea" and "nay."

REPRESENTATIVE MEETING.—The regular first Month session of the Representative Meeting was held on the 20th inst., with an unusually large attendance.

A brief review of matters claiming attention might include the following:

The Committee to co-operate with other Protestant Religious Organizations in looking after the interests of juvenile offenders and others in the courts and elsewhere, was not prepared to make a final report.

The Committee authorized to urge Executive Clemency towards political (war) prisoners, has on account of the release by President Harding of twenty-four such persons at last Christmas, deferred taking immediate definite action, hoping that the Administration will see fit to release others in the near future.

There was extended earnest discussion of the proposed changes in the marriage rules in the Book of Discipline, presented by the Committee under appointment. The Meeting was favored to unite on a form which with possible slight alteration will be forwarded to the Yearly Meeting for final action.

Appreciative replies were read from the offices of the Secretary of State and his three American associates in the Washington Conference for the Limitation of Armaments, in response to the message of this meeting sent last month; in the discussion which followed it developed that our President is being severely criticized for his approval of the $20,000,000 grant to relieve the terrible distress in Russia. It was directed that our Clerk and Secretary prepare and forward a message to the President expressing our approval of this humane action in this crisis and to express also our firm conviction that the Conference now in session should not be allowed to close until the purposes for which it was called are fulfilled.

A comprehensive report by the three Trustees of our Yearly Meeting property in regard to the Anna Cresson legacy was approved.

Alfred C. Garrett, who is our Representative on the Ad Interim Committee in the movement for Organic Church Union informed that another Friend was requested on the Committee; J. Henry Bartlett was approved as our second Representative.

W. B. H.

PITTSBURGH FRIENDS were privileged to hear Rufus M. Jones on the 15th ult., both at Friends' meeting in the morning, and again at Syria Mosque, in the afternoon, where he and others addressed an audience of about two thousand people, the meeting being a part of the Russian Famine Relief Fund campaign in Pittsburgh.

We deeply feel the loss we have sustained in the death of one of our number, Erasmus Wilson, widely known in Pennsylvania and Ohio, as the "Quiet Observer" of the Pittsburgh Gazette Times.

C. E. WRIGHT.

SINCE printing the item in regard to Isaac N. Vail we learn that there is a copy of his book in the Westtown Library. It was acquired by gift from the Estate of George J. Scattergood, but was overlooked when we made our inquiry for it.

IT was mentioned in one of the sessions of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting last year when the marriage rules were under discussion that Germantown Meeting had had occasion to appoint a meeting in order for marriage at Hull House, Chicago. A detailed account of this occasion is printed in the American Friend for First Month 26th. The writer is Marjorie Hill Allee. This is her conclusion: "There is no good in disciplining after the old custom, for Friends who marry otherwise; but I think it a great pity that young Friends are not more generally being educated to see the real beauty and meaning of our ceremony." "I should think they would feel really married," one guest remarked at Hull House. They do.

NOTICE.

CARE IN INSURANCE

The Provident was founded in 1865 by a group of Friends for the purpose of protecting the estates and insuring the lives of members of the Society of Friends.

Later the services of this Company were offered to other people who were known to be of careful habits.

A careful company insures only those people who are good moral as well as health risks. This results in a low death-rate, which is one of the elements of low cost of insurance.

Care is important—in insurance as well as in other things.

CAESAR AND CHRIST.

Proud Caesar came in strength of steel,
The panoply of war was his.
At his command men poured forth life,
He left as heritage a blood-stained tide,
The cities perished, nations fell.
He came, he scorned, he slaughtered—
And he died.

The meek Christ came, His strength the true—
A heart of love His panoply.
At His command men found their life,
The cities flourished, nations grew.
As heritage the reign of peace He gives,
He came, He loved, He pitied—
And He lives.

—Thomas Curtis Clark, in the Boston Transcript.

WILLIAM CHARLES BRAITHWAITE.

The cable has just brought the sad news of the sudden death of William Charles Braithwaite at his home in Banbury. He was beyond question one of the foremost Friends of our time in insight, in breadth of view, in spiritual grasp and in religious depth of life. He was in the best sense of the word a Quaker statesman. He was a constructive influence in the Society along many lines. He was one of the builders of the Adult School; he was an inspiring leader in the Home Mission work of Friends; he was an important influence in the shaping of Woodbrooke; he was one of the creators of the new volume of Discipline; he was a wise and far-seeing counsellor in most of the affairs of the Yearly Meeting and he was a living voice in our time interpreting the Gospel in fresh spiritual messages.

His greatest and most permanent contribution is in the field of history—his two illuminating volumes: "The Beginnings of Quakerism," and "The Second Period of Quakerism." They are rare and truly remarkable books. They present for all time the sound historical interpretation of the birth of our Society and its development during the period of the life of the Founders. He possessed in high degree both the gifts and the learning for a true historian. Just before his death he received from Marburg University an honorary degree in recognition of his historical work and his contribution to religious education among working-men. Our work together on the Historical Series has given me great opportunity to know our dear friend in a close and intimate way. It has been a labor of continual co-operation, with complete mutual understanding and unbroken harmony. His words in THE FRIEND of First Month 10th show how generous was his spirit. I cannot conclude without referring to his unusual humor and the rich, rounded character of this good man's life.

I wonder why there are not more such men among us. He took his inheritance from the Society of Friends very seriously. It seemed to him an immense legacy of the most precious sort. He went to work to understand it, to appreciate and appraise it and then to enlarge it and bring it into the lives of others. When he worked at problems he came at them with a broad foundation and he looked ahead with vision. Whether you agreed or disagreed with what he said you listened and learned and felt respect. He always made things clearer and he always raised to a higher level the matters which he considered. I am writing my brief account to-day with a heart heavy and almost stunned with a sense of personal loss, but I cannot end my few words without a living appeal to our young Friends to see the significance of a life like this one and a call to rise up and live to the full height of their great privileges as Friends.

RUFUS M. JONES.

THY LITTLE NEED.

Unwrap thy life of many wants and fine,
He who with Christ will dine
Shall see no table curiously spread,
But fish and barley bread.
Where readeest thou that Jesus bade us pray,
"Give us our sumptuous fare from day to day?"

Why wilt thou take a castle on thy back
When God gave but a pack?
With gown of honest wear, why wilt thou tease
For braid and fripperies?
Learn thou with flowers to dress, with birds to feed,
And pinch thy large want to thy little need.
—FREDERIC LANGBRIDGE, in The Springfield Republican.

As in England [and America] so in Europe and Asia, men are not waiting and longing for the visits [in international service] of "amiable philanthropists," but for the "manifestation of the sons of God"—a rather different matter. If, then, we are to enter into this service with the hope of any effective results it calls for a deep and real concern, a big humility of soul, and all along the line, the spirit of the seeker after the Divine purpose of mankind.—CARL HEATH.

What we are is the only thing that matters. Let us get our foundations right, and try to get our lives ordered and sincere and simple; all else will follow in the most fitting way. "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness." Words are not necessary, if the lives are honest efforts to practise the presence of God.—GEORGE L. HODGKIN, in "The Demands of Quaker Worship."

THE BROKEN TETHER.

Virginia M. Murray was speaking in Philadelphia last week before the annual meeting of the Travelers' Aid. She is an expert in her line and very properly general secretary of the Travelers' Aid in New York City. She made members of her audience feel how Christian the work is, and how the omnipresent agents at Broad Street Station or elsewhere, ably represent us all in the Good Samaritan spirit, to traveling aliens, or to runaway girls, or to helpless little children. Incidentally, it is to be hoped that many in her audience, as well as many not there, would feel the urge to contribute to the $30,000 a year required to express this Christian feeling in this way, but this article is not written as an appeal for funds, nor even as an appeal for a wider interest in a worthy charity. An arresting expression, used by the speaker, and written above as a title, is actually the subject of this writing.

"This has been called," the speaker said, "the age of the broken tether." One might draw aside in the twilight, by the open fire, and reflect a half hour on the implications of such words. In the social, moral and spiritual world, it would surely be found, that they have momentous meaning. Like it or not, they represent not a theory, but a condition, and they force the question, as we sit in serious reflection, "Shall we supinely confess our helplessness or shall we soberly seek a way out?" Whatever our individual decision may be, social workers and educators have accepted the challenge. They set themselves consciously to deal with the age of the broken tether.

In the smouldering embers of our fire there are memories of our limited experience in real tethers that we had actually seen broken. These recollections carried us out into the Rocky Mountains. We are in memory with expert guides on a camping expedition in the wilderness. The dozen or more horses in our camp represent our connection with the indispensable civilization thirty or forty miles away. In the early morning we waken to learn that some of the horses have broken their tethers, and that the guides have the problem of overtaking them or of enticing them back to the pack. There, in the early morning, two principles that govern such a situation are disclosed. Some guides are on familiar, winning terms with the animals. The horses will almost return to them upon call. Such as resist these blandishments, mostly find the attractions of savory food irresistible. Undoubtedly there is a much wider range of quality and disposition in horses than thus pictured. For the emergency of our particular case, the need was met by these resources and the horses caught. And so in our reflection upon "the broken tether" in our present human society, we find ourselves asking some questions along these two lines. Are we in the homes, the school, the church, on "familiar, winning" terms with the colts? Have we cultivated pasture "within the pale" that will have an irresistible attraction to them? Already during the present winter Friends have had the opportunity to hear three modern educators who have certainly made some distinct progress in meeting these new conditions. The so-called Dalton plan of education, with its slogan, "We learn by trying," can also give us all some needed hints. We have all got to set ourselves earnestly to this business of trying, else our civilization will get away from us. Fortunately those with broken tethers—the whole rising generation if we class them all thus, are still susceptible to eternal law. This susceptibility is as certainly planted in them as in any previous generation. Were we recording a personal conviction we should say, more certainly planted in them, than in any previous generation. The case, then, is anything but hopeless even though we feel that in coping with it we individually may be so. We may fail to win the young in spite of all our love for them and all our work on their behalf.

Let us reiterate the reasons for this failure. We have not in all probability reached the point of "illuminated sympathy." This is in part an instinct, but it is much more than an instinct. The illumination must come from all directions. We shall acquire it only by endless patience and observation and association with the young.

Last week we printed a sentence from the "Mirrors of Downing Street:" "The human mind after all cannot rest in triviality." This is a prophetic expression of another of the eternal instincts resident in this untethered age. The substantial things in life, in literature, in religion can be made alluring. Let us dismiss our pessimism. Without seeking far we shall find these attractions are being made alluring.

When Mary H. Lewis tells us that her school children scorn the movies and other cheap amusements, because they have interests that grip them so strongly that they cannot be diverted, we have opening vistas of hope beyond measure. Shall our Friends' families and Friends' schools and Friends' meetings, in these particulars, fall behind new projects at Buffalo or Dayton? We once led in this line. These very speakers to whom we have referred insist that we have the background and the resources to lead still.

SWITCHES.

Often, on First-days when it was fine, we would go for a walk down to a delectable region called "the meadows." Sometimes "Ben" or "Ike," the English setters, who covered many more miles than we did in the course of the expedition, would start up a snipe. Then, too, there was the little pond, known under the flattering title of "Second Lake," where father taught us for the first time how to make stones skip across the water, and when one of these, after a particularly skilful throw, would actually bound out upon the opposite shore, it was the cause of much jubilation and excitement among the four small boys eagerly watching its course.

But getting to this happy hunting-ground necessitated a long, hot walk down the railroad, with nothing more particularly to interest a small boy than putting two pins down for the train to flatten out into a "pair of scissors," or to walk along the track, with wildly gyrating pin-wheel arms, trying to keep one's balance. This last afforded ever fresh amusement, and served to while away a shadeless, baking half-hour—especially where, twice, the track went over a little stream, and there was the (largely imaginary) possibility of falling through into the water.

Sometimes there would be a switch, and here we often tried to see how far we could go with one foot on each track. For a time it was easy enough. The tracks were near enough together to walk without difficulty. But as one advanced, and the rails diverged more and more, it became increasingly difficult to keep a foot on each, until finally it grew quite impossible, and either one had to stop where one was, right in one's tracks (or, rather, on them), or else fall off, yielding the palm to someone with legs a little longer.

We are told that we "cannot serve two masters"—but this seems not at all to discourage us from trying. Yet our efforts are just as useless and just as absurd as those of the little boys who tried to walk both rails of the switch. We are attracted to Christ's way, but there is so much that is attractive in other directions, too. Why not try to include both? Yet we may know in advance that we shall fail. It is not possible. We shall apparently succeed for a little while, but soon we shall find that we cannot go on, and if we try we shall only fail ignominiously.

I do not hold with those who picture the way of Jesus as ugly and austere, a rough, stony, cheerless road as compared with the famous "primrose path." It is a wonderful road, with views of matchless beauty, even if it does, of necessity, "wind uphill all the way." But there do come times for all of us, when we must make a choice. There are forks in our path, we come to "switches" where we must decide one way or the other. When we do reach such points in our lives, when we do have to choose between Christ's way and some other, may strength be given every one of us, and all the needful courage, to make our choice without faltering, and to show on whose side we are. Otherwise we must be numbered among that miserable group who "believed on him, but because of the Pharisees they did not confess him, lest they should be put out of the synagogue. For they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God."

LEAVES FROM A SOUTHERN JOURNAL.

First Month 14th.—The snow persisted in our landscape until we were below Washington, where we had just a glimpse, but a beautiful one, of the dome of the Capitol and the stately Monument, against a glowing sunset sky, and the full moon rising over the Potomac.

Richmond was reached in the late evening and the Jefferson Hotel gave us a comfortable resting place. The hostelry keeps up its good reputation in spite of a newer Hotel "Richmond;" and the beautiful statue of Thomas Jefferson in the palm room was freshly appreciated. The two Confederate Museums, telling a silent story of the suffering brought by war, were visited next morning. The new Museum, called "Battle Abbey," contains only paintings, and the mural decorations in the North gallery, the work of a French artist, Hoffbauer, repay a careful study. Every detail is so wonderfully carried out, that it is no surprise to see in another room, the many small "studies" that preceded his final work,—the number of small clay horses, for example, modelled in all positions. The commanding figure of Robert E. Lee on his grey horse "Traveler," dominates the room, as the central figure in a large painting.

We much enjoyed a visit to the home of Chief Justice Marshall, built in 1796, which has been kept in excellent repair by an association of women, and is a fine example of a colonial home. The old furniture and especially the family portraits are of great interest. His "robe of office" is shown in a glass case, still in excellent preservation. A comment on sight-seers was gently spoken by the lady in charge, "I had to have this chair roped," she said, "for when I told the people it was Marshall's own chair they all sat down in it and the seat was giving away." The soft voices and courteous manners of the women who are in charge of such places in the South should have their effect upon the most thoughtless tourist.

A long day's travel across lower Virginia and the Carolinas brought us, late at night, to Charleston. It was not the best part of these States through which we passed and the scenes from the car windows presented in varying degree, the pines, the oaks with their clumps of green mistletoe, the Negro cabins with all the family gathered in or about the doorway, and the mule teams, still more abundant than the automobile (though these are also plentiful). Of course there were towns interspersed, and we stopped at one of them for an old time railroad dinner, a novelty to the younger members of our party. The call "twenty-five minutes for dinner," the hurried trip across the tracks, the clanging dinner bell, the "groaning board" with all set on at once, and neat tickets, "one dinner one dollar," presented to each of us, made a variety in our day's journey.

We awoke to Charleston's brightest sunshine, and found our day all too short to see the old houses and churches, the Battery, with its views across the harbor, and its fine live oaks and palmettos. The violets, roses, and camellias, all in bloom, made the snowy landscape we had left but a few days behind us seem like a dream.

We had been told not to let our spirits be depressed by the lack of present-day activity in Charleston, so it was rather surprising to hear, in old St. Michael's Church, an up-to-date talk on efficient health service. The brisk doctor made special reference to the care of mothers and babies and pointed out that it was not only a charity, but a "business proposition" and "a good investment." The fine old English architecture of the church building is of interest, and the stately spire, which has withstood fire and earthquake, recalls the story, popular as a recitation in the writer's Westtown days, of how, during a fire, a slave climbed the steeple, tore off the blazing shingles, and flinging them down, stayed the destruction. For this he was given his freedom. And the poem ended: "The slave that saved St. Michaels, went out from that door a man."

The old church-yard, with its ivy-grown walls is deeply interesting. We were puzzled by one relic, but later found its history in a book entitled "My Beloved South." "A young English settler came to Charleston with his wife and his belongings, among them a very solid oak bedstead. When his wife died he had no money for a headstone, but hoping eventually to buy one, he put up temporarily the head of the bed. On it is cut in rude letters: 'Mary Ann Luyton, wife of Will Luyton. Died Sep. 9th, 1770, in the 27th year of her age.' Perhaps he left Charleston before he could provide another headstone; at any rate this stout oak memorial is as good to-day as when it was erected in 1770, its quaintness making it a subject of keen interest to the tourist. It is protected by a strong wire netting, and there seems to be no reason why it should not last another century."

The lasting qualities are shown in the wood of some of the old houses also, and it is marvellous what the city has withstood—devastating fire, earthquake and two great wars. The effect of the latter, especially of the Civil War, has been, one of the historians of Charleston tells us, favorable to the keeping of the old homes in the hands of the same families, and therefore preserving the old-world charm, in which it is said Quebec is the only rival of Charleston. We hope for later visits to add to these first impressions as we are but twenty odd miles away at Summerville.

First Month 19th.—Last evening, our host, who was born here, gave us an account of the earthquake of 1886, when "not a chimney was left standing in Summerville," and for months the people camped in tents, experiencing slighter "quakes" at times, and fearing another heavy one. The first night as they cowered in the darkness, an old colored friend, passing by, called "Marse Ed'ard, any one hu't in dar?" and hearing they were all safe, went on "Jus' come down to the corner, somethin' done bus' the waters loose." Sure enough, a crevice had opened in the earth and the dry "branch" had become such a torrent that when they wished to visit the neighbors the men and boys of the family had to carry the women over on their backs. For months little bubbling springs were found in the woods and fields where no water had been before, and about them sand of such bright and varied colors that the children amused themselves by coking up one end of a lamp chimney and filling it with layers of contrasting hues. Our host,—a boy himself at the time,—had made several of these collections. He spoke of the loud report accompanying the heaviest earthquake and the sulphurous smell in the air. He often entertains us with descriptions of Southern life, and his experiences in deer and turkey hunting.

The giant pines of the "Georgia long-leaved" variety are a striking feature of the town and make the frame cottages nestled under their shade look small by comparison. Many birds are about. The lively "chee-winks" or "towhees" scratch among the fallen pine needles like little chickens. Cardinals, blue birds, jays and mocking birds abound, though there is little song as yet. Camellias or Japonicas as they say here, the "sweet olive," roses and violets are a-bloom, and fresh lettuce and spinach come from the sandy little garden plots. Venison and quail come to our table, and we hear of turkey hunting, though our hostess tells us that the wild turkeys are less plentiful than in former years.

EDUCATION.

"EDUCATION AND THE TIMES."

In the afternoon session of the Friends' Educational Association, Frank D. Slutz of the Moraine Park School, Dayton, Ohio, talked on "Education and the Times."

In his usual happy vein he opened with a story—"Peter's wife's mother lay sick with a fever" and he expressed the hope that he would not repeat himself too much as he had spoken several times to the Friends.

He felt the audience had a right to disagree with what he said.

In a much condensed form I quote: If you put emphasis on yesterday you are a conservative. The man who asked why we should study Japanese history because all that could happen had done so in Rome was undoubtedly a conservative.

Those who always look forward to to-morrow are radicals. Those who look neither to the future nor to the past, but attend to now, the great time, are wise, for he who wisely uses now will succeed. The only time one can control is now—the present. The people who fret about what they have said and what they hope to say are futile.

Elderly people often look to the past. If children take a trip they enjoy the ride now, but older people often watch the time, thinking how long it will be before they will arrive at their destination; after arriving and staying a few minutes they look forward to taking the train back.

Now—my home, my school are going to enjoy now. We live now. I believe in the future life, but I feel that the present segment of life given to me is important and I must make the most of it.

Some are not optimistic about to-day. If we read history we know we will soon crawl up out of the mud and mire.

What are the signs of the time?

I. The only authority that people will listen to is the authority of truth. Truth and constancy are what count. Business, education, and everything must be based on truth, for in truth there is the most comfort.

II. The world is just a little crowded neighborhood. We must know all sorts of people and they will become our neighbors.

III. The day is past when we are compelled to do our moral duty. By moral duty I mean custom of tribe and clan.

I owe my morals to my neighbors. We all owe moral obligations to the city.

One cannot be flippant about the Volstead Act and speeding. We are accountable to our equals and not to our superiors, for they have disappeared. We are under the moral authority of our equals. If I ask people to serve on a committee I must obey them. I can discuss the matter, but I can't do as I please. Democracy tends to slip back into the control of one because we haven't learned that lesson.

IV. Leisure is increasing all the time. Working-men may have more leisure time if machines are perfected, so the problem of how to use that leisure time arises.

V. The men who make the machines are greater than the machines they make.

VI. Never in the history of the world has there been such a drain on the nerves. Business men feel it as is evidenced by the furrowed brows of men in restaurants and street cars.

VII. The day of the real king is coming. By the real king is meant the man who functions—not the one who gains his position by wealth or pull. King of Push takes the place of King of Pull. If a man can function, I respect him, if he can't he gets no respect. Theodore Roosevelt was in my opinion a real king.

One genuine sign of the times is that none is to be honored who hasn't his own power.

Last point. Never in the history of the world have men been so hungry for spiritual realities of life. Long will people sit at the feet of one who can explain spiritual truths. This is a spiritually hungry age!

If the above points are true, what can we [teachers] do?

Make science the main topic of school. Let little children become listeners in where the larger ones are experimenting. The country school had much to recommend it in the way the smaller children learned from the older ones. Everyone is interested in science! Observe the truth and get away from prejudices. Some people love to act according to prejudices, but we must get away from them.

Stories of the neighbors around us will make for lack of prejudice.

How many of you could pass an examination about the Japanese? Pupils know more ancient history than they do present. We must know our neighbors!

One year when I was teaching in a public school I joined the Commerce Club and after that it was, "Hello, Frank," and I had arrived at the neighbor stage. When a rumor came to the attention of one of the members he slapped me on the back and asked what I was up to in my factory and told me his concern and I was able to adjust the trouble. If I had not been a neighbor, but had shut myself up in my office the gossip about school would have raged and I would have been unable to remedy it because I would have known nothing about it.

Lamb said, "How can I hate him? I know him."

Boys and girls must learn self-government. Any one they raise to office must have the respect of those who elevate them.

Fine people won't serve the government because they can't get loyalty. One great job of a school is to teach loyalty by practising it. Democracy needs tremendous officers. Things grow up because we will have them.

Education should have a great deal said about good books and love of those books can be taught without too much analysis. One doesn't have to be a veterinary surgeon to love horses. Don't begin the analytical part too early.

Some are asked to analyze religion before they are allowed to enter the church. Too much analysis!

Leisure through English and the fine arts must be encouraged.

The biggest thing for leisure is service for others. We need not fear the leisure of the working-man if he spends the time that way.

Physical education is necessary if our nervous systems are going to stand the strain of the present day. Learn to play! Out of Anglo-Saxon hands goes power if they lose their stability of nerves.

"Pray every day as if everything depended on the Almighty, work as if all depended on you," is a quotation worth remembering.

In school it is necessary to have all kinds of boys and girls working together. Have a democratic scale of rich and poor together. We want pupils to know people of splendid souls. Unless classes know each other they will hate each other. Get someone outside of your own class to sit at your table.

Encourage kings by functioning. Educate for spiritual functioning.

At Moraine Park School the boys came to me and asked if they might discuss spiritual matters and I thought it a good idea and I have received some helpful and inspiring messages through them.

We won't define the source of spiritual truth, but we must be sure the pupils are in search of that source.

Teachers must not care more for subject matter than for pupils. There must be great companionship between pupils and teachers. Make pupils able to meet the times. Know what it means really to live among fellows.

A discussion followed, which brought out the point that F. D. Slutz believes in following up the work of his pupils. Progressive education needs following up and checking of pupils as much as any other variety of education.

Reported by Martha C. H. Swan.

"UNDERSTANDING."

Why is it that the word "Quaker" is like "open Sesame" in all Central and Northern Europe? Why is it that thousands flock to hear Henry Hodgkin in China deliver an address on Quakerism? Three years ago Friends were practically unknown in Central Europe. Why the change?

Is it the material help they have given? The American Relief Administration has given more relief in Austria and Poland than the Quakers, but no one would come to hear an address on the A. R. A. The Red Cross organizations of many nationalities, including the American, have probably given more material aid, but few would come to a meeting to hear about the Red Cross.

Is it because they have declared themselves a religious sect having a religious message which will save the world from sin or its inhabitants from eternal punishment? Most certainly not, for they have done nothing of the kind and in Germany have turned down opportunities to speak on Quakerism lest it be thought they were trying to make converts. Were they carrying on a sectarian religious propaganda they would hardly be tolerated, as they are in Catholic Poland, Austria and South Germany or Lutheran North Germany. On the contrary, they have been commended by a Catholic Bishop in Freiburg, i. e., because, unlike a certain other relief organization, they have not used the assembling of children at their feeding centres as an opportunity for distributing tracts.

And yet they are exerting an influence and spreading a message of brotherhood and international goodwill and co-operation of incalculable import because unseen and to a large extent unrealized. So much is this so, that there are those who declare that in a few years "Quaker" will be the most hated name in Central Europe because of their influence as "Jesus" at one time was the most hated name in Jerusalem.

How is it that people are willing to listen to this message? From the end of First Month to the middle of Eighth Month last year I spent my time going from one to another of upwards of sixty large and small cities in Northern Germany. In some there had been child feeding since the previous year. In others it was just being started. In all these cities I found the answer to this question to be "understanding." The mother and father believed that we understood their feelings, their problem of properly nourishing their children; the social worker believed we understood her problems; the city official that we understood his difficulties in meeting increasing prices with a stationary income; the teacher, the doctor each expected to find in us an understanding heart and mind. To the extent in which we lived up to or disappointed this belief, did we succeed or fail in getting across our message. That Berlin and some of the other cities reached in 1920, were the most difficult to manage and the least responsive was due not merely to their size, but because we had not yet learned to understand their situation and problems when they started feeding. Cities just as large started later, gave fewer difficulties and showed much greater appreciation of the spirit behind the work.

That our reputation was far greater than our deserts is unfortunately all too true. But does it not give us a hint as to the direction in which we might profitably bend our efforts at home as well as abroad? We often sorrowfully deplore the tendency toward violent action among labor-class movements. We are wont to stand somewhat aloof from them, giving this as our reason—or is it merely an excuse?—and demanding that they turn from their evil ways before we have anything to do with them. If we acquire with them the same reputation for understanding their problems, sympathizing with their aspirations, as we have abroad, would not they, too, listen to a message of co-operation and be more willing to consider the method of non-resistance?

JAPANESE NOTES.

THE TSUKUBA CONFERENCE.

The Yearly Meeting of Japan is still so small that there has been no need for Quarterly Meetings to help with the business of the Society, but the Friends of different localities feel a spiritual need of getting together oftener than once a year. Such conferences as the one held at Mt. Tsukuba, Eleventh Month 10th to 13th, are planned to meet this need.

Mt. Tsukuba is an ideal place for such a gathering. Next to Mt. Fuji it is the most famous mountain in Japan, for on its two peaks are the shrines to the god and goddess who are the ancestors of the Japanese people. Situated as it is in the middle of Ibaraki Ken, one gets a fine view of the Friends' country work. Some of us climbed to the goddess's shrine Seventh-day afternoon. We could see our field of work laid out like a map before us. Tsuchiura and Ishioka were easily seen to the east, so were the hills beyond Mito and Shimodate to the north. The level plain stretching to the ocean was dotted with hundreds of little villages which we hope some day will be Friendly communities.

Edith Newlin and I went together Sixth-day after school. It does one good to get out into a country place and meet informally with strong Christians from our meetings. Gilbert Bowles had gone up before us and kindly sent a man from the hotel to meet the train. It was just after sunset when we started our climb up a winding path, part stone steps, part mountain road to the quiet little hotel. We enjoyed the glimpses of the plain below us and the rising mists all silvery in the moonlight. About a dozen Friends were gathered, really for the evening discussion which Thomas Jones led on "The Spiritual Foundations of the Society of Friends." He traced the religious movements preparing the way for Friends and gave a brief history of the early mystical bodies. Emphasis was placed upon the influences which effected our form of organization, worship, etc., as well as our beliefs. The three main topics of belief discussed were: Spiritual at-one-ment with God, God's Manifestation of Himself in Man, and Love as the Force which lifts man from selfishness and strife to God. The question was asked whether the Inner Light approached Pantheism and just where the differences lay. Japanese Friends are, many of them, students of religion and are keen to understand just what Friends have believed.

The next morning the discussion centered around the application of the Inner Light. T. E. Jones dwelt particularly on its application in relation to worship, family life, business and war. This brought out further discussion as to just what the Inner Light was and how it differed from conscience and the Holy Spirit.

The morning devotional meetings were times of real spiritual uplift. As the Washington Conference was just beginning it was much in our thoughts and prayers. The morning meeting on First-day showed the tremendous value of unprogrammed meetings. There seems to be a growing appreciation of such meetings. Even though one might not understand what was said the spirit of the meeting could be easily felt.

Such meetings are encouraging to the Japanese and Americans alike. The opportunity for exchange of ideas, for advice on local problems and for getting the inspiration of such meetings as those led by Thomas E. Jones helped us all. We felt more strongly than ever that feeling of fellowship which comes to those who are workers together for a common cause.

"NICHOLAS THE WEAVER AND OTHER QUAKER STORIES."

We are glad to welcome another book of Quaker stories from the hand of Maude Robinson. She has the gift of story telling.

As in her first volume, "The Time of Her Life," she pictures very simple and commonplace scenes, but she does it with rare charm. She succeeds in making her everyday folk very real men and women and children. Her dialogue is so natural, we feel as if we had heard it with our own ears. Her people are so human we feel as if we had known them. And they are people well worth knowing. They have such homely, practical virtues, such beautiful, saintly, Christian graces which they live out so spontaneously and unaffectedly. Whole communities feel the leaven of their courage and faith, of their loyalty to duty, their love of truth and their humane unselfishness for those less fortunate. The message of each story is clear without being didactic.

With equal skill she draws clear-cut pictures of the simple, homely daily life and occupations of her characters of one hundred and fifty and two hundred years ago and gives us lovely bits of nature as their setting.

Often she brings on well-known Friends of earlier days or schools and philanthropies started by Friends, and so in an interesting way introduces the reader to them. In "Poor Timatha" we see the sad need for the York Retreat established by William Tuke and its significance as an experiment in the humane treatment of insanity. In "Transported," Elizabeth Fry's prison work is shown. In "Harmless as Doves," the suffering and faith of Irish Friends during the uprising of 1798 are very faithfully drawn. William Wilberforce and Hannah More appear in "A Poor Quaker Rabbit-Catcher," as the founders of schools in Mendip villages.

The book is one which appeals to old and young, but should be especially helpful and attractive to boys and girls in their teens. The hope expressed by the author in her preface ought to be largely fulfilled, where she says:

"If these ten sketches of homely country lives in by-gone days are not merely pleasant reading, but give to the present generation a fresh appreciation of things that are lovely, honest and of good report; a fresh hunger and thirst after practical righteousness, peace and good-will to all, they will not have been written in vain."

ANNA MOORE CADBURY.

"THE HUMAN FACTOR IN BUSINESS."*

There are many and various ways of preaching the Gospel, but one of the most effective is through business conducted on lines followed by the Rowntree firm in their cocoa works at York, England. A member of the firm, B. Seebohm Rowntree, has written a book: "The Human Factor in Business," which deals with problems met in their large factory and the methods adopted to solve them. As an industrial administrator of thirty years' experience and one concerned for the welfare of his fellows, he has a message for business men, social workers and for all interested in the man or woman worker. He thus explains why he has published the book: "I should be the last to claim any special merit for our methods, but we have received so much help from others, that it seemed incumbent on us to throw our experience into the common stock of knowledge, in the hope that we may thus repay, in some measure, the debt we owe to the experience of other firms." The spirit which permeates the Works is unobtrusively shown in side-lights when various business arrangements are discussed. Thus when treating of the employment of new employees: "The applicant should learn something of the spirit in which it is sought to conduct the factory—a spirit of mutual good-will, in which both the management and the workers give of their best. It is not a matter of simply setting on an extra hand, but of seeking the co-operation of another colleague. To convey the idea that we are bestowing a favor when we are employing a man is to introduce the wrong spirit at the start. We are, on the contrary, making a contract which appears to be mutually advantageous."

"There are," says our author, "certain conditions which must be secured for the workers, no matter what the industrial structure may be. These are:—

"1. Earnings sufficient to maintain a reasonable standard of comfort.

"2. Reasonable hours of work.

"3. Reasonable economic security during the whole working life and in old age.

"4. Good working conditions.

"5. A status for the workers suitable to men in a free country in the twentieth century."

The methods used to attain these ends are interestingly discussed. A "Wages Section" has been organized to deal with the problem of wages and to co-ordinate the departments in this respect. The hours for work were settled by a plebiscite of all employees over eighteen years of age. The result was that a forty-four hour week was adopted with Seventh-day as holiday, so that the workers are free from 5 p. m. Sixth-day to 7.30 a. m. Second-day. A Pension Fund, Widows' Pension and other schemes have been adopted to offset the loss occasioned to the workers by non-employment, sickness, etc., but these do not fully meet the requirements and further solution is sought. Much thought has been given to make the working conditions favorable to health and happiness. Attractive work-rooms, properly ventilated and lighted, are provided and an effort is made to eliminate noise incident to the work. Well-arranged cloak-rooms, lavatories and bath-rooms add much to the comfort of the workers. A restaurant is conducted at the factory where the charge for food is its cost plus the cost of service. The aim is to make the dining-room "a place where the fullest possible advantage can be taken of the dinner hour, for the renewal of the vital energy which has been expended during the morning's work."

All applicants for work are examined by the physician and the employees have the service free of charge of doctor, dentist, optician and oculist. A trained nurse also is on duty. "In terms of happiness," S. B. Rowntree says, "the benefits thus derived are considerable and the improved health has reflected itself in greater efficiency and increased output."

An "employment manager" engages the employees. He is concerned "solely with the human side of the administration." To the same manager is confided the dismissal of employees and the investigation of complaints. When a new girl is employed she attends school for a week. Here, through visits to the departments of the factory, lectures explanatory of the work, and intercourse with her companions she becomes somewhat familiar with her duties at the start. In certain departments a woman supervisor is appointed, whose duty is to supervise from "the welfare standpoint."

In order that the various officers should have the special training necessary, lectures and visits to establishments of a similar kind are arranged. The schools for boys and girls were discontinued when "continuation schools" were provided for under an English "Education Act" and an agreement was made that the local education authority should use the factory class-rooms. The gymnastic classes for boys and girls are, however, continued. Adult education is provided for through an educational advisor whom the workers can consult for advice and help in choice of lectures and classes. All employees have access to an excellent library.

The most appreciated recreation facility is the garden allotment for which a small rent is paid. A lady gardener is employed to help the girls and to instruct them in gardening. There are foot ball, cricket, swimming and other clubs for recreation and entertainment.

A scheme of "joint control" has been adopted for this factory and is being further developed. The workers are consulted in all matters which directly affect them and advance is made as rapidly as they seem fitted to share increased responsibility.

The effort to remove causes of unrest and discontent and to "humanize" the condition of the workers cannot be called "benevolent paternalism." The workers resent this, but "they demand that industry shall be so organized that proper consideration shall be given to their individual welfare. If they are to co-operate in producing a high output of goods, which will compete successfully in the world market, they rightly demand, in their working lives, conditions which will enable and encourage them to give of their best." "It is not philanthropy on the one hand, or cute hard-headedness on the other that will bring peace. It will only come when Labor is convinced that employers generally recognize the human aspect of industry, and are anxious, not only to give the workers 'a square deal,' but to promote their individual welfare."

The book is a worthy contribution to a subject of vital importance. It commends itself not only as a record of what one factory has done, but of a steady and patient pressing forward to the attainment of a high ideal.—J. W. B.

THE QUAKER APPEAL FOR FLOUR IS BEING ANSWERED.

Thirty-six Carloads, Gift of People from California to Pennsylvania, Now on the Way to Seaboard.

Flour, the gift of the American people, is beginning to roll from all parts of the country toward the Atlantic seaboard, where ships will take it to the starving people of Russia. A little over a month ago the Friends' appeal for flour to aid in saving the lives of the 15,000,000 starving people of Russia, was sent out to the centres of all the agricultural communities of the United States, and also the banks and commercial organizations of the cities. The daily press and the religious press of the country carried the news of this appeal; and representatives from the Service Committee's headquarters at Philadelphia followed the appeal into the localities where flour is most abundant.

Since that time the answer of the country has been given unmistakably clear. It has been that the Christian people of America feel the concern that is laid upon them to aid in relieving the agony and suffering and death which are destroying human life to an extent which the mind cannot grasp. The economic condition in our own country, which has thrown so many people out of work and lessened the resources of so many others, has cut deep into the amount of the gift which people would ordinarily have made, but the response has shown that many people are giving to an extent which will cause real suffering and sacrifice here.

The millers of the country have, with hardly an exception, agreed to sell flour at a cost price; and they themselves have each made a contribution out of their own stores before asking others to buy. Community organizations, such as chambers of commerce and rotary clubs, have co-operated in enlisting the support of their communities behind this object. A typical case is that of Swope Brothers in Johnstown, Pennsylvania, who took the responsibility for selling a carload of flour in the community, and with the active support of the agencies of the town the car, which will mean life to Russian people, has been received at seaboard. This action was duplicated by the Yardley Milling Company, of Yardley, Pennsylvania, and by the citizens of Mound Ridge, Kansas, who contributed two carloads; by the Buhler Mills, of Buhler, Kansas, which contributed two carloads. Flory Brothers, of Pequea, Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, sold a carload of flour in their community and that has also been shipped.

Minneapolis has been foremost among the larger communities, having raised a fund with which they purchased six carloads of flour. Kansas City bought four carloads, and St. Louis is now organizing a committee and has set a quota of eight thousand barrels.

These are only a few examples which have been quoted from the many communities and mills and individuals who have co-operated in this campaign. Has your community done anything to aid in this effort? More than that, have you done anything? No matter how much you might secure, it cannot be enough; for there are 15,000,000 people starving in Russia, and even with our government appropriation there are funds enough to feed only 4,000,000. You may think that your own barrel of flour, or a carload of flour from your community, is only comparable to a grain of sand on the great beach; but if you were the one who received even a portion of a barrel of flour in Russia because some one person in America sent it, you would feel that it was worth more than all in the world.

If nothing has been done in your community you are the one to begin this work. See your local miller and your bank and your town officials; organize an effort to secure some quota of flour for your community to send. The Service Committee Headquarters will be glad to furnish you with information and other material which you may need. It is something to have good-will towards suffering and broken people. But the greatest love of all is that a man will lay down his life for his friends.

ONE HUNDRED AND ONE BALES OF CLOTHING SENT TO EUROPE.

The store-room sent its First Month shipment of clothing to Europe on the 30th, it being one of the largest shipments of the year. In all, 101 bales of clothing were sent, 48 being sent to Austria, 45 to Germany, and 8 were the gift of the college students of America to the college students of Europe, being sent out under the direction of the Y. M. C. A.

What this will mean in Europe may be understood from a cable which was received last week from Vienna. The words are very simple, but they contain the meaning of life or death. "Continued severe weather, great need of clothing—Friends' Relief Mission."

Clothing received within the next few weeks will reach Europe in time for use against the cold of the very severe weather of Third Month. All kinds are needed. Underwear, shoes, dresses and suits. All clothing which is not specifically marked for some country will be sent to Austria; as the greatest need at the present time is in the unhappy city of Vienna. Will you not send your clothing immediately? Just an ordinary thoughtless delay of a couple of weeks may mean that although your clothing will be greatly needed for the spring and even summer months, it will not meet the outstanding need of protecting the body from cold. Send it care of the American Friends' Service Committee Store-room, Fifteenth and Cherry Streets, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

POLAND WANTS SEEDS.

Spring always brings the remembrance of planting. In America we don't have to think very much further, because when one thinks of planting then one just goes and gets the seeds to plant. But in Poland it is different. One may think of planting, but then the whole problem begins. The soil is there waiting to give a harvest. But the farmers of Poland are helpless as they can't just go and get seed at an overflowing store-house.

The Friends' Mission in Poland reports that $10,000 is needed immediately for field seeds for this spring and $2,000 would provide vegetable seeds for the Baranowice and Pinsk districts. These are the districts where the Friends will be doing their intensive work this spring.

This condition is caused mostly through the returning refugees, coming into Poland at the rate of 2,000 a day, reaching their homes in a destitute condition. They have been exiled for three or four or five years, and upon their return they are helpless without tools or seeds or even homes. It is not relief, which is just a passing thing at best, which is needed. It is the actual reconstruction of their homes and barns which is a lasting thing. This is the effort which the Friends' Mission is engaged upon at the present time. It will not only carry them over a winter; it will mean the upbuilding of a family and community life for years to come, because it is being built upon the solid foundation of houses and tools and even cattle. By contributing to this effort you are contributing to the stabilizing of a nation, and this means the bringing of a wild, hopeless existence into the deep peace of security and hope.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

EVERY ONE WHO READS THE FRIEND OUGHT TO KNOW THAT—

1. While the Conference for Limitation of Armaments is going on with its plans for curbing MILITARISM in this country and in the world, our own militarists are not idle.

"While the expensive race in capital ship armaments will cease, there henceforth will be an intensive competition in excellence of personnel. The competition, in a way, naval men point out, thus has only changed its aspect."—Public Ledger, First Month 8, 1922.

"Eliminate a certain percentage of armament, if you wish, but don't eliminate national preparedness."—Army and Navy Journal, First Month 14, 1922.

2. A nation-wide campaign against MILITARY TRAINING for high school boys has been started by the American Federation of teachers. The League of Women Voters has also endorsed the movement. The arguments used by these organizations are as follows:—

First—Because not even Germany deemed it advisable to maintain military training for school boys in time of peace.

Second—Because military training is not an adequate substitute for physical training.

3. The COLLEGE STUDENTS of this country through the NATIONAL STUDENTS' COMMITTEE FOR THE LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS is asking every college in the country to hold a student meeting during this month, at which questions relative to the work of the Washington Conference shall be discussed. Suggested topics for such discussion are in brief:—

1. Issues which will go before the Senate.
2. Expressions of opinion as to the work of the Conference.
3. Issues which are associated with the work of the Conference but not within its scope.

4. Matters on which the Conference has failed to reach complete decisions.

5. Issues of the future.

Any resolutions passed at such student meetings are to be taken to Washington by a group of students who will be received by President Harding on Second Month 1st. It is the hope of the Committee that "this colossal demonstration will attract international attention" and that "it will have a bearing, not only on Senate ratification" but also on our proposed future course as a nation.

4. WHAT SHALL BE DONE WITH THE MONEY SAVED BY THE PROPOSED NAVAL HOLIDAY? This question is being answered by different people according to their different interests. The militarists want to spend it on a larger personnel for the navy. DEAN WEST, OF PRINCETON, says that the money is needed for education. . . . "The annual interest on the cost of one of the newest great battleships is enough to pay the annual salary of a thousand school teachers. It makes men wonder whether a thousand teachers of children are not worth more to the world than a big new battleship."

5. BOOKS AND MAGAZINES.

Disarmament: Reely (H. W. Wilson Co.). A handbook for debating, giving material on both sides of the question. Useful for school debates and for peace essay contests.

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE.

XIII.

This week, the twelfth of the Conference, has seen the completion of its tasks. Two plenary sessions, the fifth and the sixth, have been held and have formally adopted the agreements reached after long and weary debate in the various committees. The agreements thus reached and adopted in the six plenary sessions have been embodied in eight treaties, which are to be duly signed the first of next week.

The treaties, signed by our own delegation in the name of the President, will then be referred to the Senate for ratification. There are various prophecies as to the Senatorial opposition to be encountered by them. It appears probable at this writing that the Senators, both Republican and Democratic, with but few exceptions, will vote for ratification. But should serious opposition develop, we should all stand ready to do our utmost to overcome it. The Church Peace Union has already laid its plans to engage at the first sign of necessity in an immediate and country-wide campaign in support of the treaties. There is no doubt that all Friends will participate in that campaign to the utmost of their ability. For with us, it is not a question of partisanship, or even of statesmanship. It lies at the heart of our religion; it is of the very essence of Christianity as we interpret the religion of the Prince of Peace.

To enumerate all of the achievements of the Conference and to estimate the importance of each of them, in a single letter, would make that letter unduly long. Permit me then, in this, to classify and enumerate its achievements, and to defer until the last letter of this series an attempt to estimate the significance of both that which has been done and that which has been attempted. The Conference was summoned for the purpose of limiting armaments, of halting the approach of war in the Pacific, and of removing some of the causes of war in the Far East. It has made progress along each of these lines.

Its limitation of armaments is preceded by a noteworthy reduction of naval armaments. Sixty-eight great battleships, of nearly 1,900,000 tons' displacement are to be "scrapped" by the United States, Great Britain and Japan, while these countries, France and Italy together are to retain about the same number of ships with 100,000 tons' less displacement. The limitation itself includes: The abandonment of existing programs for the building of capital ships, no more of these to be built during the next fifteen years, except for replacement. The maintenance of the existing ratio of 5:5.3:1.75:1.75 among the five great naval powers, and the consequent cessation of that competitive increase of navies, which has been so prolific a cause of international distrust and of war. The limitation of capital ships built ten years from now—if any more should be built—to 35,000 tons' displacement. The restriction of guns, on capital ships, to a calibre of 16 inches. (Plans were laid before the Washington Conference for the building of battleships with 50,000 tons' displacement and 18-inch guns.) The limitation of auxiliary ships (except aircraft carriers) to 10,000 tons, and of their guns to 8 inches. The limitation of aircraft carriers to a total tonnage of 135,000 for the United States; 135,000 for Great Britain; 81,000 for Japan; 60,000 for France; and 60,000 for Italy; and of each aircraft carrier to a maximum of 27,000 tons (except that each nation may build two such carriers with a maximum tonnage of 33,000). The number and size of guns on aircraft carriers are also limited to eight for those over 6 inches, and to a maximum calibre of 8 inches.

The submarine is so curbed in its activities by the rules agreed upon that it is made practically impossible for : to attack merchant ships, and this is followed up by a formal agreement to prohibit the use of submarines as commerce destroyers.

Chemical warfare, or "the use in war of asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, and all analogous liquids, materials or devices," is prohibited as being justly condemned by the public opinion of the civilized world.

The attempt of the Conference to prevent war in the Pacific includes the limitation of naval armaments as above stated; the agreement of the four great Pacific powers to confer with one another in regard to the peaceful settlement of any grave difference which may arise among them in the future concerning their respective rights and interests in the Pacific; the agreement adopted by them to communicate with one another as to the best way of dealing with a threat of war in the Pacific due to the aggression of any other power; and the agreement adopted by the United States, Great Britain and Japan not to increase their fortifications or naval bases in most of their island possessions in the Pacific. (Some exceptions are enumerated for each of the three nations.) Another by-product of the Conference, which should aid greatly in maintaining the peace in the Pacific, is the settlement between the United States and Japan in regard to the much-disputed status of the cables on the Island of Yap and the other islands in the Pacific, a mandate over which was given to Japan by the Treaty of Versailles.

The agreements arrived at by the Conference in regard to the Far East include a considerable number which are all designed to restore and establish the territorial integrity and the sovereignty of China and Russia and the maintenance of the Open Door. Still another "by-product" of the Conference is the agreement on the part of Japan to restore Shantung to China and to evacuate Siberia and Sakhalin. Great Britain has surrendered Wei-hai-wei, and France has promised to negotiate with China as to the surrender of Kwang-chow-wang. Chinese troops, railways, post-offices, customs revenue, extra-territoriality, cables, mines and other natural resources, foreign troops and "spheres of influence" have all been carefully discussed and much unexpected progress has been made in the safeguarding of China along all of these lines, and the participation of all nations in mighty China's development on just and equal terms.

This last open session of the Conference in which I am writing these lines has been devoted largely to the many measures designed to promote just dealings with China; and the large audience has repeatedly expressed by applause the warm interest which the world cherishes towards the great ancient people and much harassed youthful republic of the Far East. A thoroughly frank and explicit exchange of views, expressed in firm and even fervent manner, has occurred between the delegates of China, Japan and the United States; and there is a conviction that the traditional policy of America towards China, which is summed up in the phrase "territorial integrity, independent sovereignty and the open door in China," has been placed upon a more solid foundation than ever before.

The very long and fruitful meetings of the Conference in its fifth and sixth plenary sessions cannot be described here in detail. One single incident may be singled out in conclusion. Arthur J. Balfour, in what may well be the swan-song of his long and illustrious career, stressed the importance of the unprecedented steps taken by the Conference, and attributed its success, first, to an earnest attempt on the part of all the delegations to adhere to the path of "simplicity, honor and honesty" for which President Harding appealed in his opening address, and, secondly, to the fact that Secretary Hughes raised so high a standard in the first proposition which he laid before the Conference relating to the reduction and limitation of armaments. The British statesman's words must be read in their entirety, to be fully appreciated; but their essence may be expressed in the words of our American poet:

"Whene'er is spoken a noble thought,
Whene'er a noble deed is wrought,
Our hearts, in glad surprise,
To higher levels rise."

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

WINTER MORNING.

In winter-time we go to school;
And every day the motor-bus
Stops at the gate, and waits for us,
All full of children that we know,
Sitting inside, row after row.

It stops and gets them, one by one,
And brings them home when school is done.

Then there is ice upon the pool
Where lilies grow. The leafless trees
Stand shivering in the winter breeze,
Except where, here and there is seen,
A cheerful, warm-clad evergreen.

There's one I always like to see,
It stands alone upon the hill
Just like some giant's Christmas tree,
I'd like to see the giant fill
It full of giant toys and light
Big candles on it Christmas night.

But when the world is deep in snow
That sparkles coldly in the sun,
The motor-buses cannot run;
They send a sleigh with runners wide
And two long seats for us inside.

That is the way I like to go,
The horses prance, and tingle-ling,
The bells upon their harness ring,
The driver cracks his whip, and blows
Steam like a dragon, through his nose.

The birds look lonely as they fly
Across the solemn winter sky.
I wish they were just half as gay
As happy children in a sleigh.

AN AMERICAN "QUAKER OUTPOST"

A VISIT TO THE FRIENDS' INDIAN BOARDING SCHOOL, TUNESASSA.

This article is reprinted from Workers at Home and Abroad.

I wish I could show you the beauty of the surroundings of the Indian Boarding School at Tunesassa, especially in this lovely "fall" weather, when the trees are changing every day and every day becoming more beautiful. The autumn here is a wonderful time. There are not only the colors we so much admire at home, but the maples, oaks and sumachs turn bright red, and when the sun shines through them they are like flames of fire.

The school is a long "frame" building, painted a Quaker grey, with white facings to doors and windows, and its roof is a dark slate color with dormer windows and cupola for the big bell. It makes a very attractive picture set in the rich green grass of the district, with trees dotted here and there and surrounded by steep hills wooded to their summit. It is situated in a valley of the Allegheny Mountains some eleven hundred feet above sea level, and though the summers are hot and the winters cold (not infrequently thirty degrees below zero), the air is so fine and light that neither heat nor cold is burdensome. The Allegheny River flows through an adjoining valley, and a width of half a mile on each side of this forty miles in length is an Indian Reservation, given to them by the Government of the United States in perpetuity. It is mostly from this Reservation that the boys and girls of this school come. They are Seneca Indians, and there are other reservations for them in this western part of New York State. Some of them are Christian Indians, and have their churches and Y. M. C. A.'s; others still keep to their old beliefs and customs.

The school was started in 1798, at a time when the red man was very suspicious of the white man, and Friends promised them that if they would send their children to school they should never have to pay for them, and to this day they have board and teaching free. They call Friends by a name which means "They have kept their word!"

There are about fifty boys and girls in residence. The boys milk the cows and help with other farm work; the girls assist with the house-work, cooking and laundry, beside learning dressmaking and sewing. Between breakfast, which is at half-past six in the morning, and school at nine, the house is a busy hive of workers. Most of the children, especially the older ones, know more or less English, but their vocabulary is small. Many of them keep their Indian characteristics, have thick, straight black hair, bright black eyes and brown skins, and are of happy, affectionate disposition. They love to be out of doors in all weathers, "like to play in the rain," and, above all, they love the snow—and there is plenty of that here in the winter time—and to go sledding. Some of those now at school are grandchildren of former pupils, and they are usually the ones whose parents are most anxious for them to come, for its influences widen and deepen as the years go on.

In other places, the Government has its own well-equipped schools, but this little "Quaker Outpost" is doing faithful, earnest work which is not in vain, and I feel sure that down the long future and through many generations there will be, because of it, a growing spirit of good-will and understanding between the red man and the white man, and many individual lives will be lived more truly as a result of the teaching and the influences gained here.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

OUR friend, Mary C. Whitney, who is still at the Pennsylvania Hospital on account of a broken hip, gave us prompt notice of the death of her brother, William C. Brathwaite, at his home in Banbury, England, on the 28th ult. She had received a cable announcing the death and saying he was only ill one day with diabetes.

A few weeks ago we received directly from him the Review of the "Later Periods of Quakerism," printed in No. 29 of THE FRIEND. It seems most fitting that Rufus M. Jones should write of our friend and we are glad to have his article in this number.

IN No. 21 of this volume we printed a report of an educational address, made at Westtown by Mary H. Lewis of the Park School, Buffalo. This report was prepared by the manager of the Educational Association from stenographic and secretarial notes. Three editors of THE FRIEND were privileged to hear the address. They felt the report to be accurate and that it transmitted a large degree of the enthusiasm of the occasion to our readers.

We make the foregoing explanation because the report has been challenged. The speaker certainly did not mean to reflect upon any one school in her picture of the congestion and artificiality of modern city life.—[Eds.]

MAURICE GREGORY of London has been in Philadelphia. He was at the Arch Street Meeting on the 5th, and intended to be at the Quarterly Meeting Second and Third-days. He gave a remarkable incident of the effect of George Fox's Journal in Japan. The Chairman of the National House of Representatives had received a copy sent from Philadelphia. He was so impressed with the power of silent waiting before God, as a method of resolving group differences of judgment, that he often resorted to it in the Diet, calling for a period of silence when difficulties seemed insurmountable.

THE continued demand for T. Edmund Harvey's "The Rise of the Quakers," first issued in 1905, has enabled the Friends' Bookshop (London) to make arrangements with the National Free Church Council for a sixth impression of the work in their Eras of Nonconformity Series. It has just appeared with a new introductory note by T. E. Harvey referring to further information which has come to light since his book was written. The little volume in its attractive red and gilt binding is excellent value to-day.

H. W. PEET.

As an addition to the above received from London, we may note that this valuable volume is to be used at Westtown School in the Course on Quakerism.

WHO CHOOSEETH A BOOK.

I am not interested in antiques when the word implies furniture, and how anyone could cherish a tender passion for wooden constructions, even though the foundation be mahogany, is beyond the grasp of my intelligence. I have had many ancient and venerable highboys pointed out to me and their beauty vigorously elucidated. On such occasions I assume a joyous smile and gasp in breathless admiration, while all the time I am wondering how they can bear the thing in the room. However, highboys are my pet antipathy. I have more sympathy with the gate-legged table and the lyre-back chair, although I cannot appreciate all their fine points. But suppose that in the same house with the highboys and others of that ilk, there is a library, a true book-lover's library with shelves from floor to ceiling containing books bound in vellum, books bound in morocco, and tucked away here and there, books bound in lowly paper with advertisements shrieking from the outside covers. There is no need for gasping admiration here. One does not exclaim and cackle over the beauty of a church, for the atmosphere within commands silence and awe; even so in a library there is a pervading sense of dignity and of lingering ancient things that must not be disturbed.

I am almost as much of an amateur at book-collecting as at furniture collecting, with this difference, however, the former perhaps will one day become a hobby and the latter will never advance beyond its present stage. With this end in view I was looking over the books in a rather dishevelled old book case, that had been removed to the third floor. With the aid of a chair and a flashlight I was curiously exploring the upper shelves when I noticed a small, flat volume bound in paper, and seemingly rather the worse for wear. I unearthed it from the venerable dust in which it had been standing and examined the title on the front cover. It was "Jerusalem Delivered," translated from the writings of ——— by ———. The names of the original writer* and of him who translated have escaped me. I had never heard of either of them. I turned over the pages and found them yellow and warped. They contained a story of the Crusaders written in verse. On the fly leaf was the name of one of my ancestors and the date 1827. A little thrill crept up my spine such as no highboy of two hundred years could inspire. For had I not discovered all by myself a wonderful little book that lacked only five years of being one hundred? I put it back with reverent fingers and continued my explorations. I found an old Cicero bearing the inevitable inky marks, and inter-linear translations written over the hardest places in a cramped hand; a set of books on English history and several delicious paper-covered novels with the front inside cover setting forth the miracles wrought by Lydia Pinkham's pills and vegetable tonics. It seems to me that Lydia herself would have furnished excellent material for a book. That bookcase on the third floor is the only one of its kind in the house. With it, mystery begins and ends. The bookshelves in the library and parlor are filled with fine and interesting books, but they are not very dusty and they are mostly of the classics, in sets, and singly, which is all just as it should be, but the element of romance does not cling around them.

But if such romance fails at home there is always Leary's and the other book-stalls in the vicinity. To me, Leary's is a fascinating place, full of unexpected things around every corner. I am always promising myself a long afternoon there, as yet, that promise has been unfulfilled. I have not mentioned the great libraries of the city because I have never been in them. I am saving them for a time when I will be able to appreciate them more than I can now. I have not discussed why one should read books, what kind of books one should choose, nor have I compared the modern novel with the classic. Perhaps all these things should have been mentioned, as this was supposed to be an editorial, but I do not know enough about any of these things to write on them. I have just put down my tiny adventures among books in the hope that there will be others who will want to go a-venturing, too.

M. A. T.

*Friends of a former generation were more devoted to epic poetry than is general at present. It is not surprising, therefore, to those who are older, that M. A. T. should find a copy of Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," in her ancestor's bookcase. Torquato Tasso, Italian poet, 1544-1595.—[Eds.]

TWO BOOKS ON THE ORIENT.

Due to the Washington Conference, public interest has been greatly stimulated in the Far East. Politicians speak of possible trouble in audible stage whispers. Travelers report no end of stories. Some of them bewildering and some helpful; picturing sometimes a far-off Orient, at other times a definite, close and interesting Orient. This is particularly so if the story-teller can clear his skirts of propaganda.

Sydney Greenbie has succeeded in bringing the East and its problems home. His two books: "Japan—Real and Imaginary" and the "Pacific Triangle," are most repaying because of the detached clearness of the author's observation. Personal experiences are sandwiched in between political comment in such a way as to make the combination not only good reading but also constructive interpretation.

It is very difficult for an Occidental to write a book about the Orient with any kind of insight. The author (S. G.) frankly refers to this predicament. Imagine my surprise when my Japanese cousin presented me with "Japan—Real and Imaginary," explaining that, in his opinion, it was the best book on Japan by a Westerner. His reasons were two. First, the Japan of the Japanese was accurately reported, and second, the writing is in the vein of naive frankness. The author has no axe to grind. Of all deadly axes, the worst is the axe of forced appreciation.

The scope of the "Pacific Triangle" differs slightly from the book on Japan. Its aim is to leave an impression of the Pacific with the reader. As the Pacific is vast, any book confined to four hundred pages is under a handicap.

I still have much mental confusion about the subtle ethnological differences between the natives of Hawaii, Fuji, Samoa, the Sandwich Islands and the Philippines. New Zealand and Australia are much easier. The clearest part of the "Pacific Triangle" is the last section, wherein the author pleads for a sense of political and racial relations—for the kinship of the human race.

"Japan—Real and Imaginary," was published in 1920 by Harper Bros. The "Pacific Triangle" was published by the Century Co., in 1921. They are both up to date. Each aids in explaining the whys and wherefores of the present treaty.

COMPETITIVE READING.

The American Friends' Literature Council has established a contest in reading Quaker literature. This is open to all Young Friends in the United States, and the prizes offered will be granted to the Friends who rank first for the greatest number and best selection of books from the prepared reading list, from among Friends throughout the entire United States. The contest is divided into two parts: one for Friends in High School, and one for Young Friends (up to thirty-five) beyond High School.

The Young Friends in High School are required to write a short review of each book read, but those beyond High School are excused from this. The manuscripts of these reviews must be clearly written on one side only and must have the name of the author on each sheet.

The contest extends from the beginning of First Month, 1922, to Seventh Month 1, 1922. Only such books as have been read during that time may be presented for credit.

Every contestant should send in a record of all books read and his reviews, if reviews are due from him, to William B. Harvey, at 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, for Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Others to whom reports may be sent are: Clarence F. Pickett, 101 S. Eighth Street, Richmond, Ind.; or J. Barnard Walton, 140 N. Fifteenth Street, Phila., Pa.

The books mentioned in the lists may be found in the libraries connected with Friends' colleges and in other Friendly centers, or they may be bought at the Friends' Book Store, 304 Arch Street, Phila., Pa.

WHAT OF THE PAST?

If you are an adult and seek to acquire a sense of history, you will be reading "Outlines of History," by H. G. Wells. It is a solid book published in both one and two volume editions, by Macmillan. The great ear-mark of the Wells' history is its international point of view. History of man from this angle makes for real progress. To deal with such a subject, even briefly, requires much work in both writing and reading.

If you are a child or the parent of a child you are doubly interested in history: First, to gather that strange historical sense, and second, to gain familiarity with the events of the past. One of the most charming books recently published is the "Story of Mankind," by Hendrik Van Loon. The book is dedicated to Jimmie.

"What is the use of a book without pictures?" said Alice.

In truth, Van Loon's history would lose one third of its charms if it were robbed of the astounding pictures that illumine its pages. The picture of the New World, the galleon a few hundred yards from a sandy strip of shore illustrates the peculiar insight of the author and his weird ability to plunk the key thought on the page with a few swift strokes of his pen.

The "History of Mankind" is essentially a children's book, and like a great many children's books it makes delightful reading for grown-ups. I have found it so.

NOT LIMITATION OF FRIENDSHIP.

"But," I said, "you don't know how nice they are. I just wish you knew some of the Japanese people I know. They are some of my very best friends, and some of the finest people I know anywhere."

I was talking to a college friend who was returning to America after six years in the foreign community of a great Chinese city. She was returning knowing practically nothing of the remarkable people among whom she had lived.

"Of course, we knew them in a business way," she said, "and some of them were very courteous and all that; we couldn't have asked anything more; but to know them in the way you mean, as friends, just didn't interest me. America's good enough for me, and if I am a good American citizen and bring up my little girl to be one, I think I've done my duty in this world."

"But it ought to interest you!" The words burst from me before I had time for polishing my speech. "I mean," I added more mildly, "that it seems to me that it's a very broadening experience to know all kinds of people. When we go to college we think it is a good thing to be thrown with girls from many parts of the country and many kinds of homes; and it's just the same thing here only more so.

"And, besides," I said, "it's very important for us of different nations to get to know each other and be friends to each other, because if we don't there'll just as likely as not be another war, and if there is, it will just about annihilate us. Have you seen the statistics comparing this last war with previous wars, and do you realize what reason we have, in this scientific age, to work as never before to prevent there ever being another war? Why, in Will Irwin's 'The Next War,' there's a diagram showing the number of men killed in this war compared with other wars; and in wars that we thought were big, like the Civil War, the line is no bigger than my finger nail, and the line for this war goes way across the page. And the only way to stop a worse war yet is to be friends."

I began to be afraid of my own vehemence by this time. "I don't mean," I said, "that it isn't a great mission to bring up such a nice little girl to be a good American citizen; but I think it's being a good American citizen, too, to devote your life to strengthening the bonds of friendship which can preserve international peace."

"Oh, yes," my friend said, smiling, "that is a fine thing, too, for people whose consciences are such that they won't let them stay home and enjoy America. It just doesn't interest me, that's all."

I have reported this bit of our conversation not in the least with a desire to criticise my friend. Her attitude is the natural one for the business man's wife who is more or less hemmed in by a circle of American and English people who seem quite sufficient unto themselves. As my friend said, she had met none of the Christian Chinese, and her impressions of the Japanese people were largely drawn from the rude and ignorant jinrikisha men of the Yokohama wharfs who are only too apt to think of the mere tourist as fair prey. It is, no doubt, to her credit that her attitude toward the people of the Orient is nothing worse than mere lack of interest. But she has missed so much that she might have had, so much of give and take, of unexpected nicenesses, of ever-broadening vision and sympathy such as have made my own year and a-half in Japan so happy. She leaves the Orient without regret. And she is one of thousands! Why is it such an attitude is so common? What is the matter with us, with our education or our religion or our morals or something, that makes it possible for so many, many Americans to travel to the Orient and return home without ever realizing that the people of the Orient are folks very much like us, well worth knowing and needing our friendship?

It is not all a matter of language, for great numbers of intelligent Chinese and Japanese know English. The fact that I know no Japanese worth speaking of has not prevented me from making many Japanese friends, even among the little school girls whose English is as scanty as my Japanese. Nor is the difference in customs really important. After half a dozen meals with chopsticks in a chairless room, you accept it as a thing for granted in a Japanese house, and think no more about it. And it does not mean that Japanese people are queer, or that they are any different from us in their hearts and minds and souls. When you go deeper you may find some typical differences perhaps—more sentiment than is common in Americans, and a greater tendency to abstract rather than practical thinking. But you are pretty well on the road to friendship with a Japanese before you strike such differences as that. Why is it that so many Americans are interested neither in likenesses nor differences, and will not bother to make foreigners their friends? What can we do about it?

One great thing that we can do is to educate. Let us in America preach and teach all we can that Americans are not the "only pebbles on the beach," but that we need what the people of other lands can give us, even as they need what we can give them. Not only church but the whole world is like one body with many members, and the eye cannot say to the hand, "I have no need of thee." A disjointed humanity is not healthy.

In this day and generation when there are so many channels of intercourse we who profess the brotherhood of man dare not limit our friendships to our own clan and tribe. This we know in our hearts, and this we must teach more clearly, if we really seek to establish peace on earth.

IN PRAISE OF SIMPLE NATURE.

Be it not mine to steal the cultured flower,
From any garden of the rich and great,
Nor seek with care, through many a weary hour,
Some novel form of wonder to create.
Enough for me the leafy woods to rove,
And gather simple cups of morning dew,
Or, in the fields and meadows that I love,
Find beauty in their bells of every hue.
Thus round my cottage floats a fragrant air,
And though the rustic plot be humbly laid,
Yet, like the lilies gladly growing there,
I have not toil'd, but take what God has made;
My Lord Ambition pass'd, and smiled in scorn,
I pluck'd a rose, and, lo! it had no thorn.

THE BIRTH OF TUNESASSA.

What brought about Tunesassa? Why was it that the Society of Friends at Philadelphia should have decided to send a small group of Friends to the redskins of southwestern New York State in the year of grace one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three? It is a long story but these questions will be answered in brief forthwith.

To get a right perspective of the start of Tunesassa, we must recall that the Indian was the big problem of the time. That endless encroachment of the whites on the redman's land and was fatedly unsuccessful to the aborigines so crushed and discouraged the Indian that he faced a hopeless future. Down in luck and down in heart, he thoroughly hated the white man. A recorded conversation reflects this gloomy resentment. A blacksmith was shoeing a horse when a redskin loomed large in the doorway. "Well, cousin! how goes it?" inquired the busy Anglo-Saxon. "Ugh! cousin! How cousin?" grunted the Indian. "Oh, through Adam, our common ancestor," volunteered the facetious white. "Glad it's no nearer. Ugh! Ugh!"

Such an attitude is very understandable when one reflects upon the conduct of the new settlers along the length and breadth of the frontier. I have before me a letter written in 1797 by a certain James Wilkinson who confesses to profession of arms and many years in the habit of warfare with the red people. "My late intercourse," he writes, "with various tribes and nations from (Pittsburgh) to Lake Superior, convinces me that the corruptions of the savages are derived from those who styled themselves Christians—because, the further they are advanced from communication with the white people, the more honest, temperate and industrious I have found them." Our informant proceeds to describe a gloomy picture of the results of missionary influence to date (1797).

The accusation of George White Eyes, an "educated" Indian is recorded in the letter. It reads like the old story—too sad and too true. "You learn us to eat, drink, dress, read and write like yourselves and then you turn us loose to beg, starve or seek our native forests; without alternative and outlawed by your society, we curse you for the feelings you have taught us and resort to excess that we may forget them."

Further, the "enemy" had been thoroughly reduced in both spirit and numbers by the gentling process of the Indian Wars. A treaty was signed at Fort Stanwix between the most incorrigible element, the Iroquois and the government of the United States, in the year 1784. The Six Nations cited in this pact were Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagas, Tuscaroras, Cayugas and Senecas. A boundary line was specified and the Indians agreed to keep in bounds. When one reads the names of the high contracting parties, one can visualize the difficulties that must have immediately arisen. On the one part, the United States, 100 per cent. American. On the other part, Sawedowa (The Blast), Kiondushowa (Swimming Fish), Soachas (Falling Mountain), an important chief by name Wood-bug, Gyantwakia or (Corn Planter), and many other gentlemen. It does not require a very lively imagination to conclude that these worthies were not entirely pleased with their lot. On the other hand, the government at Washington was frightfully perplexed. It had no very definite Indian policy except to defend a frontier. It was continuously embroiled by disorderliness on both sides and prodded by greedy settlers in search of more lands and better fields. It could not afford an exhaustive educational program. Who would pay for such altruism? Colonists, who had not only finished a war of independence, but almost finished the Indian in border fighting? What could be expected of the government, especially a relatively new, democratic government in such a hopeless plight? Little indeed.

This kind of thing had considerable effect upon the Society of Friends in Philadelphia. Not only had they inherited a tradition for treating with the Indians—a tradition grown pretty thin in some quarters—but they were sensitive to the unfortunate and unhappy lot of their red-skinned brethren. A review of the Yearly Meeting Minutes of that period will bear abundant witness to this claim.

Late in the eighteenth century the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting determined to do something to prove to the Indian that Quakers considered all men brothers and further to extend substantial help. Consequently, they proposed to establish a colony and later a school for the enlightenment of an abused race. They chose none too tranquil a spot for their program—the Allegheny reservation. In Fifth Month, 1798, the first settlement of Friends was established near the Indian village of Gan-oh-de-gan-gos-heh, now known as Old Town, on the west bank of the Allegheny River, five miles above the state line, and in 1803 the committee in charge decided to move to their own land adjoining the reservation. The new site took the name of Tunesassa, from the creek running through the property. Interpreted it means "stony bottom."

To execute the delicate mission, three persons were chosen: Joel Swayne, Halliday Jackson and Henry Simmons. It is not necessary to recite the details of their reception. Suffice it to say that the apparition of white men coming amongst Indians to start a colony appeared to the native singular and suspiciously intrusive. One chief, Red Jacket, gently informed my great-grandfather, Joseph Elkinton, that if he continued with the school he would be treated to a bath of tar and feathers. Permit me to record that after years of persistent effort, the same terrible Red Jacket grudgingly conceded that the Great Spirit must have made three kinds of humans, first, the Indian, second, the Quaker, and third, the white man.

H. W. E.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS LATER.

Today the neat grey building of Tunesassa School stands like a symbol of tranquility among the more tranquil hills, with no shadow of its turbulent history.

Once inside the building the illusion of serenity vanishes. A school full of vigorous children is a busy place at the best of times, and when the force of caretakers is insufficient the tension is many times increased. But in spite of the eternal vigilance that must be maintained by the teachers, in spite of heavy work and almost complete isolation from people who are working along educational lines, they (apparently) never falter. "There is so much MORE to do!" they say.

A visitor at the school wonders what instrument is sharp enough and subtle enough to stab the Yearly Meeting "broad awake" to the needs of that little mission back in the hills.

In the first place, the staff consists of a mere handful of educated, refined white people who volunteer to spend a winter teaching children of another race in a small mission school.

We accept their sacrifice and forget them. Except for strictly official correspondence from the committee of which the rank and file of the membership very naturally knows nothing, we abandon them to the healing solitudes of the winter hills. They are a congenial group, of course! During ten months of daily intercourse with a minimum of interests outside their work there will be no friction! In the spring, when the annual report is read in Yearly Meeting we will think of them again and someone more zealous for their welfare than the rest will say, "Is Tunesassa really worth while? After all, why should we keep it up?" Why should we go anywhere where there are children to be taught and dark places to be lighted? To the very tangible need for the education of an ignorant people, there is the additional challenge of a deep-rooted paganism. The Indians have retained only the worst that civilization had to give them. Maybe it never tried to give them its best. However that may be, there is still a call for the help that we have. They need as much more than education as we are able to give—courage, civic pride, a purpose in life. And we can give them these just as Friends gave them confidence and courage when the school began. The question is, are we willing?

A. T.

If our united worship is to be a time of real communion with the Divine presence, we must have individually practised the habit of unloading our daily cares while we wait for the inward voice. No amount of earnest praying and wrestling for a blessing on our meetings, no amount of praiseworthy efforts—philanthropy, Bible readings, or any other spiritual and semi-spiritual activities can really take the place of this daily waiting. Because it is so easy, it becomes very hard to be strict enough with ourselves about it. Because it is such a simple matter to wait with God, we hurry to our daily tasks without doing it.—GEORGE L. HODGKIN, in "The Demands of Quaker Worship."

ONE GREAT MAN.

[The following composition was written in response to a request for a description of a great man or woman. The writer is a Japanese girl of about sixteen, who has had several years of Christian teaching.]

I will write about Jesus Christ. I do not know what He looked like, but I can imagine by the Bible or pictures of Jesus. He was the greatest man in all the world.

Nineteen hundred and twenty-one years ago He was born in a manger at Bethlehem. The birth of our Saviour Jesus Christ was the greatest and most wonderful event that ever happened.

The very first Christmas night—some shepherds who were watching their flocks in the fields, were astonished and frightened by a sudden great light, which shone all around them, and an Angel, who appeared in the midst of the light, told them a Saviour, Jesus Christ, had been born. Then a multitude of other angels came and sang to them of Him; so they left the flocks and set out to find Him.

Some wise men of the East, at the same time, noted a wonderful star in the sky, which it had been foretold would appear, at the birth of a new king of the Jews, and came to Jerusalem to enquire where He was. The wise men found the child with his mother, and, filled with joy, they fell down and worshipped Him, and presented to Him the rich gifts they had brought—gold, and frankincense and myrrh. The people of all the lands celebrate a merry Christmas every year.

He did many strange things in His life. He went about healing the sick as well as teaching the people; this He did to show how much He loved them. The Bible is written about His life, so when I read this Bible, I can see that He is an independent, courageous, humble and kind man.

When Jesus was thirty-three years old He died on the cross for the sins of the people. He did not resist, but allowed Himself to be cruelly nailed to the cross, where He hung until He was dead, praying to His Father in heaven, with almost His last breath, to forgive the wicked men who had murdered Him.

Thus did Jesus Christ our Saviour take away the sins of the world; His mother and other women who were friends of hers, and loved Jesus, tenderly took His body from the cross, and buried it, and He ascended to His Father in heaven, where He still watches over and loves little children, and bids them come to Him, just as He did whilst on earth.

If I know how much Jesus Christ loves me, I must be His servant in faith.

NOTES FROM THE BULLETIN OF THE NATIONAL COUNCIL FOR THE LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS.

IS THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE A SUCCESS?

Concrete achievements are the measure of the success of the Washington Conference. Not what it has failed to do, but what it has done counts. TABULATE THE POINTS IN WHICH WE ARE BETTER OFF IN REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS AND WITH RESPECT TO PEACE IN THE PACIFIC THAN WE WERE WHEN THE CONFERENCE BEGAN AND PASS JUDGMENT ON THE SUCCESS OF THE CONFERENCE FOR YOURSELF!

1. A NEW UNDERSTANDING HAS COME BETWEEN AMERICA AND JAPAN, the two nations that were headed straight for war. Japanese correspondents have reported from Washington America's sincere desire for peace. The Japanese Delegation has experienced America's patience, justice and good-will at the hands of Secretary Hughes. Our press, in turn, is no longer running tales of Japanese atrocities in Korea from two to four years old.

2. THE ENGLISH-SPEAKING NATIONS ARE IN CLOSER SYMPATHY THAN THEY HAVE BEEN SINCE 1775. The opportune settlement of the Irish question only removed a cause of trouble; it was the Washington Conference that brought to light our solidarity.

3. THE EXTENT AND SIGNIFICANCE OF MILITARISM IN FRANCE AND IN JAPAN HAVE BEEN BROUGHT TO THE ATTENTION OF THEIR SISTER-NATIONS. Letting in light on an evil is a long step towards its abolition in the present state of world opinion.

4. CHINA IS SEVERAL STAGES NEARER JUSTICE THAN SHE WAS WHEN THE CONFERENCE OPENED. The agreement to respect her economic and administrative integrity in the future is important. With regard to the past, several infringements upon her autonomy have been put in the way of correction. The open door has been defined and will be guarded by a World Commission. Existing contacts and concessions that infringe upon the Open-door policy will not be able permanently to stand against its moral pressure. The return of Shantung is at this writing likely.

5. THE FOUR-POWER PACT IS PREFERABLE TO THE ANGLO-JAPANESE ALLIANCE FROM EVERY POINT OF VIEW. A few more such agreements to confer if trouble arises, should they interlock enough, would insure the peace of the world.

6. THE LIMITATION OF THE NUMBER OF CAPITAL SHIPS AMONG THE GREAT NAVAL POWERS has made a successful war of aggression on the part of any of them doubtful and difficult.

7. THE NAVAL HOLIDAY LIBERATES GREAT SUMS OF MONEY FOR CONSTRUCTIVE USES. At the same time, it removes fear measurably from the minds of the nations involved. Fear is a cause of war.

8. THE LIMITATION OF SUBMARINES TO "LEGITIMATE" WARFARE AND THE ABOLITION OF POISON GAS AS A WEAPON OF WAR ARE EDUCATIVE STEPS. A nation would also need to be sure that their use would bring victory before defying the conscience of mankind.

9. OPEN DIPLOMACY AND CONSULTATION OF THE PEOPLE ON MEASURES PROPOSED HAVE, INsofar AS THEY HAVE BEEN TRIED, PROVEN THEIR VALUE FOR ALL TIME. Secret diplomacy, like secret treaties, will hardly again be tolerated.

These are some of the most important achievements of the Conference. If the treaties pass the Senate, other Conferences will follow. If they do not pass the Senate, the world will hardly deem it worth while to attend Conferences in which America is a participant. THE ACHIEVEMENTS TABULATED ABOVE CONSTITUTE, DESPITE THEIR REAL VALUE, ONLY A SHORT STEP TOWARDS WORLD ORGANIZATION, REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS TO POLICE STATUS, AND WORLD PEACE. IS IT NOT THE PART OF WISDOM TO ROUND OUT SPEEDILY WHAT HAS BEEN ACCOMPLISHED AND GO ON TO THE NEXT STEP?

GERMANY IS DISARMED.

Many will be surprised that our administration is asking France to make a drastic reduction in her army in the face of the German menace. The fact is that there is at present no "German menace." Germany is disarmed physically and morally.

1. PREMIER BRIAND SAID SO IN THE FRENCH CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES just before he sailed for America. "There is no menace to the peace of Europe from Germany. The German people have fulfilled all the demands of the Peace Treaty of Versailles for disarmament, for the destruction of munitions and airplanes, for the reduction of military forces, and the dissolution of so-called units for home protection."

2. GENERAL NOLLET, whose duty it has been to disarm Germany, made the report on which Premier Briand based his statement: "GERMANY HAS CARRIED OUT THE MILITARY TERMS IMPOSED BY THE PEACE TREATY AND IS DISARMED."

3. THE QUAKERS, who have been directing child-feeding for two years in all parts of the country, support without qualification the statements of Premier Briand and General Nollet. THE KRUPP WORKS AT ESSEN ARE OPEN TO VISITORS AND ARE ENGAGED IN THE MANUFACTURE OF SEWING MACHINES, AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS AND OTHER INSTRUMENTS OF PEACE.

4. The completeness of German disarmament is the result of the terms in the PEACE TREATY WRITTEN FOR THE PURPOSE OF MAKING GERMANY SAFE TO THE WORLD BY AGREEMENT OF THE Allied Military Advisors under the leadership of Marshal Foch.

GERMANY IS MORALLY DISARMED.

THE MASSES OF GERMANY ARE SICK OF WAR, like the workmen of other countries they have found the burdens that the war has laid upon their shoulders heavier than they can bear. Ludendorff is called "the Butcher" among them and they curse him as having occasioned the unnecessary sacrifice of German lives. The Kapp fiasco, when the monarchist army seized Berlin and after a fruitless week marched out again discomfited by the general strike of Berlin's masses, would be repeated with similar result today.

The fact is, contrary to common belief, THE GERMAN PEOPLE HAVE SUFFERED TERRIBLY from the war into which their government plunged them. The number of their dead surpasses that of any other country, except Russia. Starvation added, they believe, 800,000 to the toll of battle. Their children have not had enough to eat since 1915 and are from two to four years undersized. They lack vitality and slight causes carry them off.

The depreciation of their currency has brought work to the Germans, but at a wage of twenty cents a day now for SKILLED LABOR, which makes impossible the purchase of necessities of life that are imported from countries with more valuable money. To buy garments is obviously unthinkable at this wage, since the raw materials come from America or England. WHILE OUR WAREHOUSES AND ELEVATORS ARE STUFFED WITH THINGS THEY NEED, THEY CANNOT BUY THEM AND CURSE THE WAR WHICH BROUGHT THIS MISERY UPON THEM.

"WAR NEVER AGAIN!"

A GREAT PEACE DEMONSTRATION was held in various parts of Germany on the anniversary of the declaration of war, in which 500,000 men and women took part under banners bearing the slogan, "Nie Wieder Krieg" (war never again). Referring to this demonstration, a month later, the "Petit Parisien," the Paris paper with the largest circulation, compared it with a Monarchist demonstration that had taken place in Germany the preceding day and said: "After all, it is well to remember that ten times as many people participated in the peace demonstration July 31st as in the demonstration of yesterday."

FACTS ARE "STUBBORN THINGS." IF GERMANY IS DISARMED, IT IS WELL TO KNOW IT. IT ENABLES FRANCE TO DISARM AND "REAP THE TRUE FRUITS OF VICTORY."

THE PRIVATE MANUFACTURE OF MUNITIONS.

While the private manufacture of munitions cannot justly be called a cause of war, it is unquestionably of all contributory factors to the waging of war the most important. This is particularly true with regard to revolutions and the wars of the smaller nations. We all read in the papers this week of the shipload of American munitions destined for use by Abyssinians against the French, which the French would have liked to keep from reaching their destination, but had no legal right to do so.

Munition manufacturers recognize no nationality in their dealings. Moral considerations have no weight in their business. It has not infrequently happened that THEY HAVE MANUFACTURED GUNS AND SHELLS WHICH WERE USED AGAINST THEIR OWN COUNTRYMEN. They sell, if they can, to both sides in a war. "Business is business."

THE CONCENTRATION OF THE MANUFACTURE OF MUNITIONS UNDER GOVERNMENT CONTROL WOULD BE EASY EXCEPT FOR THE OPPOSITION OF THE INTERESTS CONCERNED, AND IT WOULD BE A MOMENTOUS STEP TOWARDS WORLD PEACE. The League of Nations has already made recommendations on this point, and it is high time that every nation should consider them. If anybody can see an argument against such a measure, we should be glad to know of it. FIRST NATIONALIZATION OF MUNITION MANUFACTURE AND THEN INTERNATIONALIZATION OF CONTROL ARE LOGICAL STEPS TOWARDS THE MAINTENANCE OF PEACE ON LINES OF COMMONSENSE.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

1. THE PREMIER OF JAPAN announced to the Japanese Diet on January 23rd that the reduction of armaments will bring Japan a surplus which is to be used as a SUBSIDY FOR THE PRIMARY SCHOOLS AND FOR THE IMPROVEMENT OF WATERWAYS.

2. THE DISARMAMENT OF SCHOOL TEXTBOOKS has been recommended by a representative group of Japanese peace workers in Tokyo. GENERAL JOHN F. O'RYAN, OF THE TWENTY-SEVENTH DIVISION HAS MADE THE SAME SUGGESTION IN AN INTERVIEW PUBLISHED ON THE 22ND ULT. IN The New York World "Our school histories should be rewritten. Our very conception of patriotism should be revised."

3. CHILE AND PERU want America's good offices to settle without war the differences that have arisen between them.

4. THE LEADERS IN NORTH AND SOUTH IRELAND settled at one Conference the question of boundaries between them.

5. THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF TEACHERS HAS STARTED A NATION-WIDE CAMPAIGN AGAINST MILITARY TRAINING FOR HIGH SCHOOL BOYS.

6. THE MERGING OF THE WAR AND NAVY DEPARTMENTS IN A DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE is provided for in the report that has been submitted to President Harding by the Reorganization Committee. This recommendation will receive the support of every person, not himself adversely affected by it.

NOTES FROM HEADQUARTERS.

We are settling down to the long task ahead. The bulletin will appear fortnightly. The forums end today. The campaign of "Education, Organization, Finance" has begun. We shall give you, in the next bulletin, a report of past achievements with increasingly concrete plans for the future. WE MUST HAVE YOUR HELP.

The Executive Secretary of the National Council has complete freedom in the composition of the Bulletin and he assumes sole responsibility for the positions taken.

EDITORIAL NOTE.

THE CONFERENCE REPORTS.

The present Number contains the concluding article from the pen of William I. Hull on the Washington Conference. It has been a very great favor to see these momentous considerations through such expert eyes. The articles from Professor Hull have been more than reports. They have been interpretations and prophecies. Without being carried away with unwonted enthusiasm, our friend has been able to make an estimate that we feel assured will stand the test of time. The outcome of the Conference is a call to Friends. Newspaper correspondents may define the "President's pacifism" as something far different from the "mollycoddle type." So much the better. The Quaker pacifist has never been a mollycoddle. He has always been in the thick of the fight for the right, but has disdained carnal weapons as being tainted always with cowardice. Does anyone doubt that after the volumes of evidence presented by the late war? The victories recorded at Washington, truly make "war's utter futility" clear, and challenge "the sanity of competitive preparation for each other's destruction." The President will never utter truer words!

THE REVIVAL IN SCOTLAND

[An extraordinary revival is reported from Scotland. It is said that already there have been 20,000 conversions, as many as were included in the whole term of the Welsh revival of 1904. The British Weekly gives a striking description of Jock Troup, the leader. We are quoting it from the Churchman's Field.—Eds.]

"But Jock Troup, the Wick cooper, is the undoubted leader and spiritual father of the others. He is a young man of splendid physique, born to lead. With his shock of black hair, ruddy complexion, grey eyes and winning smile, he takes possession of a gathering. He makes us think of the Apostle Peter in his early Galilean days, even to his ready tongue and impulsive nature.

"Troup has been but five years inside the kingdom, and would be the last to claim to have a fully-thought-out theology, or even a deep knowledge of the Scriptures. But he has read his Bible, and can quote it to purpose. He is the soul of modesty. He is surprised at himself. He cannot explain it. 'You don't see any magnetism in me?' he asks. But after hearing in private the story of his conversion—which he does not parade—we begin to understand. First a happy-go-lucky boyhood, always in scrapes, seldom in a Sunday school, except for a Sunday or two before a soiree or a picnic! Not bad, but wild! Then a careless, devil-may-care youth—never a drinker, but addicted to swearing (like Peter) and card-playing—likeable, sociable, a good singer and player of the violin.

"Then a sudden arrest, in a moment of flippancy—like Bunyan—a long agony out at sea on a drifter—sleepless, miserable 'depart from me'—and at last led into the kingdom by prayer and the gentle hand of a woman in a Y. M. C. A. hut in Ireland. Some years in making good, and then the call comes to him to be a preacher and fisher of men. Yarmouth, Fraserburgh, and now Dundee.

"The secret of Jock Troup's power lies in his rock-fast certainty of his own conversion and call and his complete surrender to God, that He may use him, where and how He will. He has absolutely committed himself to the guidance of God. He does not know where he will be a month hence, or even whether God means him to continue as a preacher. If God says, 'Jock, you must now go back to your old work' he is ready to go. He is a member of no particular church. His parents belong to the United Free Church, but he is God's tool—a most unlikely tool he feels himself to be—and utterly at God's disposal. He has no conceit of himself.

"Troup is no scholar, but he makes up for the want by his homely thrusts and mother wit. 'God winna be kept in a corner.' He does not strive for emotional effects. He says he has seen them, and they mean nothing. But he has seen strong men crying out under stress of conviction of sin, and he knows how to distinguish. 'You can kick back against your emotions, but you cannot kick back against the sword of the Spirit.'

"He is seen at his best in dealing with a young inquirer. He puts his arm round his neck, and talks to him like a brother, almost like a chum. He is very human. He has a quaint humor. He has a touch of mysticism. 'God never works on straight lines—he works thus,' spreading out his hands. He has seen a breeze falling on and spreading out on the waters."

LEAVES FROM A SOUTHERN JOURNAL

II.

First Month 26th.—A touch of winter now, and the mercury at twenty-seven with a sprinkling of snow and sleet is regarded as "terrible" by everyone but the children, whose "young hearts hail the drifted cold," as gladly, as did the youngsters the poet watched from his window in Amesbury. One of the teachers in the Summerville school said that it had been very difficult for lessons to get on yesterday, as one child was always looking out the window and reporting to the others the exciting scene; a novelty to many of them. The flowers and green leaves sheathed in ice are as much of a novelty to us. Some of the colored people think it "too cole to work," and fail to report for duty.

One of the most interesting things to us has been the relation of the two races, which seems to remain much as it was in the sixties. We realize that this is not so in other Southern localities—less provincial than this, and that were we in a large hotel instead of in a private house owned by a "son of the old South," we should not hear some of the stories, which prove that the old relation of dependence and a childish lack of responsibility on the one hand, and a sort of paternal despotism on the other, still exists. "O, you can't make a contract or an agreement with 'em. I lend 'em money every week—never get it back," says our host. Yet he also tells us how "Thaddeus" has the best store in town, and everybody respects him. "He's straight and honest if ever a man was." What an achievement for "Thaddeus" to have built up that reputation here. And there is the colored doctor—"a real little black one" (I do not use his word), who when the "flu" raged, was the attendant of the white people as well as his own, and of whom one of the white doctors, departing to the war, said, "If anybody in town gets real sick, send for Dr. A." instead of his own competitor. One curious expression relating to domestic service, also persists from the old days. A lady showing us her beautiful ancestral home in Charleston, said, after we had seen the garden, with its bird-bath which was an ancient stone mortar, and its great bed of snowdrops started from roots brought from England before the Revolution—"Now I'm going to show you the yard, for I always think the whole house is founded on the yard." Seeing that we looked puzzled, she added, "If you do not have good servants, it is hard to live comfortably," and we realized that "the yard" is the place where the house servants live. So our host describes a colored man out of work, as saying, "Kin I move into yo' yard." The "yard" of the old Charleston home was quaint indeed, with its slab pavements and old brick buildings crowned with low red tiled roofs; and the little lady, pointing to an outside staircase, told how her grandmother when an old woman, used to climb it, to pray with an aged colored servant, too feeble herself to come down when the others were gathered for worship. Here, too, we saw the "sewing-room," with as many as seventeen seamstresses all sewing on garments for the "hands" on the plantation. Many of the early citizens of Charleston, although "planters," lived in town, and the town house and the plantation were mutually helpful, one serving the other. The serious, responsible faces of some of the old colored nurses one sees in the Battery Park, sitting with their little charges under the great live oaks, recall the stories of Southern "Mammies."

The American Red Cross is turning over to us complete control of the distribution of Red Cross garments that are contributed for European relief. DIARY OF A QUAKER WORKER AMONG THE FIFTEEN MILLION OF RUSSIA'S STARVING PEOPLE.

"We were pulled into Buzuluk in the small hours of the morning one week ago, our car hitched to the tail of a freight, and we are still here in our house-boat on rails. Our last move was only a yard or so to get into the lee of a warehouse; and we had frozen so fast to the rails in even those few hours that a locomotive couldn't move us and it had to back off and give us a kick. Even then we coasted, as the wheels didn't move at all." This is the beginning of a letter from Beulah A. Hurley, of New Hope, Pa., now in Russia as a member of the Quaker Relief Unit, which was received to-day at the headquarters in Philadelphia. B. A. Hurley reached the famine area of the Volga, where 15,000,000 Russians are starving, in the middle of Twelfth Month and is taking charge of the distribution of relief in one of the sections of the Buzuluk district.

"This business of cooking, living, receiving callers, running an office, and housekeeping for a Unit of thirteen in a square box-car wherein five also sleep, is close work, and we have learned much."

Later—"Miriam West and I moved out in the night and slept up in rooms in the town which the Mission has taken for its headquarters. For two nights we slept in real beds. How is that for a record of the last three weeks? Take warning all ye who come into Russia and bring along all the bed and bedding you hope to use. Also bring some magic powder to lay a little ring all round your camp on the floor before you retire, or else you may find that you are a 'host in yourself.'"

"The reason we moved from the box-car for those two nights was that the Doctor found that Nancy Babb, who lived on the first bottom shelf of our tiny closet, had more than the flu. It is typhus and as there is no hospital in Buzuluk we planned to hitch this car to a west-bound train and have her in Samara the next day. Therefore our sudden move in the night with the baggage of all ten of us and the foodstuffs for Buzuluk and the household equipment for the five units about to open. Once at the house we had to open the foods and pack a supply of them to send up with Nancy Babb and a nurse to support themselves at the hospital.

"No train came the next morning either way as everything was snowed up; so the day was spent in finding a room for an isolation ward in the rooms meant for a few people and which were housing a mob of us. It was impossible to secure other rooms in the village for the town of 18,000 now houses 35,000 and some parts of it are ruined since the Denikin campaign went across this district. The upstairs room where the six men of the Unit live had to be evacuated and their belongings taken to the dining-room. We hated to do it in their absence; but we rolled up their bedding and effects and planted them at intervals around the dining-room. By nightfall Nancy was installed in the room and some of the men moved back into the car, as the floor of the dining-room was all taken up by the table where we ate in shifts of ten.

"The rest of the week has gone to moving us back and collecting the stuff to go with us to our two Units in the East and also to the making ready for the supplies and personnel to accompany the two units to the West.

"By contrast with home we lead a life that in comparison with Spartan life is rigorous, but it is a luxury to the type of life which we see all about us. Scarcely a day goes by but one may see at least a dead body lying along the way or in the market-place; and three days ago a father and mother and two children dropped in the snow together. At night one can hear the cries and pleading of the crowds at the station entrances trying to seek a bit of warmth; but no one may go into that crowded mass except those really waiting for trains, and so every morning the human bodies which have frozen to death must be carried away from the entrances. Even from among those who have been all night in the station, heated only by human warmth, bodies are taken of those who have died of starvation or cold. The cemetery itself is a ghastly place where bodies are piled up in trenches like so much cord-wood and the naked bones of the bodies make the simile all the truer. The pile is now visible a quarter-mile away. The clothing is always stripped from the bodies, for it is too precious to be lost.

"But worse even than the dead bodies left sometimes for days frozen in the snow, are the walking skeletons who totter about from house to house hoping to find enough to live on for another day. The children show bare skin as they trot on weeping with the cold. There are not crowds of these, but just a few here and there looking almost like stragglers from an army; and we wonder which of them may be stark dead at the roadside before night.

"Doris White is still at the first outpost which she and Murray Kenworthy opened forty miles south of the railroad, and her letter which reached us from Moscow told of the necessity of starting feeding at once to prevent the children from being sent into the town and abandoned. Horses are dying so fast that they cannot carry the food in the wagons fast enough, and so they are trying to use camels, which eat less. But these camels are starving and their humps are usually flabby and empty of the reserve strength which they normally carry there. Doris White begged to have more help but added: 'Send someone with no heart, for it is a cruel task.' She reported that cannibalism has begun in the outlying districts and that an old woman and a child of nine have followed the cats and dogs which have already been consumed.

"It is colder here than Moscow, most of this week being about 30 degrees below zero. But it is dry and bracing. Do not be alarmed for us personally as we are getting along in a good manner. We brought our own supply of flour and bake our own bread rather than take any of the bread of this country, as it means a saving in the supply here and also in the readjustment of our digestions to this local stuff. We know that nourishing food is not self-indulgence, but absolute necessity in the considering of ourselves as machines which can only give the maximum of service by being kept in condition. The task of equipping the interpreters with clothing which is warm enough has been a difficulty, but the possibility of drawing upon the relief clothing has helped a bit.

"It did not take us long to adopt the custom of this country and sleep with doors and windows shut and a fire going. We are learning to smell an open door several rooms away just as a Russian does. A mile between house and warehouse seems most inconvenient at times; but it has the advantage of forcing some exercise in the open. The six short hours of sunlight are of brilliant beauty, the plains stretching away like the sea to the south and then to the north there is a line of lovely hills, foothills of the Urals. The wide generous streets of the city itself are fascinating and it must have been a charming place to live in ordinary times.

"Rest assured that what we are doing is not just making people comfortable, but turning the very slight balance between life and death for these thousands, and the more you send us the more of these desperate folk have the chance to live. There is food enough in the world if it can only be evenly up; but the actual problem of transport is terrible here. All the rolling-stock is so old and it is too scarce to put any of it aside for repairs; and so engines are running along patched with whatever material of iron and wood is available. The last few weeks have seen their fatalities in the railroad work as one roundhouse to the south burned with eight engines in it because one of the oil-burners sprung a leak. About the same time one engine exploded on the road, losing not only the engine, but a number of passengers who could not find a foothold on the entire train and so had swarmed up as usual all over the engine.

"So it goes, and the tragedy deepens with the cold. It is a gallant work you are doing in the home country; for with the unemployment in America and all of those attendant ills we can understand that life is rather full of calls for help. We wish you all God-speed with the task. May the new year bring fuller capacity for sympathy and strength for service."

XIV.

The appraisal of the Washington Conference may well begin with the fact that it was held at all. After America's rejection of the League of Nations, there was grave danger lest our country should hold entirely aloof from the efforts of the nations of the Old World to co-operate in the alleviation of the miseries of the last war and the prevention of the next one. This rightly dreaded isolation might well have been accompanied by an excessive nationalism expressed in the building up of armaments which no other nation or combination of nations could have excelled or equalled, but which should have supplied them with an incentive to do their utmost in that direction.

The holding of the Conference, therefore, has enabled America to express her belief in genuine internationalism and to lead her sister-nations upon a path which they appeared to be incapable of pursuing without her. This path has for its goal the prevention of war by the cessation of armament and the exclusive resort to peaceful methods of settling international disputes without the sanction of military force or economic coercion.

The fundamental lesson has been learned that competitive increase of armament is not "insurance against war," but on the contrary a powerful, perhaps an irresistible, incitement to it. Hence the drastic reduction in naval armament and the acceptance of a fixed ratio of naval strength on the part of the five chief naval powers have a pacifist as well as an economic significance. An immense expenditure of public revenue will be diverted from the production and maintenance of means of destruction to the satisfaction of genuine social needs; or, the burden of oppressive taxation will be lightened, and the people will expend their own money in their own way. But far beyond this economic boon, the scrapping of sixty-eight dreadnoughts, the cessation of competitive building of others and the ten years' naval holiday will remove a powerful incitement to distrust, hostility and war, and will enable men's minds to turn away from the field of Mars to the temple of Justice.

The various other limitations on capital and auxiliary ships and on the size of their guns, on aircraft carriers and on submarine warfare, together with the prohibition of chemical warfare, should aid greatly both to stamp war and preparation for war as wicked, and to impel men to beat more of their swords into plowshares and to learn war no more. At long, long last the great powers of the earth have turned their faces in the right direction,—have entered on the path which leads to disarmament, and have taken a very real and important stride towards that goal. What a cloud of witnesses,—the saints and sages of the past, the sinful, suffering, sorrowing world of today,—are rejoicing over this step and striving onwards toward the next!

Meanwhile, the Conference has also endeavored to remove some of the grave causes of war connected with the Pacific and the Far East, and to provide for a peaceful settlement of such causes as may arise in the future. With China, Russia and Japan, the United States, Great Britain, France and a score of other Western powers, bordering upon and vitally interested in the vast world of the Pacific, it is easy to see why the questions associated with it are of transcendent importance at the present stage of human development. How relatively insignificant now appear such European questions as the Rhine, the Ruhr, Silesia and the like! The prevention of naval offensives; the halting of fortifications and naval bases; the settlement of cable disputes in Yap and elsewhere; the restoration to China of large portions of Chinese lands and peoples, and the solemn promise in the presence of the world as witness to restore other portions; the progress made in the restoration of China's sovereignty over railways, post-offices, customs revenue, cables, mines and courts of justice; the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance; the surrender of "spheres of influence" and special interests in the world's greatest market and workshop, and the re-establishment of the "open door" on a far more solid basis than ever before; all these achievements of the Conference are fraught both with justice to long-suffering China and with amity, equity and good-will among other nations. As with a flash of lightning and a summer shower, the whole international atmosphere overhanging the great ocean and its farther shore has been cleared and purified.

With so much at stake in the world of the Pacific and the Far East, and with human nature such as it is, we cannot expect that no more clouds will rise on the horizon. But to cope with new causes of misunderstanding by peaceful means, the Conference has provided for an international Board of Reference, for an international financial Sensorium, and for another conference in case of urgent need.

All the agreements at Washington were arrived at without a show or threat of force, by unanimous consent among governments with equal vote; hence no ill-will has been engendered, no seeds of future war have been sown. The promise and pledges, mutually exchanged in the presence of all the world (thanks to the unprecedented publicity given to the proceedings), are not to be enforced by military or economic coercion of any kind; but their fulfilment is consigned to the persuasive influences of enlightened self-interest, public opinion, national honor, and the collective conscience of mankind. Surely, with such sanctions as these, which are the agencies of God Himself, the very stars in their courses will withstand any future Sisera who may attempt to ignore or defy them.

The Conference, despite its varied successes, was not without its failures. China was not completely restored; Russia's territorial integrity was pledged, but she was not recognized in the Conference either as a member of it or of the family of nations, or as vastly interested in the welfare of the Pacific and the Far East; land armaments were not reduced or limited; aerial warfare was not prohibited (although an international commission was provided for the curbing of it); submarines were scotched, but not killed; war itself was not outlawed.

The aftermath of the World War, with its clouds of imperialism, militarism and unreasoning fear, and the prevalent distrust of Bolshevism, held the Conference in thrall to that extent. President Harding, in his address at the close of the Conference, said: "It has been the fortune of this Conference to sit in a day far enough removed from war's bitterness yet near enough to war's horrors, to gain the benefit of both the hatred of war and the yearning for peace." This is true; and it doubtless accounts partly for the successes of the Conference. On the other hand, it is partly responsible for the Conference's failures. It would be more just, perhaps, to speak of these as attempts, rather than as failures. For as men return to the sanity disturbed by the War; as they climb to higher levels of morality and religion; as they seek safety and prosperity by better means than mutual slaughter and preparations for "armageddons," these failures of yesterday and attempts of today will be converted into the achievements of tomorrow.

The Washington Conference, with its world-prominence and its unprecedented and unexpected successes, has bequeathed to us a great opportunity and a heavy responsibility. It demands a deep searching of our souls for the strength and wisdom requisite to the task of abolishing all preparations for war and war itself, and of substituting mutual concessions and co-operative service among all nations. As I sit here in this last meeting of the Conference, witnessing the formal signing and sealing of the various treaties, resolutions and declarations adopted by it, my thoughts go out to the multitudes of men and women who can, if they will, make of these documents no mere scraps of paper, but the living realities of human security, justice, prosperity and mutual service.

President Harding is now reading the last words of his address: "It is all so fine, so gratifying, so reassuring, so full of promise, that above the murmurings of a world sorrow, not yet silenced, above the groans which come of excessive burdens not yet lifted, but now to be lightened, above the discouragements of a world yet struggling to find itself after surpassing upheaval, there is the note of rejoicing, which is not alone ours or yours, or of all of us, but comes from the hearts of men of all the world."

Yes, thanks be to God, that is gloriously true. But with the note of rejoicing, we needs must hear the insistent note of duty and of opportunity for further fulfillment of God's will.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

AN UNOFFICIAL CONFERENCE.—A delightful and long-to-be remembered occasion was the little gathering during the violent snow-storm of the 28th and 29th ultimo at the home of William B. Harvey alongside of the Westtown Railroad Station. Three leading Friends of the Five Years' Meeting had met with a small group of Philadelphia Friends to talk over some of their problems and ours, and to get better acquainted. Not often do we hear the so-called "pastoral system" more fully and frankly discussed than on that first afternoon; the causes of its arising and the varied forms and degrees it takes, with questions as to its present tendency and prospects. We learned that it is not really a "system," not being in any sense organized or promoted as such by any body. Philadelphia Friends pointed out the difficulty of entering into closer fraternal relations with the Five Years' Meeting on account of this institution, while sympathizing with the very difficult conditions which led to the calling of pastors to the aid of meetings. We desire to keep in warm relations of love and unity with our Conservative Friends, as well as enter into fraternal relations with the Five Years' Meeting. If unity is a really transcendent requirement of our Divine Master, and love the greatest thing in the world, it is to be hoped that we all may draw closer together as time passes, conservative and progressive alike, and learn to love each other in deed and in truth. The Friends from the West think that we of Philadelphia might help them not a little in their problems if we would visit and travel among them more frequently and freely. They encourage our ministers and qualified elders under right concern to go among their meetings; and the best method of approach in such cases was discussed. We, on the other hand, felt that the preaching of the simple Gospel of salvation, for which their ministers are especially concerned, might well be a help to us oftentimes. Thus intermingling we would learn to sympathize and become bound together in Christian fellowship, a deeper and truer thing, many believe, than being "tied together" outwardly. With regards to outward connection, however, we were surprised to learn that it is not regarded as necessary for Yearly Meetings to adopt the Uniform Discipline in order to join the Five Years' Meeting; each Yearly Meeting may retain its own Discipline if desired.

After attending Westtown Meeting on First-day morning, we discussed in the afternoon the theological divergences found in the Five Years' Meeting, and the degree of danger of disunity from them. They resemble differences of opinion found among us, but more extreme; yet the most radical of the extremists are not very numerous, the majority of members being open to influence and persuasion. The sense of spiritual comradeship was apparent in all of the three sessions.

We parted with a new sense of interest and wider fellowship, and of the generous and warm hospitality of our kind host and hostess. The storm having subsided, and train-service resumed, we scattered to our homes.

ALFRED C. GARRETT.

QUARTERLY MEETINGS.—Philadelphia and Abington Quarters were held in regular course during the week of the sixth. Maurice Gregory, of London and Anna Livezey Hall, were both acceptably at Philadelphia, and the latter also at Abington. In both places the routine business for Yearly Meeting, including the new Social Order queries, had interested consideration. At Abington the question of Membership, as recommended by the Yearly Meeting of 1921, was freely discussed and a minute adopted to go forward to the Yearly Meeting. Margaret M. Jenkins, Esther Martin Smith and Agnes L. Tierney had been recognized as ministers by Germantown Monthly Meeting, and this action was confirmed by the Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders.

CARE IN INSURANCE

The Provident was founded in 1865 by a group of Friends for the purpose of protecting the estates and insuring the lives of members of the Society of Friends.

Later the services of this Company were offered to other people who were known to be of careful habits.
A careful company insures only those people who are good moral as well as health risks. This results in a low death-rate, which is one of the elements of low cost of insurance.

Care is important—in insurance as well as in other

"INTO GOD'S OWN DAY."

WILLIAM CHARLES BRAITHWAITE.

NOTE—Written some years ago, when three of his special friends, Richard H. Thomas, John Wilhelm Rowntree and Ernest Grace were called away within a few months of each other. It now seems wonderfully appropriate to himself.

Out of the city's shadow into day
Ride forth our brightest, bravest, and are gone.
The busy streets with crowded life flow on;
But they have passed the walls, and all is grey.

They pass into the silence and are blest;
Our fretful life a few great years they trod,
And joyfully we give them back to God,
Our heroes, furnished for some higher quest.

They ride upon His errand, we remain;
Yet still their presence nerves our service here,
While to their sight our city shineth clear,
And of our human love their souls are fain.

Out of the city's shadow they are gone,
Out of life's dimness into God's own day;
Within we weep, then front the dawn and pray,
And, strengthened, to the unfinished work press on.

INSTITUTION OR SPIRITUAL FORCE.

Several times in the past few years THE FRIEND has been pleased to print extracts from "Babson's Reports." These have been sent to us by some of our members prominently engaged in business, and have been accepted from them as well-deserved tributes to the value of the effort of the Babson Agency to infuse business with a genuine Christian influence. So far as we are informed there is no other similar effort equal in extent and power of appeal to this which emanates in the form of letters from the headquarters at Wellesley Hills. Roger Babson, it appears, is not only a practical enthusiast in the desire to put more religion into business; he carries the matter a step further and makes it clear that he believes in putting more business, if not into religion, certainly into the operation and expression of it, in what is usually known as the church. The un-business like processes of church management, to such a mind, seem actually irreligious. This is made clear and the necessary limitations of it defined in a new book, "The Future of the Churches," from his pen. We are not proposing at this time to review the book, but to invite attention to the concluding paragraph of an able notice of it in the Boston Transcript:

"It seems to us that the church of the future will not be a great institution but a spiritual force. Perhaps those who fled before the whip of small cords were trusted advisors along the line of church endowment and investments, perhaps they understood how much of spiritual increment could be realized from each coin given by the congregation, perhaps they knew just how large a congregation was to be expected from just such an outlay for splendor and sensation. It seems to us that the need of the church of the future is not so much the big drum as the 'still, small voice.'"

Whoever the author of these words may be, they disclose a carefully analytic mind. With two thousand years of church history behind us there is ample opportunity to compare the "great institution" and the "spiritual force." Succinctly, the comparison is expressed in that oft-cited incident of one who saw the splendor of St. Peter's in Rome, and remarked that no longer could the so-called representative of St. Peter say: "Silver and gold have I none," to receive the prompt reply, "nor can the words, 'In the name of Jesus of Nazareth rise and walk' be used now by any professing to be St. Peter's successor." In all the Christian centuries of history the organized church has assumed an endless variety. Extreme centralization of authority has provoked extreme forms of decentralization, often to result in nothing better than "the anarchy of the ranters." Pure democracy has been claimed to be alone consistent with the Christian ideal, but pure democracy always shows the need of a stabilizer, and in order to find this one must appeal to the spiritual realm. To some minds this appeal seems easy, and there results what is called a Theocracy; to those without mystical tendencies, however, this need for spiritual equilibrium seems to present a hopeless dilemma.

Amid all the varying forms the "spiritual force" actually persists. Where the "great institution" is most perfected it is not wholly obscured; where a mystical Head-ship is professed and practiced, human nature does at times assert itself in subtle ways that may obscure the spiritual force quite as much as over-organization does. Doubtless a careful appraisalment will show a large balance of spiritual force in favor of the simplest organization. Our faith as Friends is securely planted on this conviction. We need, however, to recognize that the best that organization, simple or complex, can do is at times to get out of the way of spiritual force. Call the organization, church or society or communion, we discover that it cannot create the spiritual force.

Now the exception our reviewer takes to the Babson book is that this distinction is not clearly made. The assumption again and again is, that perfected organization, business methods applied to religious processes, if that phrasing expresses the thought better, will increase spiritual force. We know certainly as noted above that this is not necessarily the case. We doubt whether Babson intends to put it so. There are, however, signs not a few in many directions that a false confidence in organization has come out of the war's indictment of the Church's failure. The church failed, say its ardent devotees, because it was a clumsy, out-of-date machine. It deserved to fail because it had not kept up to the times. And so we have in every direction much tinkering with old machinery, much new machinery set in motion and pretty much everything new, but new machinists. The fundamental thing of course is to have men made over—not men apart from the church merely, but often those most concerned in it. It will then be found that whatever spiritual force church machinery has will come—must come from lives dominated by what the writer we have quoted calls the “still, small voice.” That of course does not mean that all the necessary church machinery should not be of the very best. The contention in the mind of our reviewer, however, the contention in the mind of most of us doubtless would be that an undue dependence shall not be put upon machinery, and that it shall not be multiplied unduly.

It has often been said—Dr. Thomas Hodgkin makes it very emphatic—that Quakerism was an important contribution in method of Christian work as well as in the expression of the Christian message. In an age therefore that tends to elaboration of machinery this point needs to be kept clearly in mind. It is not alone important for the Society of Friends; it may be their best contribution to the religious world. In degree all denominations profess the Head-ship of Christ in the Church. The Friend professed it as a practical means of conducting meeting affairs, just as certainly as “a way of life” for the individual. Our Lord’s “Lo, I am with you all the days,” was something more than a sentiment. It made Him part and partner in all our affairs. The more simply, the more practically, this ideal is expressed the more certain will be our contribution to the “church of the future as a great spiritual force.”

THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.

God has not only revealed His mind in nature, in history, in providence, and in His Incarnate Son, but also in sacred literature. And there is a wonderful harmony between the Word of God, which is Christ as the Revealer of the Father, and the Words of God, which is the name by which George Fox and the early Friends loved to distinguish the Scriptures from other writings.

In order to arrive at a right answer to the important question, “How shall I think of the Scriptures?” we need but seek to find out what our Divine Lord, who is the Truth Himself, said of them, and how He used them when He was on earth.

Our Lord constantly witnessed to the Divine origin and holiness of the ancient Scriptures—the Law, the Psalms and the Prophets. And while He declared Himself to be greater than they, as the fountain of Truth must be greater than the streams from that fountain, yet He most emphatically states that “They are they which testify of Me.” We thus have it on highest authority that Christ is the theme of the Old Testament as well as of the New. It is not merely that He is occasionally suggested, but that the ancient Scriptures in their totality, ranging from Genesis to Malachi, have one grand object, to set forth His glory and to prepare for His appearing.

What a difference it makes in our reading of the old Testament to seek for the unfolding of Christ in its pages! We shall then discover a marvellous unity and purpose in that book, made up of such a variety of communications, written at different times and by different instrumentalities. Not Jewish origins, embedded in traditions, folk lore and historical documents, but the progressive revelation of the Christ who was to come into the world, is their great subject. His Face shines from their pages, His features are more and more clearly delineated, so that we can read beforehand of His sufferings and of the glories that should follow.

In every stage of the blessed earthly life of our Lord the Scriptures were honored and used by Him. As a youth, the only thing recorded of the silent years between His birth and His public ministry, was His sitting among the doctors hearing them expound the Scriptures. In them He had found, as He put it, “the things of His Father.” In the lonely desert of temptation, He defeated the tempter’s suggestions by the three-fold “It is written.” Our Lord had no doubt of the Divine truth of the Book of Deuteronomy, from which He quoted the answers which put hell to flight. That Truth, believed in, lived out, and trusted in the hour of danger, became His “shield and buckler.”

The public ministry of Christ was a constant fulfilling of the Scriptures. In them He saw His Messianic programme. He became the Servant of God depicted so strikingly in the second book of the prophet Isaiah. He could say to the people of Nazareth: “This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears.” He proved to be the Man the Old Testament called for. If He had not appeared the religion of Israel would have raised more questions than it was able to settle. And so right on to the death upon the cross. He quoted the twenty-second Psalm which so strikingly utters the experience of the crucified and rejected, but finally triumphant One. And He dismissed His spirit in the language of the thirty-first Psalm when He said: “Father, into Thy hands I commit My spirit.”

We have not space to mention all the instances where our Lord made use of the Scriptures. But even in resurrection He was still putting peculiar honor upon them. He opened the understanding of His disciples that they might understand them, and beginning at Moses He traveled with them through their entire range expounding to them the things concerning Himself. No wonder their hearts burned within them.

So if the end of the Scriptures is to lead us to Christ, Christ again leads us in company with Himself to the Scriptures, and gives us a spiritual understanding of them. And what He thus seals home upon our souls, will become spirit and life in our experience.

A WISP OF SMOKE.

They wrote me they had trauped through Glenmalur
To music of the rain’s soft hullyaby;
They’d seen a wisp of turf-smoke rising high
Till, tempted by a breeze to make detour,
It sank, and vanished on the lonely moor,
And missed the welcome of the waiting sky.
Reading the words, I thought perhaps that I Missed the mark, too, because my aim was poor.
A tinker’s camp-fire’d made the vanished smoke;
Deserted now, it met the travelers’ need.
Rekindled embers! Courage in me woke;
I’d aim again, nor wayward impulse heave;
To link the earth and sky I’d Heaven invoke,
And beg its music for my silent need.

EIGHT YEARS' EXPERIENCE IN THE OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S SUPPER.

Thirty years ago a visitor from Philadelphia amongst Friends in England was impressed with the wealth of vocal ministry in many of the meetings there. An occasion like the General Meeting at Ackworth would bring together probably a dozen men and women whose gifts in these lines were, to say the least, impressive. It was not a case merely of fluent speaking; there was an outstanding spiritual quality, which in this country we describe as baptizing. Perhaps it does no injustice to any of a long list of names that might be given to mention William Scarnel Lean as pre-eminent. He had a natural fluency of speech beyond most, but this had been disciplined to accuracy and nicety of expression rarely observed. These unusual natural powers as used by him were felt to be in subjection to spiritual leading and restraint, so that the Quaker type of ministry was well preserved. Few could listen to him unmoved, but one did really forget the instrument—even though so perfect, in its exaltation of the immanent presence of His Master. At that time he was Principal of the Flounders, Institute, established to train teachers for the Society of Friends. It seemed very much the case of the position and the man having met, and one was reminded at the Institute of the groves of Academus with a Plato leading disciples onward to loyalty, to Truth—to Truth, however, at Flounders, in the expanded sense of the pure witness of the spirit of Jesus.

To have all these prospects ended by the announcement, less than a decade afterward, that our Friend had resigned his membership and joined the Established Church, was a stunning blow on both sides of the Atlantic. One thing was sure—it was the act of an honest man, and if it was a step forward for him, who should cavil? Naturally he was received in the Establishment with open arms, and directly licensed to preach and have part in church services. It was rumored after a few years that he was favorably mentioned for a bishopric. This of course was no surprise to the circle of his admirers.

In 1907 a printed letter was put into the hands of some of his friends. The original had been sent to the proper church authorities, to whom he issued a deed relinquishing "all rights, privileges, advantages and exemptions" belonging by law to the clerical office. Subsequently he was received again, with much thankfulness, into the Society of Friends. Unhappily, a very short time after, his life was rather suddenly terminated by an attack of pneumonia.

The letter referred to above must be of great interest to Friends. It is a practical confirmation of their views of the ordinances. We have been able to secure it through the kind offices of Ethel Crayshaw, of Devonshire House, and of Wilfred Littleboy.

45, CARLYLE ROAD, EDGBASTON,

24th May, 1907.

DEAR MR. PEROWNE:—

I informed Mr. Runnells-Moss some four weeks ago that I wished to close my work at St. John's, Ladywood, on the 10th inst., that being the end of one year since I first assisted him there. I added that the chief reasons (which I did not specify) for this decision were quite unconnected with St. John's, and were such that I have no intention of exchanging my work with Mr. Runnells-Moss for work at any other Church, nor in fact of using elsewhere the Bishop's permission to officiate which I at present hold.

This being so I must of course return to the Bishop the form of permission, of which under other circumstances I might have requested the renewal in September next, if favored with your recommendation in your office of Rural Dean of Edgbaston. And, as I have been invited hitherto to join the clergy of your Rural Deanery at their chapters and conferences, if seems only due to you, especially in remembrance of my pleasant past association with yourself, to suggest that you will now rightly remove my name from any official register upon which it at present appears.

Under ordinary circumstances this letter might have concluded at this point. But since the chief reasons in my mind are deeper than any considerations of age or of health for instance, and also because I am not only laying down my clerical work, but also discontinuing all regular attendance at church service, it seems reasonable now to let you and, as you may see fit, some others through you know a little more of my motives.

When I first joined the Church of England, eight years ago, the subject of the observance of the Lord's Supper was that in which my thoughts centered far more than in any other question; and it is in the same subject that my present change of practice finds its center now. This has come about in three principal ways:

1. My experience as a recipient, both before and since my ordination, has on the whole been disappointing. I have not found the observance of the rite to be especially helpful towards that spiritual eating and drinking referred to in John VI, 33, for which the experience of former years has certainly shown the outward form and sign to be non-essential.

2. While myself regarding the observance of the Lord's Supper as commemorative of our Lord's death, and believing that the wording of the "order of administration" in the Prayer Book does not necessarily imply any other view than this, it is I think true that a very large proportion of "communicants" believe in the reality of a spiritual presence in the elements before participation; and I am confirmed in this supposition by my having read by far the largest part of the evidence before the recent "Royal Commission on Ecclesiastical Discipline," in which the subject of the Holy Communion is so very prominent. Consequently I have for long been under the impression, when engaged in the celebration of the rite, and more particularly when reciting the prayer of "consecration" so called and performing the prescribed "manual acts," that many of those present have the belief that my office and acts are instrumental in bringing about an effect in connection with the bread and wine employed, which I cannot myself believe in. And this seems to me to involve my occupying a false position.

3. Closely connected with this subject is the difference between the meaning of the word "priest" as used in the Prayer Book (with its historical connection with the "presbyters" of N. T. times) and the meaning too commonly associated with the word by great numbers in the Church of England, especially many of the clergy, who use the word with the sacrificial coloring which attaches to it in a different connection as the translation of (hierous). All Christian believers are to be priests who sacrifice; but theirs are spiritual sacrifices; and even when in the worship of the congregation a representative man utters audibly prayers in which the congregation may unite, as in the "prayer of consecration" alluded to above, he is acting as a presbyter-priest, and not as a sacrificing priest, according to my understanding of the prayer book. I believe, with a former Bishop of Durham, Dr. Lightfoot, that the Kingdom of God "has no sacerdotal system;" and it seems best to retire from a position which has given me very few opportunities for disclaiming publicly participation in the sacerdotal assumptions which have increased so rapidly in recent years in connection with clerical offices.

In addition to the preceding considerations it may be sufficient to add that I think it must be a consequence of the deeply ingrained effects of my previous training and associations among the "Friends" that I have found it more difficult of late to enter thoroughly into the Anglican mode of worship and its customary accompaniments than I expected would be the case. Frequent repetition of the set prayers seems to have made them less helpful to me and not more so, as they have become familiar to the mind and memory. Then the frequent appeals which have to be made, in default of other available opportunities, on behalf of congregational expenses and the needs of external Church societies, are very uncongenial to my feelings of what is suitable to occasions of public worship. And at special times, when certain topics have been forced on public attention, such subjects as a growing spirit of militarism, for instance, or the prevalence of intemperance, have seemed to be very imperfectly dealt with in the pulpit, at least from the point of view of the responsibility resting upon individual members of the Church.

I shall be obliged if you will let Archdeacon Burrows see this letter, thus sparing me the labor of copying it for his perusal; for it is due to him, as having helped me so much when I was first turning towards the Church of England, to know what is influencing me in a reversal of important parts of my recent practice.

I may just add that I have purposely abstained from alluding to any possible future association with any other portion of the Church. In fact, I think it not unlikely that if I now "essayed to join myself to the disciples" under another name, not a few, considering my past course, might imitate those who, on a certain historical occasion, "believed not that he was a disciple!"

Yours very truly,

WM. SCARNELL LEAN.

It is probable that I shall let many of my relatives and others know of the contents of this letter.

JAMES BRYCE.

[One of our readers suggests that some selection from the notable tributes to Lord Bryce by members of the Disarmament Conference in Washington will be appropriate in THE FRIEND. The following is condensed from The Ledger report.—Eds.]

The Chairman, Secretary Hughes, said it was fitting they should pause in their deliberations to express the grief they all felt at the news of the death of Viscount Bryce. His passing away was not only a serious loss to statesmanship, but it deprives the world of one of its great leaders and benefactors, because of his vision of democratic possibilities, his liberal spirit and the constant example in his character and attainments of the finest culture of his period. Especially was his loss keenly felt by the American people. He had long been the mentor of their youth. No one understood their institutions better; no one had more faithfully interpreted them to the American people; no one had more keenly appreciated the difficulties in their workings; no one had pointed out with greater accuracy the needs for improvement.

There was not, in any college in the United States, a class of young men desirous to understand the institutions of their country, he said, who had not been at the feet of Lord Bryce, learning of the spirit of democracy as exemplified in the United States, of the special character of the work of the fathers in making liberty under law possible and of the dangers which constantly beset us because of the extreme uncertainty that always attends the development of popular government.

Elihu Root said that he contributed his word of appreciation and regard at the death of Lord Bryce from the standpoint of personal friendship and affection and of public gratitude and regard. He died in the fullness of years, in the midst of activity of body and mind, after a career of the greatest usefulness amidst the respect, admiration and affection of the people among whom he lived.

A little more than sixty years has passed since, as a youth just out of the university, he had published his work on the Holy Roman Empire, and but last year he had published a great work, the fruits of immense labor and research, upon modern democracy. And until his death he had been actually engaged, at eighty-four years of age, in the beginning of a new work, upon the life and times of Justinian.

He thought that Lord Bryce brought to bear most unusual qualities upon the most serious and difficult problems of the time—the problems with which this committee themselves were dealing. He had great learning, wide and varied experience, the intellectual penetration, for which his people, the people of Scotland, had always been distinguished, infinite capacity for taking trouble, and a genuine sympathetic interest with all people everywhere in the world who were trying to secure better conditions through government.

Ambassador Jusserand said: "It was my privilege to know Lord Bryce many years; it was indeed an education to know him. His knowledge was universal. I remember that upon the occasion of the publication of the eleventh edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica I asked him whether he had subscribed. His reply was, 'What's the use?' I answered: 'True for you, since you are sure to know practically all there is in it.'

"He had a wonderful personal charm, gifted with a broad optimism, a great faith in the future and faith in the people of this earth. That faith came from his knowledge of the world, past and present, his acquaintance with the various nations. Himself a man of heart, he was able to discover, even sometimes under the most unattractive outside, the gold nugget which is always to be found in the heart of a true man, even among the less advanced nations. This explains how he could live so long, ever at work, never disheartened, always keeping his face toward the future.

"At the beginning of the war, when I was trying, in rather difficult circumstances, to join my post, I met him in London and saw his eyes full of tears. He had the saddest misgiving, not as to the eventual issue of the war, but about the evils which the war would bring to the people of the wide world, for whom his great heart felt such sympathy. He was almost in despair, though he still thought that possibly some means would be found to avoid the catastrophe because a man of heart, as he was, would hope even against hope. Men of his type are rare, and the catastrophe did happen.

"He was in full sympathy with what we are trying to do in this Conference. The future will say what this will have been; the tree will be judged by its fruit. Lord Bryce followed with the keenest interest our efforts in favor of an idea ever dear to him throughout his long life—namely, to increase in the world the effective feeling of good-will among nations, foster the spirit of liberty and cordiality between honest men and people animated by honest purposes. We all hope to realize such ideals, and that our endeavors shall not have been made in vain."

A. Balfour said: "Lord Bryce was a scholar, a traveler, an historian, a politician, a diplomat, and in all those great spheres of activity he was himself a master. It was well to note that each of those spheres of activity affected the other. If Lord Bryce was one of the greatest political writers of his day, it was because he knew politics not merely as a scholar, nor merely as a traveler, nor merely as an historian, nor merely as a politician, nor merely as a diplomat, but because he studied the political activities of mankind from all those points of view. Each reinforced the other, each added its quota to the admirable result which had been so well described.

"I know that the soul of every man was made for God. Each human personality is incomplete without union with others and with God. Nothing else brings the sense of completeness or satisfies. The rush for pleasure and prestige, social delights and distractions—all are found to be blind alleys. By allowing His life to come to complete your own, Christ offers you union with the great living spirit of God."—THEODORE SEDGWICK.

"THERE is no magic word of surrender that will annihilate self-seeking. One true act of surrender is sufficient to dethrone self, but the uncrowned king becomes the murderous conspirator; and nothing short of life's discipline, a daily dying to self, will dethrone the enemy."—From "Creative Prayer," by Herman.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE APPOINTED BY HAD- DONFIELD AND SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING TO VISIT THE MEETING IN ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

TO THE QUARTERLY MEETING:—

Reports have been received from forty of the fifty-two sub-committees appointed to attend the Meeting for Worship at Atlantic City. From statistics given, it appears that the maximum attendance was one hundred and fifty (150) and the minimum thirty-eight. Seven meetings are reported as being attended by over one hundred persons, and two by less than fifty. The average is slightly over seventy-seven.

All of the Friends from other Quarterly Meetings who consented to join with the Atlantic City Committee have been present at the Meetings at least once during the year. Several Friends have attended oftener. Their company and services have been a source of real strength and encouragement to the resident members and visitors.

One report expresses a very earnest desire that the wonderful opportunity for extension work at the Atlantic City Meeting should be definitely brought to the attention of the Yearly Meeting, in the hope that some of our gifted young people, as well as our ministers, might feel drawn to attend the meeting, which would warmly welcome their coming.

Most of the reports speak of the quality of the meetings as being satisfactory. While there is no resident minister, meetings without vocal service occur rather infrequently, for not only from our own members, but from persons of other denominations, are messages given. The silent periods are usually reverential and fruitful to those who have learned to listen for the "Still, small voice." In a meeting where, as one Committee Friend expressed it, "sometimes three-quarters of the attenders are not Friends, and one-half of the remainder are visitors," it is not surprising that some fail to grasp the nature of the service that they are assembled to perform. Few, however, fail to feel the influence of the reverent silence, and frequently strangers to this practice express themselves as having been benefited and lifted up by the outward stillness, as well as by the spoken word. Resident Friends and others are watchful in welcoming such visitors, and in giving to those interested, from the supply kept in the meeting-house, literature explaining the views of Friends. The judicious distribution of Friends' literature to strangers is thought by the Committee to be a very important duty.

One interesting character had been in early life an Episcopalian, but feeling his spiritual needs unsatisfied, thought to find rest in the ascetic life of a Trappist Monk of the Roman Catholic Church. Years passed in the seclusion of the monastery, but there still remained the hunger of his soul for a true and primitive religion, and he again severed his connection with his church. His first attendance of a Friends' Meeting was at Atlantic City. Interviews with the Friends there followed, reading matter which it was thought would be helpful was brought to his attention, and he has expressed himself deeply interested in Christianity as expressed by Quakerism.

Several reports commend the efforts of the Friend who so courteously directs visitors to their seats in the Meeting House.

In a meeting of the Committee a concern was expressed, and fully united with, that Atlantic City Friends should assume their full share of responsibility relative to the Meeting, not waiting for the feeling of full qualification, but proceeding with the faith that strength and fitness for the work will be supplied.

Resident Friends continue to meet in their several homes from time to time, to listen to and discuss subjects appropriate to the affairs of the Church.

The Meeting has been saddened by the removal by death of Charles Evans, who of late years had acceptably occupied one of the seats on the facing bench, and who had shown a helpful interest in the affairs of the Meeting. We are reconciled in the belief that our loss is his gain.

The Meeting-room has been subjected to a thorough renovating. New carpet, paper, paint and shades harmonize in soft grey tones and form restful surroundings.

We close with the words used by one Committee Friend in his report, which express the feeling of many of those who are in touch with the Atlantic City Meeting. He says, "To me, the Atlantic City Meeting remains to be perhaps the very best opportunity we have as a religious body, in meeting capacity, to present to the world our views as to worship and ministry."

Signed on behalf of the Committee,

ISAAC POWELL LEEDS,
Clerk.

TWELFTH MONTH 6, 1921.

FORTY-FIRST ANNUAL REPORT OF FRIENDS' INSTITUTE.

The Board of Managers present to you at this time the forty-first Annual Report of the Friends' Institute.

The work of the Friends' Service Committee still continues, a vital part of the activities centering at the Institute. This is especially important as it helps to connect the broad world service in which all bodies of Friends are united with the more self-centered interests of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

We regret that we have not more space to offer the Service Committee as their needs have grown in connection with the big work they are now undertaking in the Russian crisis.

The problem of providing for the many committees under our rooms is still one that taxes the ingenuity of those in charge to the utmost. We regret the inconvenience that has been experienced in some cases, and also wish to express our appreciation of the numerous instances of kindly co-operation under annoying conditions.

Ten thousand one hundred and six visitors have used the rooms and 314 committees have held their meetings at the Institute during the year.

The reading room has been open in the evenings during the winter months.

The installation of electric lights last spring is the big improvement in our physical equipment that we can report. The increased healthfulness and comfort have been greatly appreciated.

The Preamble of the Constitution of Friends' Institute states that the object of the organization is "to form a closer organization among the young people for mutual benefit in literary, philanthropic and religious work."

We feel that this is being more fully accomplished because the General Secretary of the Institute is also Executive Secretary of the Young Friends' Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

The Young Friends' Executive and Sub-committees meet here for supper and evening meetings.

They have taken charge of the following meetings:—
The Annual Meeting of Young Friends held just before Yearly Meeting.

Six meetings held at the Institute on Quaker Outposts.
A Vocational Guidance Meeting held at Westtown.

Arrangements have been completed for a Young Friends' Tea Meeting to be held here, following which an address will be made by Frederick J. Libby on the Washington Conference.

The arrangements for the delegates attending the Earham Conference last summer were made at the Institute Office and the Editorial work of the Young Friends' Supplement to THE FRIEND also centers here.

On account of the need of increased funds to cover the expenses of the Institute your Board, after careful consideration, have raised the annual dues to two dollars.

Our membership is now under one thousand. We would ask these members to respond to our financial aid, and also to urge others to become members. If Friends believe that the Institute is furthering the vital interests of the Society we feel sure they will lend it their loyal support, even though they may feel that they cannot use the rooms personally.

On behalf of the Board of Managers of Friends' Institute.

"THE commonest way men use faith in Christ is not as a power that shall make their efforts for Him successful, but as a consolation for the failure of those efforts."—T. W. Pym, in "Psychology and the Christian Life."

JAPAN NOTES.

A VISIT TO OMI MISSION.

Fourteen hours' ride on a slow train brought me to Omi-Hachiman station, where I was glad to see Kiyono Yoshida, with one of the twins in her arms, awaiting my coming. A dilapidated jitney soon took us to the town a mile or so away, and to the attractive home of the Yoshidas, one of the four very modern, foreign style stucco residences belonging to Omi Mission. The isolation of the town of Hachiman is due to the conservatism evidenced several decades ago, when its citizens paid a large sum of money to keep the main line of the railroad from entering their town and spoiling it. This conservatism is probably the reason why the Omi Mission is today firmly established in its midst, a monument to the patience and courage of two young men, its founders and present leaders.

When about fifteen years ago William Merrill Vories came to teach English in the Omi Commercial School, he hoped to do more than teach English, for he was burning with the desire to show forth the love of God in word and deed. He little realized that he was being put in one of the most conservative, unevangelized regions in Japan.

Months passed, acquaintance with some of the students led to a few coming to live in the same house as the teacher. The students found something new in this foreign man's example and teachings and it gripped them. A few determined to try this Way of Life.

The educational authorities became alarmed. What dangerous heresies were being spread abroad! Christianity? Terrible! It must be stopped. This youth must be warned to cease, threatened. But the threats did no good and dismissal followed.

Alone in a foreign land, in an unfriendly community, with no financial resources—not an easy position for any young man. Should he leave and seek employment elsewhere? All his nature said "No, I must not abandon these boys. I must stay until this community knows what Christ and his Gospel stand for."

The heart of one young student, Etsuzo Yoshida, had become so knit to his teacher's heart that he cast in his lot with him and shared with him his school and food allowance. Some employment in schools in the surrounding towns was secured. Illness necessitated a return to America, but never for one moment was the vision of a Christian group growing in Hachiman given up. On returning, with the aid of some friends in America, a home for Christian young men was built in Hachiman, and the foundation laid for a largely self-supporting mission. An architectural company was formed that has grown to be one of the well-known firms of Japan. Various articles are imported and exported. Side by side these two young men have worked, the one supplementing the other, and making possible a Mission unique in Japan. Well has their English monthly magazine been named the Mustard Seed, for the growth of the Mission has been from a very small beginning.

During the week spent in the Yoshida home, I learned how wide-spread the activities of the Mission are. I visited the Young Men's Building and saw the church adjoining with the pastor's house just across the street. I visited the offices and saw the drawings of great buildings being made and the many storehouses full of the articles bought and sold. I saw scattered over the town residences for the sixty workers of the Mission. I saw a children's playground in the poorest part of town with equipment, and an adjoining building for indoor play or meetings. I saw a lot designed for a girls' dormitory and another for a dispensary, to be built as soon as funds will allow. On the foothills a mile or more beyond the town, I visited the up-to-date sanitarium for tubercular troubles; saw the detached cottages, the doctor's house and all the buildings necessary for a modern institution of that kind.

I went out one day on the trim motor boat, the Galilee Maru, that carries the Gospel messenger far and wide among the villages bordering Lake Biwa. This lake stretches in and out around the mountains, with a circumference of more than 140 miles. The captain, the sailor, and the evangelist are all Gospel messengers, and the office workers take their turn in going out on the boat to do direct Christian work—a most interesting method of training.

I heard about the new community building just erected in a big railway centre an hour or so distant, where Christian Social Service will give vision and hope to hundreds.

The radiating friendliness of the Mission homes was most marked. Streams of visitors flowed in and out, and all were welcomed. Tea at all hours and endless cakes, or two or three extra places at the table—these are everyday matters.

It was a great satisfaction to see and hear about the large place Kiyono Yoshida is filling, and to realize that her study and training for eight years in Friends' Girls' School, and later her work with Elizabeth Binford in Mito, gave her ideals and experience preparatory to her present life. Besides being wife and hostess in a most hospitable home where both Japanese and foreign style of food and clothing are kept up, she is a devoted mother to three little children. Her classes for women and girls at home or in surrounding villages range from cooking and sewing and knitting to English and Bible, and average one a day.

We went together to Kyoto, an hour distant by rail, to see the maples and visit another graduate of Friends' Girls' School, now happily married. Another day we went beyond Osaka and spent a delightful afternoon with eight F. G. S. girls, seven of whom were married. Ten of their twenty children were present. All these young mothers are a credit to the school that trained them, and when we know that there are scores just like them scattered over the Orient, it makes the school seem very worth while.

First Month 24th, Kiyono Yoshida sails for America, sent by her mission for eight months' study of the American home—its food and clothes, its child-training and all pertaining to children. Difficult as it is to leave her home and children, she gladly makes the sacrifice, in order to prepare for greater service in the community to which she and her husband, and other leaders of Omi Mission have dedicated their lives.

CORRESPONDENCE.

HESSIAN UNIVERSITY LIBRARY, Giessen,

First Month 14, 1922.

TO THE BUSINESS MANAGEMENT OF THE FRIEND, PHILADELPHIA:—

We acknowledge your kindness in sending us your paper (Vol. 94, 1920, Nos. 1-39 and 41-46) which we placed in our periodical reading-room and which found there many interested and grateful readers. We Germans have so much to thank the Quakers for, that everything which comes to us from you is read with the greatest interest. We informed the Information Bureau of the German Libraries that your paper was regularly received by us, so it was mentioned in the Bulletin of December 1, 1920, in the general list of foreign periodicals which are available in German libraries. We are the only public library in Germany where your paper can be borrowed. We should be very sorry, if we were now obliged to send word to Berlin that we no longer carry THE FRIEND (American). You must realize of course that the present value of the mark makes it impossible for us to subscribe for the paper ourselves. Perhaps, however, you are in a position to send us a copy free in future, together with No. 40, Vol. 94 and No. 47, et seq., to date. You would thereby be serving not only us, but the whole student-public of Germany.

Most respectfully yours,

PROF. DR. HEPDING.

WEDDED IN PRISON.

(All the Leading Incidents of the Story are True.)

[Our friend, Maud Robinson, has forwarded the following to us for publication. It was prepared for one of the recent meetings of "the very old established Birmingham Friends' Essay Society," and read there on the evening of First Month 28th. It has the great merit of being a young Friends' story that other Friends will delight to read.—Eds.]

"Ah! there are some real hills before us at last!"

"As thou hast been walking for the last half mile to relieve thy horse, I should have thought a hill was no such rarity," said an older man with a smile.

"I don't call these hills,—just ups and downs in the flat Weald and shut in with trees on either side so that no breath of free wind reaches us."

"Thou wilt be close to the Downs when we reach our destination. I was told Hurstpierpoint lies at the foot of them and right glad I shall be to get there," said the old man wearily.

His younger companion looked at him anxiously.

"Thou art soon wearied, Friend George. We ought not to have undertaken the long ride from East Grinstead in one day."

"Perhaps thou art right, but my concern for the Friends at Hurst is so strong, that I feel the needed strength will be given me to minister to them, but I am getting old, Ambrose,—getting old. If only I had sought the Lord in early life, as my great namesake did, I might have, perhaps, rested at three-score and ten. As it is I must work while it is day, and then leave the blessed cause of truth to such as thee," said the old man, who although always spoken of as "George Fox the Younger," was in reality born in Norfolk many years before George Fox, of Leicestershire, under whose preaching he had joined Friends and become a much loved minister. "Thy many books and pamphlets will go on with the work even if thou art not strong enough to preach," said Ambrose Riggs cheerily.

"I don't know, lad; as I near the end of life it seems to me that all this printed controversy is but vanity and vexation of spirit. May the Lord forgive me if I have used my strength in this way instead of preaching His Gospel to hungry souls."

"Do not we go to Brightelmstone after Hurst? That is by the sea—perhaps a few days rest in the pure bracing air will help thy over-weariness."

"As I look within, I can see nothing beyond Hurst, and the meetings there on First-day, when I believe a great outpouring of blessing is awaiting us." The old man fell into silence with uplifted eyes, as though he saw a vision.

Ambrose Riggs kept respectfully quiet, as they plodded on, and was glad indeed when he saw a village before them, and making enquiries was told it was the long-desired Hurst-pierpoint.

They enquired for the house of Captain Luscombe, and were most hospitably received, and a good meal promptly set before them.

Their host was a sea captain, whom an accident on board ship had sent back to his native village, crippled, but still able to hobble about the small farm, where his capable wife had brought up a large family of children, while he came and went on voyages which sometimes lasted for years. An honest and God-fearing man, Captain Tom Luscombe had always been, but soon after his retirement from the sea he and his wife had attended a meeting held by some of the pioneers of "Friends of Truth," and there heard burning words which led both to throw in their lot with the despised Quakers. This greatly distressed their old friend, Leonard Letchford, the Rector of Hurst, who bitterly resented what he regarded as schism in his parish.

The Luscombes put no pressure on their children's religious observances, and although a married daughter and a seafaring son had gladly embraced the new teaching, the two girls who were still at home continued to worship in the old parish church.

Good Elizabeth Luscombe saw the weakness and weariness of their elder guest, and made him lie down to rest on the great oaken four-post bed in the guest chamber.

It was a brilliant spring afternoon, and Ambrose stood in the doorway looking at the hill which rose over the trees before the house.

"That is Wolstonbury Beacon," said Cordelia Luscombe, a bright girl of fifteen.

"It is a joy to my eyes to see a hill, for I am mountain-born. Do you ever go to the top of that one?"

"Oh, yes, you can see the sea from it and Mary and I love it," said Cordelia. "We were planning to walk over it to Pyecomb, just when you rode in. Sister wants to see the captain of the shearers about what day he can bring his gang to shear the sheep."

"May I come with you?" said Ambrose eagerly, "I long to breathe the air of a hilltop again."

"Oh, yes, if Father does not want you; I'll ask him," and the girl ran into the house. She soon returned with her sister Mary, a blooming, sedate-looking maiden of twenty, and a large, shaggy grey sheep dog, hardly beyond the puppy stage, barking and leaping in frantic delight at the prospect of a long walk. The three young people took a field path which led them through the park and by the imposing Elizabethan house of Danny.

THE LYNCHING RECORD FOR 1921.

This comes to us in the form of a letter from Tuskegee under date of Twelfth Month 31, 1921.

I send you the following relative to lynchings for the past year. According to the records compiled at Tuskegee Institute by the Department of Records and Research, Monroe N. Work, in charge, there were 72 instances in which officers of the law prevented lynchings. Of these 8 were in Northern States and 64 were in Southern States. In 1920 there were 56 such instances, 46 in Southern and 10 in Northern States. In 66 of the cases, the prisoners were removed, or the guards were augmented, or other precautions taken. In 6 instances armed force was used to repel the would-be lynchers. Concerning the cases of lynching, there were 19 instances in which prisoners were taken from the jail and 16 instances in which, before reaching a jail, they were taken from officers of the law.

There were 63 persons lynched in 1921. Of these, 62 were in the South and 1 in the North. This is two more than the number, 61, for the year 1920. Of those lynched, 59 were Negroes and 4 were whites. Two of those put to death were Negro women. Nineteen, or less than one-third of those put to death, were charged with rape or attempted rape. Four of the victims were burned to death. Three were put to death and then their bodies were burned. The charges against those burned to death were: murder, 2; rape and murder, 2.

The offenses charged against the whites were: murder, 3; rape, 1. One of the women put to death was charged with assisting a man to escape who had killed an officer of the law. The other was charged with inciting racial troubles. The offenses charged against the Negro men were: murder, 11; attempted murder, 3; rape, 15; attempted rape, 3; killing men in altercation, 4; no special charge, 3; wounding men, 4; furnishing ammunition to man resisting arrest, 2; leaders in race clash, 2; charge not reported, 3; assisting man to escape who had killed officer of law, 1; making improper remarks to woman, 1; threatening to kill another, 1; entering young woman's room, 1; insulting woman, 1; writing note to woman, 1; attacking a man and woman, 1.

The States in which lynchings occurred and the number in each State are as follows: Alabama, 2; Arkansas, 6; Florida, 5; Georgia, 11; Kentucky, 1; Louisiana, 5; Mississippi, 14; Missouri, 1; North Carolina, 4; South Carolina, 5; Tennessee, 1; Texas, 7; Virginia, 1.

Yours very truly,

R. R. MOTON, Principal.

BOOK REVIEWS.

"THE ORIENT IN BIBLE TIMES" and "THE PEOPLE OF PALESTINE."

These two very attractive volumes are from the pen of Professor Elihu Grant of Haverford College. They represent three years' experience and study on the spot and make the Bible lands alive and real. Careful readers of the Scriptures will be thankful for the scholarship as well as for the direct human interest so well expressed in these volumes by our Friend. The books are from the Lippincott press and are on sale at Friends' Book Store.

"MENNONITES IN THE WORLD WAR OR NON-RESISTANCE UNDER TEST."

The author of this volume of 238 pages, J. S. Hartzler, has been "assisted by a Committee appointed by Mennonite General Conference." That sounds very much like Fourth and Arch Streets a decade ago, and this carefully written book has not a little of the quiet reserve and plain straight-forwardness that marked our official publications—marks them still in good degree, we trust.

The sixteen chapters with an index enables the Friend to make comparisons and to learn some lessons. From the chapter with the title "Lessons Taught by the War," a single sentence will disclose something of the kinship in feeling between Mennonites and Friends: "When thought in general was along lines of hatred, murder and destruction; when the newspapers were full of everything that was bad about the enemy; and when deeds were represented as good or bad according to who did them, rather than on the merits or demerits of the act, it was indeed needful that the Christ-life should shine out very clearly."

The Mennonite Publishing House at Scottsdale, Pa., issues the book.

"PENOLOGY IN THE UNITED STATES."

This well-printed volume of over 300 pages is from the Winston Press. The author, Louis B. Robinson, is an experienced probation officer as well as a college professor (at Swarthmore). The volume is authoritative but by no means exhaustive. Penology is a Friends' subject and our Friends' libraries at least should be supplied with this worthy contribution to the cause.

On our last visit to Charleston we sought out the "Quaker lot," having heard for years of the "Charleston property" and "trust." A book entitled "Colonial and Revolutionary Incidents," by C. Irvine Walker, says: "Sir John Archdale, himself a Quaker, gave the Quakers a site from the Archdale tract, on King Street near Queen and a meeting house was erected in 1682. No meetings were held after 1698 until a revival in 1718, after which the sect died out!" Another book, "Charleston, the Place and People," tells of the great fire in 1862, when the meeting-house and several other places of worship were burned, and the author adds that, as there are now no Quakers in Charleston, it was never rebuilt, though "the lot is kept sacred." By this she must mean that the few graves which are marked are neatly kept. The lot measures about seventy feet and has a fine old iron fence across on King Street. A brown frame house stands back from the street and in the walk, leading up to it, are set two stones, evidently marking a grave. One is inscribed "B. Wistar," the other "B. W." The lot is neatly laid out as flower and vegetable garden, and has two other graves with flat marble slabs. One bears the names Daniel and Sarah Latham, and their children, Daniel, Richard, John, Ann, Abigail, Caroline and Grace Forbes, but no date that we could see. The third stone was so worn that we could not make out the name, and were not sure of the date, which we thought was 1817. The whole property looks well kept. The early settlers of Charleston were a varied group: English, German, French Huguenot, Irish and Scotch. One of the early French emigrants, Daniel Huger, has left on record this prayer, "Oh, Lord, in Christ our blessed Redeemer, I here acknowledge with all humility that Thy Chastisement has been mixed with wonderful mercies. Thou hast preserved us from persecutors of Thy blessed Gospel and hast brought us into this remote part of the world, where Thou hast guarded us and blessed us here in a remarkable manner, and we now enjoy the benefits of Thy dear Gospel in peace and quietness through our dear Lord Jesus Christ." There is still a Huguenot Church, said to be the only one now in existence south of Quebec.

First Month 20th.—This afternoon we walked out to the "Tea Farm," which some years ago was quite famous. It was so successful as to have a Government appropriation, and its owner and manager employed many Negroes, the little children picking tea leaves into bags hung about their necks. The laborers were comfortably housed and had a school of their own. The owner died and the factory was burned with all its fine machinery. The property is now owned by a Northern man who does not live there or care for the tea plantations. The mansion, workers' cabins, school,—all closed and silent, but nothing can spoil the beauty of the great azalea and rose bushes or the giant pines with their moss draperies. The tea plants are untended, but still look thrifty and green.

The first rice plantations were near Charleston, and indigo was also cultivated in Colonial days. Rice is still grown on the river plantations and for the true chronicle of a brave Southern woman to keep up the family business and the old family home, "A Woman Rice Planter," by Patience Pennington, could hardly be surpassed. The illustrations from sketches by Alice R. Huger Smith are very graphic.

The first cotton sent to England just after the Revolutionary War, when Tarleton the British general and Marion, the "Swamp Fox," had between them laid waste the countryside, was also shipped from Charleston; and it is said that the eight bags were seized by a Customs officer, who said, "America could not have produced so much." In a few years Charleston was rich again. Now, however, the boll-weevil's devastation is making the cotton planters wonder what else their land will produce, and though a recent writer in The Atlantic Monthly points out that this may be a blessing to this section, as success in farming should not rest upon any one crop, we do not find that it is so regarded here.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

READJUSTMENT.

"War and the Teaching of Jesus,"—Rufus M. Jones. (Printed in the Christian Century and reprinted in the Advocate of Peace.) All thinking people have been busy lately taking stock of their mental furnishings, ridding themselves of abnormal war psychology and getting back to a new normal. It is to these minds in process of readjustment that Rufus Jones addresses himself. A few quotations will give readers of THE FRIEND an idea of what the article contains.

"The constructive task laid upon our generation calls for something more than diplomacy and statesmanship. It calls for a rediscovery of spiritual energies that will rebuild the world. I believe that there are new energies of life to be found in the primitive Christian gospel, taken seriously and practically as a way of life and a way of action. The gospel of Jesus Christ is not for Utopia—but for this mixed world of ours."

"... it was his purpose (Jesus) to create a society of persons, liberated from their old nature by a fresh discovery of God, shrinking from sin and abhorring it, because they had found the Divine meaning of life, throbbing with joy because a new world and new dimensions of being had opened out on their vision, living no longer by rivalry and competition, but living by love and its contagious power."

"There is only one way to produce that kind of a society. The only way to reveal the nature of God as love is to carry it as a constructive force into the tissues of the social world is to translate it into the vital stuff of actual life, to make it visible and vocal.

"Pooled Self-Esteem"—A. Clutton Brock. (An article in the Atlantic Monthly.) This is another attempt to discover what was the matter with our minds that we should consent, as a group of civilized nations, to a world war. Briefly, the author's idea is that men have learned to conquer individual egotism—self-esteem: but have not yet learned to conquer the egotism of the group. We are ashamed to boast about our own bravery and brains, we shrink from boasting about the excellencies of members of our families. But we feel quite justified in boasting about our country. In this case the egotism is so lost in the mass, "pooled," that we feel no sense of shame. He cites the Germans as people who cultivated national vanity until it became madness. His concluding sentence is a fine ending to a most thoughtful and thought-provoking article.

"Salvation itself is not [only] a private making of our peace with God; it is a common making of our peace with each other; and that we shall never do until, by self-knowledge, we remove the causes of war from our own minds."

HAS THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE BEEN A SUCCESS?

Read the Bulletin of the National Council for Reduction of Armaments prepared by Frederick Libby, Vol. 1, No. 12. Copies may be obtained at No. 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

LYOYD GEORGE ON PEACE THROUGH CONFERENCES.

"There is only one way to affect, greatly improve and ultimately reach the goal and that is by insisting on bringing the nations to the test of reason and not of force.

"How are you to do that? Insistent meeting, discussing, reasoning, and, let us say the word, conference. If there had been a conference in 1914, in July, there would have been no catastrophe in August; it would have been impossible.

"It is true you cannot point to a single conference that has settled the entanglements, but each conference is a rung in the ladder that enables you to reach ultimate peace on earth.

"There are those who go back to an old note and say, 'Let us get rid of conferences. Let us interchange dispatches and letters.' . . . You cannot have it out with a letter, you cannot argue with a dispatch, you cannot reason with a diplomatic message. Come face to face and I have profound conviction and faith in the ultimate reason of man." (First Month 21, 1922.)

NEW PROGRAM OF THE FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The Federal Council has just issued a leaflet containing a program adopted by its Executive Committee on Twelfth Month 16, 1921. Enclosed is a letter to the Pastors of the Churches of Christ in America, asking each church to co-operate by appointing a committee to work for a warless world. Immediate action on two concrete issues is asked. The last five of the articles in the program are as follows:—"We believe that international policies should secure equal justice for all races.

"We believe all nations should associate themselves permanently for world peace and good-will.

"We believe in international law, and in the universal use of international courts of justice and boards of arbitration.

"We believe in a sweeping reduction of armaments by all nations.

"We believe in a warless world, and dedicate ourselves to its achievement."

EX-SERVICE MEN ON DISARMAMENT.

"And you learn, also, that in peace, as well as in war, half-way measures are useless, and that THE WAY TO DISARM is TO DISARM every nation, absolutely and completely, as far as a war making force is concerned."

"Nothing is ever settled till it is settled right."—LINCOLN.

THERE IS NEED FOR FRIENDS TO TALK RUSSIAN RELIEF.

There have been so many attacks made by private and governmental agencies upon many of the agencies of the country which are engaged in Russian relief, stating that many of these agencies are purely political, that there is a great possibility that all relief may be hurt.

It is very easy to confuse the different relief agencies, and there is no doubt that our Service Committee will suffer from the fear which many people will have in giving their money to any relief agency, now that some are under suspicion. That fear can only be allayed by those who know.

Herbert Hoover has emphatically commended the efforts of the American Friends' Service Committee, in the following words, taken from the New York Times of the 10th: "They might prefer to direct their support to such organizations as the American Friends' Service Committee and others who are represented in Russia by Americans and whose distribution is directly in the hands of Americans."

And Hoover also stated in the New York Times of the 11th: "The American Friends' Service Committee distributes through its own American staff in Russia and co-ordinates its work with the American Relief Administration. I am informed by the Friends that their resources total $1,000,000."

The Service Committee now needs the co-operation of Friends everywhere in spreading this report. The American Friends have been assigned a definite area in the Province of Samara and have taken the responsibility of feeding the 200,000 people in this area. The only resources for this feeding must come from the generous contributions of those who will give. It costs ten dollars to save one of these lives until harvest. If you cannot save a life, surely you can tell the story of the Friends' work to someone who may be able to give.

AN ADVENTURE OF A DAY.

It was a bitterly cold day in Poland, for it had been snowing for over a week and there had been a wind which had banked the drifts many feet high. Across the endless plain was nothing but snow and black trees, and the black forest rose in the distance. There was no house to be seen and the whole plateau was silent, with the exception of two dark figures plodding down the road. They moved so slowly it was a long time before one could make out that they were children. Their slow walk was with a determination by steady, steady plodding, as with a deep purpose in view. The older child was about fifteen, a girl. The younger, a boy of about twelve. He carried a leather suitcase across his back, tied on with a cord which seemed to cut across his chest. It was indeed astonishing, but both seemed cheerful, although there was very little in the scene to encourage light-heartedness. The nearest village was fifteen kilometers away. The nearest big town was Brest-Litovsk, and that was fifty kilometers.

It was beginning to snow again, and evening was drawing on; yet these two solitary wayfarers trudged on and on through the snow and the cold and the coming dark.

It was the Head of the Friends' Polish Mission who saw them and stopped to speak with them. Yes, they had returned from Russia, from the Volga provinces. Their mother had died in Russia, and they were all alone.

"Where are you going now? Brest-Litovsk?"

"No, we are going to America."

"I mean where are you going to to-night?"

The girl smiled. "We are on our way to America."

And so they were. All through the years of suffering they had clung to their father's address in America where he had lived for the last ten years. After their return from Russia the girl had written to that address and had received an answer. The father had sent money through the American consul in Warsaw for their passage.

Immediately they had packed their scanty supply of clothes and had gone to the nearest railway station. But for three days there had been no trains; and so they decided to walk to Warsaw. To them it was very simple. In time they would reach America.

It is a far cry from a desolate, snowy road in East Poland to America; but these two children were unafraid. Was it because a Providence told them that even if they went through the wilderness alone there would be some kindly folk in the world who, though not knowing them, had stretched out, long before, hands across the sea to save such as they?

WESTTOWN SCHOOL NOTES.

Westtown has recently been made a center for the College Board Examinations which are held the latter part of Sixth Month. This will be much easier for those of the pupils who take these examinations, than going back and forth to the city as has been necessary in past years. Probably a few applicants in West Chester will also find it convenient to come to Westtown rather than to go to Philadelphia.

It was very pleasant to have William Littleboy of England make a visit at the school the last of First Month. He was present at two of the meetings for worship, spoke in joint collection First-day evening, held a Bible Class with the First Class and Seniors, spoke to the boys and girls separately in morning collections, and met with the Faculty one evening. He was with us nearly a week, and his visit was much appreciated.

Arrangements have been made for Dr. David Snedden to visit the school and make a careful inspection of the school plant with a view of giving suggestions as to our needs in the way of larger accommodations and equipment for the departments of Agriculture and Home Economics. Dr. Snedden is Professor of Education at Teachers' College, Columbia.

The Botany Class under Albert L. Bailly has been carrying on rather extensive operations in producing maple syrup. A great many of the sugar maple trees on the Campus and in the nearby woods have been tapped, spiles having been made from elder shoots. The warm days have resulted in a good flow of sap, well over a hundred gallons having been gathered. A large iron kettle was kept boiling fairly steadily in the thickets near the boys' orchard, and a very good quality of genuine maple syrup has resulted.

One hundred and sixty-three former Westtown students are this year in attendance at various colleges and universities. Forty different institutions are on the list, including not only the usual colleges in the East, but Leland Stanford and the University of California on the Pacific coast and Oxford University in England.

The scholarship averages for the first semester show twenty-two boys and twenty-nine girls on the honor list,—with grades averaging about eighty. The following receive highest honors, having averages of ninety or above.—William K. Alsop, Jr., 92.8; Edward S. Wood, Jr., 91.1; Robert H. Richie, 90; Edna E. Wetherald, 90.

THE spirit of this world must be brought down before the Spirit of the Lord can be exalted in us, but as a right Spirit comes to reign, we have as many motives to acts of righteousness, as ever we had to acts of unrighteousness, and as we give ourselves in obedience thereto, grace grows in us, and we grow in grace; it is a change in government that changeth our natures and makes us become new creatures.—"The Grounds of a Holy Life," HUGH TURFORD, 1702.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING was held at Media on the 13th and 14th.

The Meeting of Ministers and Elders on the afternoon of the 13th endorsed a minute forwarded by Chester Monthly Meeting, recognizing that a gift in the ministry had been conferred upon J. Passmore Elkinton.

The answers to the five Queries addressed to this Meeting called forth considerable expression and it was decided that the answer to the fifth should be passed on to the Meeting at large the next day.

The Meeting Second-day afternoon was favored by the presence of three Ministers, members of other Meetings, these with other Friends were also acceptably present at the Meeting next day.

Items of business to be forwarded to the Yearly Meeting claimed a great part of the business session Third-day. A minute from Westtown Monthly Meeting asking that the Yearly Meeting consider a suggested new form for the Fifth Query called forth favorable as also unfavorable comment on the change. The judgment was reached that the suggestion go forward as proposed.

The Quarterly Meeting Extension Committee asked liberty to appoint meetings for Divine worship in certain neighborhoods within the limits of the Quarterly Meeting.

They were encouraged to embrace any such right openings, it being understood that the Elders in each case should be consulted before final arrangements were made.

The Quarterly Meeting was very well attended and both the session for worship and that for the transaction of business were occasions full of life and hopefulness.

The Young Quaker is the latest addition to the circle of Friendly periodicals. It is to be "the official organ of the English Young Friends' Movement." Gerald Littleboy, at Great Ayton, Yorks, is apparently the responsible editor. We extend our very best wishes to this new venture.

WILLIAM C. AND ELIZABETH C. B. ALLEN by letter informed Chester Monthly Meeting, New Jersey, on Second Month 7th, of their concern to visit once more the scattered meetings and families of Friends in New Zealand, Australia and South Africa. They feel that their journey may possibly include Java and Ceylon as well. When this letter was read in the Monthly Meeting at Moorestown it evoked a feeling of profound sympathy for these Friends, in contemplating a repetition of the long and difficult journey they have already (for the most part) made twice before. It was felt that the meeting should let nothing stand in the way of so weighty a concern to labor among those who had been so appreciative of the visits of these Friends in the past, and a minute of approval will go forward to the next Quarterly Meeting.

CORDER CATCHPOOL's excellent little second pamphlet—"Quakerism"—has already been translated into French and Esperanto. Peter Manniche, Principal of the International People's College, at Elsinore, near Copenhagen, who is an old Woodbrooker, has agreed to translate it into Danish also.

CARE IN INSURANCE

The Provident was founded in 1865 by a group of Friends for the purpose of protecting the estates
and insuring the lives of members of the Society of Friends.

Later the services of this Company were offered to other people who were known to be of careful habit.
A careful company insures only those people who are good moral as well as health risks. This results in a low death-rate, which is one of the elements of low cost of insurance.

Care is important—in insurance as well as in other things.

OFFICIAL AND VOLUNTARY SERVICE.

It was a Congressman speaking. His service in public life had extended through a somewhat prolonged period. He knew men and affairs rather widely. "You Friends, he said (memory does not permit a report of his exact words), have gained nothing in Washington by adopting the modern machinery of propaganda. When we used to see some broadbrimmed, plain-coated Friends about the Capitol, we were apt to ask one another, "What are the Quakers wanting now?" and when our turn came for a private interview, we gave close heed because we well knew that no measure of self-interest had brought them there. They were speaking for causes and not for men. Now, the same pleading or the same protest may come to us in a much more modern and businesslike presentation, but the personal method of man to man—especially when the man was one who carried an unmistakable presence with him, counted for most.

In the more limited sphere of personal contact and influence in our meeting affairs, something of very much the same kind has frequent illustration. Here, for instance, is a recently acquired member in one of our well-organized meetings. She has been drawn to Quakerism because it has been presented to her as primarily a fellowship. The visits of the committee appointed to consider her admission had seemed to breathe a spirit of warm fellowship, and when she was notified that she had been recorded a Friend, something of a thrill passed through her as she reflected upon the comfort this reality of Christian fellowship would be to her. Weeks passed in which her regular attendance at meeting did yield some fruit of personal fellowship from one and another, both before and after the meeting hour. Nothing, however, came to her door, and she began to think that in pastoral interest she had lost rather than gained by joining the Society. Under her former connection she did have the benefit of an occasional call from a pastor. Finally, a member of the meeting is announced at the house. The thrill with which she had regarded natural Christian fellowship and friendship was momentarily revived and she gave her caller a warm welcome. They got on happily as they exchanged the news of the meeting and dealt with subjects of common interest. Then as the call was concluding the caller said casually, "It is our custom, thee sees, to divide up our membership amongst the Overseers and to make at least one call a year." There was no suggestion at all that any reciprocal relationship had been established, actually, no word like "I shall be pleased to see thee at my house;" the call was purely official. One might write pages on the thoughts of the visited after such a visit. This effort at writing, however, is not to deal with the sorely neglected field of personal fellowship in Christianity. We use the instance and that of the Congressman's observations to illustrate some outstanding contrasts between official and voluntary service. Can we not say then without fear of contradiction that some measure of officialism is necessary even in an organization as simple as that of original Quakerism? A member of a committee, an Elder, an Overseer, does have of necessity something of the official attitude in expressing the concern and the will of the meeting to an individual or for a great cause. Perhaps the varying degrees of success of different persons in performing these necessary duties are due to the ability to be more or less official in performing them. The ideal appointee has found how to merge the meeting's feeling in the undoubted warmth of a personal attitude. In one case the official is clothed from without with a little brief authority; in the other the authority seems to have added nothing more than a degree of personal warmth to an action clearly inspired from within. The "positive personality" of the voluntary worker gives the service a value that no mere official act can have.

This effort to describe the difference between official and voluntary service may make it appear quite subtle and evasive. That the difference is real is indicated by the observation of the Congressman and by the experience of an obscure member in a large meeting. It is possible to give a much more striking illustration of the difference, in a situation that Friends may have occasion to recall in our approaching Yearly Meeting. Five years ago we in Philadelphia had the regular invitation to participate in the Five Years' Meeting at Richmond, Ind., by appointing "fraternal delegates." Not a little emphasis was put upon the point that such delegates were not to be official. If so, the Yearly Meeting queried, why make them the meeting's appointees? The result of the consideration in the meeting was that the reception of the invitation was recorded on the minutes and all members of the Yearly Meeting with a concern to accept it were encouraged to do so. It transpired that fifty-five Philadelphia Friends went to Richmond at their own motion and at their own charges. This voluntary expression of fraternity was actually an outstanding feature of that quinquennial occasion. Compared to a dozen or more appointed delegates, who might have been there at the meeting's charges, this spontaneous expression of fellowship and interest seemed beyond all comparison to be desired. Some Richmond Friends were very much impressed with this manner of functioning. It seemed to exhibit Philadelphia to them in a new light.

We know how differently the same thing appears from different points of view. The experience of the Society of Friends in its two hundred and fifty years has tended to exalt the virtue of voluntary service. That such a small group should have had such vitality may have been due to a variety of causes, but we are inclined to the view that our denominational life must be nourished from the inside. In other words, that means that we shall depend most for our activities upon inspired orders and not upon appointments. If we are spirit-filled we shall be spirit-led. And this does not mean that we shall be independent of the group functioning—we shall actually function for the group, "each member fitly joined together" doing a real part.

"BREAD AND HYACINTHS."

The exquisite little poem in a recent issue of THE FRIEND called "Bread and Hyacinths" made me think of the possible "hyacinths" that lie on our library tables. Often they are destroyed or stacked away until shelves groan and the waste man or the Salvation Army (which I believe sells them as old paper) relieves the congestion.

It is difficult in a large family to send off regularly the weekly or monthly magazine because at any stated time some one of the family will not have quite finished it. But with patience and system it can be done, and if the magazine goes to the right place it is welcomed long even after the date of issue. But sometimes it may be our privilege to send a subscription directly to these craving "hyacinths," and the extent of the pleasure given is beyond expectation.

The following is a letter from two English sisters who are members of the Church of England, but attend Friends' meeting. They are lovers of beauty, art, literature and travel, but can gratify their fine tastes only in a very limited way. They received a Christmas present of a subscription to the Atlantic Monthly. Much detail is omitted from the extract given below, but it shows how many souls a single spray of hyacinths may find.

"We have now had six numbers of the Atlantic Monthly, and I felt I must write to you and try to express something of the pleasure the papers have given us. On First-day morning I took the May number to meeting to hand on to the friend who reads it first after us, and some words of St. Augustine from one of the short stories about 'the will to go' being the only vehicle necessary to take us to the Father, fitted into the trend of the meeting talk in a most wonderful and helpful way.

"After we have read it from cover to cover it goes to a late C. O. and his wife who enjoy it as much as we do. From them it goes to an artist who spent two years in Pentonville Prison. He is a genius in art and a wonderfully individual thinker; occasionally he speaks in meeting very beautifully. When he returns the number it goes to a dear friend of ours, wife of a Methodist minister. Her life has been spent forwarding women's movements, in helping all causes that lack assistance. From her it goes to an "attender" at meeting, aged seventy-five, a Yorkshire woman of great independence of character, whose physical frame is very frail and greatly hampers her energy of spirit.

"Finally, six numbers at once are to travel down to two very old friends in Sussex, great readers, who will very much appreciate the opportunity of getting a different light on many subjects. That is one of the many charms the magazine has for us; we see things from such different angles, and the process is so illuminating."

We who are surfeited with "hyacinths" to the waxing fat of the soul may perhaps part with some to those who hunger for the things of the spirit.

THE LATE JAMES BRYCE AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

SOME WAR-TIME MEMORIES.

The chief memory the public retains regarding the late Lord Bryce during the war period is his intimate connection with the "Belgian Atrocities" Report, and in the notices concerning this great man little seems to have been said about his connection with the League of Nations movement in the early part of the war. This is partly due, no doubt, to the fact that the so-called Bryce proposals were never widely published nor were they pushed by any active organization.

The "Bryce Group," consisting of ten or a dozen men (including three members of the Society of Friends—Richard Cross, J. G. Alexander and Carl Heath—though the last-named was not then a member) used to meet at the offices of the National Peace Council during 1915. Lord Bryce, from his wide knowledge of European and American affairs, laid down the general principles which, he believed, the chief governments might be prevailed upon to accept at the end of the war. The important "new" idea was to divide disputes between states into those that were justiciable and those that were not, the former to be dealt with by the process of arbitration—a strictly judicial proceeding by which the true facts are elucidated and an award given on the basis of those facts—and conciliation, which involves suggestions for avoiding or healing some threatened or actual breach between two states. Lord Bryce's outline was drafted into treaty form, mainly, I believe, by Richard Cross, and the first draft was then circulated privately for criticism to several distinguished lawyers and men of affairs in England and America. It was hoped by some that the proposals would soon be published, and might help to concentrate thought in the belligerent countries on the prospect of peace. But Lord Bryce attached great weight to the view of ex-President Roosevelt, who expressed himself strongly against any such "distractions," almost suggesting that such discussions were a hindrance to the Allied cause. Not all Americans, however, took the same view; and it was directly as an outcome of the Bryce proposals, and of the feeling on the part of some Americans that they did not contain a sufficiently stringent prohibition of war, that the League to Enforce Peace was established under the presidency of ex-President Taft. The League to Enforce Peace may justly claim to share with the English League of Nations Society the credit of paving the way for President Wilson's great League of Nations campaign.

In the group discussions at the National Peace Council's office, Lord Bryce showed the same mental vigor which marked all his activities. At one of the meetings, when the difficulties in the way of all kinds of action towards peace were under discussion, he observed caustically that it was becoming almost impossible to express any Christian sentiment unless one confined oneself to quotations from the Gospels.

One of Lord Bryce's characteristics was his amazing capacity for correspondence. It may be doubted whether any one who troubled to write to him about any matter in which he was interested—and in what was he not interested?—met with the rebuff of silence. The present writer asked him for advice or co-operation when a conference of peace workers was called at Devonshire House in the summer of 1915. He could not attend, but instead of writing a polite five lines, he wrote a long, friendly letter, enclosed a pamphlet he had just received from America which he thought might interest us, and on my returning it with one or two comments, responded again, expressing general agreement with my criticisms and discoursing on American views of Europe generally.

HORACE G. ALEXANDER.

Y. W. C. A. AND WOMEN IN INDUSTRY.

At the last meeting of the Women's Problems Group of the Social Order Committee, Florence Simms, national secretary of the Y. W. C. A., presented some very arresting thoughts in connection with the subject of her address, "The Y. W. C. A. and Women in Industry." She most vividly portrayed the change in thought and attitude that the Y. W. C. A. has undergone since it first honestly faced the problem of reaching the young women who are workers.

In the early years of the Y. W. C. A., the chief thing for everybody, she said, was a knowledge of Christ. That was our watchword. But we soon came to see that the Christ that appealed to us who happened to belong to the sheltered, the comfortable, or the leisured class, meant nothing to the young woman who had to fight her own way through the world and earn her own living against tragic odds. Our idea of Christ was that of the theologian with his complex doctrines and formulae; of the cultured clergyman with his lofty thoughts and poetic phrases; of the student of religious history who could distinguish the wisdom of Jesus from that of Buddha or Mohammed. And our circle of experience and acquaintance was bounded by the safe and respectable boundaries of the polite society of a church membership. When we talked to the struggling working girl about our Christ and our conception of the Christian life, our words simply fell dead; they awakened no response in the girl's heart; she did not know what we were talking about.

Thus we found we did not in the least know the needs of the working girls. We did not know the wages they got and upon which they had to live; nor the hours they had to work; nor the conditions under which they either worked or lived; nor the temptations, unfelt by us, which come to people whose bodies are exhausted by long hours of work, poor food, disagreeable living conditions, and whose minds have no keenness left for anything but dissipating pleasures. The kind of Christ that we were telling them about could not meet their need. We must ourselves know their needs and help them to find the Christ for themselves.

We started then to study our girls and their every-day life; and here the whole current of our own thought had to change. We saw that these girls knew more of life than we did; and that Christianity must have a real relationship with actual life. This meant that Christianity must be "socialized;" must honestly deal with the problems of the whole social order; must bring the Christ spirit of love and brotherhood into the social problems of wages, of hours of work and of living conditions; must consider the environment of the workers and the whole system that makes them what they are. We began to adapt the Y. W. C. A. to them; not them to us.

The spirit of strife that now prevails in industry—and strife is the word—is due to maladjustment. This maladjustment is not inherent in the system; a Christian spirit can bring harmony. Only we must know and understand if we want to help. Some earnest efforts in this line have already been made, e. g., by the group of English Quaker employers, and by the Archbishop's Committee of Inquiry upon Christianity and Industrial Problems. Workmen's Councils have also been established in a number of works. Of these, sometimes, the workers themselves are skeptical, and refuse to take part, until they are shown the real spirit in which they are intended. Then, too, we ourselves are often ignorant. "What is collective bargaining?" a wealthy lady asked me one day. "I don't know what it is; and my husband says it's all wrong."

We must also get together, we who live so far apart in different parts of the town, the working girls and we. We must talk, debate, play, even eat together. A joint group is already formed of girls in industry and of girl college students. The two elements are learning to understand each other through these meetings. Funny revelations, or pathetic, are made, sometimes.

A college girl was talking enthusiastically about her father's factory and how proud of it she was. "But I lost these there," said one of the girls in the circle, holding up a hand from which three fingers were missing. The machinery in the factory was not guarded.

"College is the place to go! Everyone ought to go to college," cried a young student, enthusiastically. "Yes," was the rejoinder, "but if we all went to college, who would make your clothes?"

"You learn lots of things at college; all sorts of interesting things; and then you get an A. B. and can go out into the world and—" "All right," said the factory girl, "when you go out into the world just come down and work with us; and we will teach you the rest of the alphabet."

The knowledge of life and of humanity, as these incidents help to indicate, has, up till now, been left to the labor groups. Our so-called Christian society does not know either. It is time we were finding out.

The foreign woman in industry is another great problem. We have the whole world here in our manufactories, at our very doors, if we only realized it. We do not yet know them nor they us. We must give them the best we have, and approach them in the same spirit of love and understanding.

Difference of opinion over industrial questions does exist to-day. The real problem before us, however, is: Can we as Christians develop the right spirit of brotherhood in both groups—workers and people of leisure—by really getting each other's viewpoint and understanding each other? A new day not only is coming, but has come. It remains for Christian people to take hold of the new spirit and to develop it.

HANNAH CADBURY PYLE,
Secretary.

"SIMPLICITY IN OUR MODERN LIFE."

[This is taken from Our Meeting, published by Wilmington, Del., Friends.—Eds.]

Our first lecture was on the thirtieth of Eleventh Month, when Dr. William Wistar Comfort, President of Haverford College, addressed us on "Simplicity in Our Modern Life." He began by disclaiming any right or wish to criticize our personal standards of simplicity, but pointed out to us plainly how the style of living, in Friends' families, had changed within our recollection. The old-time Philadelphia Friend's parlor with no ornaments but the gas-fixtures and "the pile of pearly shells," on the mantel, was tellingly contrasted with our living-rooms of to-day; full as many of them are of needless things: of things that are a care to us.

The restless desire for diversion which Dr. Comfort described as "doing something different," the press of engagements—philanthropic schemes, committees, etc., which keep us away from our homes, perhaps to a larger extent than we realize ourselves, and the effect of this unsettlement upon the family life, were also spoken of as characteristic of our time.

The immense amount of advertisement, cleverly done, "to lure us into buying what we do not really need," is also a factor with which we must reckon in trying to simplify our lives.

The remedy for all these conditions of hurried and unsatisfactory living Dr. Comfort left us to work out for ourselves, but his clear and forceful challenge to consider where all these changes were leading us, in our national life, in the life of our Religious Society, and our individual lives as Christians,—we shall remember.

"CHRISTIANITY is not emotion. It is not morality. It is the completion of our individual personality with the personality of Christ. Thus the Christian may think with him, dream with him, discover with him, through past and future. As the Father has life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself. And what the Son has, he hath given to us that we might add his life to ours. Christianity is the greater, the completer life."—THEODORE SEDGWICK.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

WHEN a deed is done for freedom, through the broad earth's aching breast Runs a thrill of joy prophetic trembling on from east to west.
For mankind are one in spirit, and an instinct bears along,
Round the earth's electric circle, the swift flash of right or wrong.

—LOWELL.

PROHIBITION is not primarily an effort to repression; on the contrary, it is a movement toward freedom. People who see only the inhibitive feature lack social vision. The limited curtailment of individual liberty is a trifling consideration in comparison with the possible benefit to society. Only selfish minds, or minds untaught in "the law of that great whole that works beneath our alien will," or stupid minds unteachable, will allow their attention to centre long upon the questionable injustice to certain classes of individuals. An increasing number of people have learned to distinguish between "whines and facts." No one should deny the fact that the Volstead Act is not uniformly well enforced, but nevertheless, as President Harding has said: "in every community men and women have had an opportunity to know what Prohibition means. They know that debts are paid more promptly; wages are taken home that once were wasted in liquor saloons; families are better clothed and fed, and more money finds its way into the savings bank." Commissioner Haines has expressed it well in saying that the country is being "weaned" from the beverage use of alcohol.

THE TASK BEFORE US NOW is to prevent the opposition from nominating and electing to Congress this year, from districts that are weak on this issue, men who may seek to modify the present Enforcement Code so as to permit of the sale of light wines and beer. This is what the Pennsylvania State Brewers' Association and The Association Opposed to Prohibition are endeavoring to do. Such liquors, they say, are not intoxicating, and their sale should be licensed so as to yield the government a revenue of $500,000,000 a year. This income might be used to pay the Soldiers' Bonus; and the sale of such liquors, so they claim, would help to reduce violations of the Eighteenth Amendment and make for "true temperance." To meet this cunning appeal we must be able to show the fallacy of it and to give intelligent testimony to the benefits of Prohibition.

LICENSE IS NOT A FORM OF SUPPRESSION.—Experience has shown that licensing the sale of beverages is a sure way to increase their use. The granting of such a privilege confers upon the recipient a limited monopoly that is dangerous to the morals of the community and corrupting to the political life of the State and Nation. It would not prevent violations of the Eighteenth Amendment, but on the contrary would offer to the unscrupulous (of whom the liquor dealers of the past have furnished a notorious percentage) an exceptional opportunity for conducting an illicit business in distilled spirits. The difficulties of law enforcement would be increased rather than lessened. Many people think this is the fundamental reason why the brewers want such a modification of the present law.

CHARGES AGAINST PROHIBITION are for the most part ridiculous or untrue. Deaths from the use of wood-alcohol in "hooch" sold by "bootleggers" are charged to Prohibition as if the lovers of strong drink were very sensitive about such responsibility. We are reminded by the Catholic Citizen, published in Milwaukee, that "Whiskey killed many men before the scarcity of it led to the use of more poisonous 'moonshine.' There is nothing new in the situation except that 'moonshine' is the quicker method of self-destruction." But to contend that in prohibiting the slow poison method we become responsible for the swifter and more certain destruction is a kind of stupid sophistry that some people are trying to pass off as reasoning. If this were true, it were better to have no laws at all, for it may be said with equal untruthfulness that "where there is no law there is no transgression." However, the law exists whether written or unwritten.

OTHER CHARGES LAID TO PROHIBITION are (1) increase of crimes; (2) increase of drinking; (3) increased disrespect for law; (4) unfair discrimination. These all may be answered in one sentence, as given by that keen-witted attorney, Wayne B. Wheeler:—"Prohibition has not created criminals and despisers of law, it has merely revealed them." We are not obliged, however, to rest our case with a smart answer. Let us examine police records.

PHILADELPHIA UNDER PROHIBITION.—From information gathered by Dr. C. E. Macartney, and embodied in a sermon delivered at the Arch Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, we learn that in 1917 the number of arrests under the classification "intoxication" numbered 33,527. In the year 1921 it was 21,850, a reduction of 33 per cent. Under the separate classification of "drunkenness and disorderly conduct," there were in 1917 a total of 9456 arrests as against 5232 in 1921, a reduction of 44 per cent. Arrests of persons known as "habitual drunkards" decreased during the same period from 562 to 34. The number of drunkards committed to the House of Correction was 1043 in 1917. In 1921 it was only 98. The number of cases of "alcoholism" admitted to the Philadelphia General Hospital (Poor House) was 2326 in 1917, but in 1921 it was only 702. The total arrests for all causes was 96,041 in 1917, but in 1921 the number was 83,136.

It is evident, therefore, that in this city at least (certainly not a favorable one to select in this respect) there has been, not an increase, but a reduction of 10 per cent. in the total number of arrests, and a reduction of about 40 per cent. in drunkenness and crimes incident thereto, which proves again the difference between "whines and facts."

As to unfair discrimination—the rich having their cellars stocked, or being able to procure liquors at very high prices while the poor have none on hand nor money to buy it—there is no more discrimination than in other things of far more importance to the poor man. The unfairness is not chargeable to prohibition, but to an imperfect social order that may be improved in many respects by a rigid enforcement of the prohibition law.

UNQUESTIONED BENEFITS OF PROHIBITION are apparent to any intelligent, open-minded observer: (1) disappearance of the open saloon; (2) abatement of open drinking in public dining-rooms; (3) the passing of the "treating" evil; (4) the closing of institutions for the cure of inebriates; (5) increase in savings accounts; (6) decrease in drunkenness and associated crimes; (7) changed attitude of many statesmen and political leaders.

In what is known as the mill districts of Frankford and Kensington, where in 1917 the saloons were doing an enormous business, the savings banks have received on deposit from laboring people more than 100 per cent. increase, amounting to a total gain in excess of $10,000,000.

PHYSICIANS QUESTIONED REGARDING BEER AND WHISKEY.—The Journal of the American Medical Association in its issue for First Month, 1922, publishes the results of the questionnaire sent to 53,000 physicians of the United States, of whom 58 per cent. responded (a percentage of replies seldom attained, indicating an unusual degree of interest in the subject). To the question, Do you regard beer as a necessary therapeutic agent in the practice of medicine? seventy-four per cent. answered, No. The same question regarding wine brought a like response from sixty-eight per cent. But on the value of whiskey as medicine there appears to be less dissent. Only forty-nine per cent. voted No. However, of the fifty-one per cent. favorable to the use of whiskey as medicine, only forty-four per cent. had ever found it advisable to prescribe it. It is an interesting fact that whiskey seems to be regarded more favorably by physicians residing in large cities than by physicians who reside in the country. Of the latter 54 per cent. voted against its use and 46 per cent. favorably to its use. In the cities 42 per cent. were against and 58 per cent. in favor of it. Moreover the eastern part of the country is more inclined to use whiskey as medicine than the central and western portion.

Classifying the reports by States, we find that twenty States favor the use of whiskey as medicine, whereas twenty-nine (counting the District of Columbia as a State) are against its use as a therapeutic agent. Not one State regards beer as of value in this respect. Small comfort for the brewers and their following in this fact!

SUPPRESSION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC is a growing issue now in all quarters of the globe. If prohibition is beneficial to one country, it would be beneficial to all. The World League Against Alcoholism is represented by the reform elements in all lands. These are being drawn together by banner bearers such as William E. Johnson ("Pussyfoot"), whose journey through Australia and New Zealand and India has been marked everywhere by an awakening of sentiment that will never abate. "For mankind are one in spirit," etc. President Harding voiced in prophetic words what is rapidly coming to be a settled conviction in the minds of multitudes in America, as eventually it will be over the seas when he said, "I believe that in another generation liquor will have disappeared, not merely from our politics, but from our memories. The very words associated with it will drop out of our vocabulary; a new race of young men and women will have grown up to whom these words will have no significance."

A COUNTRY MEETING.

A meeting in a community is the righteous force to spiritualize the neighborhood. A woman, now alone, residing in a home for the aged, told of growing up in a Friends' neighborhood, attending their school and meeting. She said—"I went along with the rest to the Friends' meeting and enjoyed it," and speaking of the benefit and influence of the Friends, she exclaimed—"I know a better man than . . . (the head of the meeting), never lived." He seldom spoke publicly, but everyone in the meeting received his heartfelt handshake and words of encouragement and counsel. None in the community were forgotten. This meeting, now in the annals of Quaker history for nearly a century and a half, has made a wider record in the lives of the citizens of the community. Its members were living epistles and still, by its varied life and work, show its right to the territory it occupies.

There is a spirit of comity between the different denominations by which a neighborhood already occupied by a meeting is left to its care.

A member of the Methodist Church in an adjoining neighborhood said to the writer:—We look to the Friends at New Garden to care of the residents in your community.

To a meeting occupying a given field comes the message of our Lord:—"Ye are the salt of the earth." This is the purifying power for every country slum. But if a country meeting loses its saving force, the words of the Saviour are still true, "It is thenceforth good for nothing but to be trodden under foot of men." Every member must share in its responsibility or the name of Friend does not apply. "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." Thus all the membership properly established will fill its place in building up God's Kingdom.

The spirituality of a vital Friends' meeting will truly be a light to the people. The gospel message of the life and lip faithfully given "at the Temple and at Home" will touch all who come under its power. Such a candlestick will hold its place.

A young man from England, an attorney at the King's bench, came with letters from the King, to make a cruise on the American coast in 1813-1814. While the ship was shifting cargo at Elizabeth City, N. C., the young attorney made an excursion into the country. He came to a house where he noticed horses were tied and went in to see what was the object of the assembly. It proved to be a country meeting of the Friends, quite unfamiliar to the traveler. As he sat in that meeting, the spiritual force so reached his heart, or to use his own expression—"such feelings came over me that changed my whole plan of life." He abandoned his cruise down the coast, joined the Friends, became their school teacher, became a minister, later was married to a minister's daughter, and soon joined the caravan going West through Cumberland Gap to Indiana territory. There he was instrumental in helping to establish country meetings of Friends in Southern Indiana.

In the minutes of a monthly meeting which has just passed its century mark, the names of this young attorney and his wife appear as the first clerks. In the early records of these monthly meetings are minutes stating whether all children are having school advantages. Soon the Monthly Meeting committees provided graded schools which furnished the basis of the public graded school system.

In the care for the community, First-day schools were opened. A minute records assistance given to a new paper being started at Philadelphia—THE FRIEND, that the members might have good literature. Throughout these country meetings a constant influence was exerted for a guarded Christian education, and out of the schools came strong Christian workers and educators.

This work of the Friends was as a beacon light to the settlers that poured into this territory from all directions.

The keynote of a country meeting is individual RESPONSIBILITY, not only in the worship in the groups but in the community as well. The Saviour gave a telling lesson on individual obedience, not only to Peter, but to all disciples also. As Peter turned from his own lessons to ask—"And what shall this man do?" he received the answer—"What is that to thee, FOLLOW THOU ME." "To his own master he standeth or falleth" is a watchword to every follower of the great Teacher.—MARY WOODY, in Our Meeting (Wilmington, Del.)

BOOK REVIEW.

"THE RISE OF THE QUAKERS."*

[Although the new edition of this valuable book has already been noticed in THE FRIEND we gladly give place to the following.—Eds.]

The freshness of this book was brought home to me by these words on page 62:—

"Practically there was one great difference between the Quaker and the Puritan in the optimism of the one as compared with the pessimistic convictions of the other. The Quaker knew that at any moment he might fall into sin . . . but he believed his Master was a real God whose power could go to the roots of this life and keep him from the evil; if he fell, it was his fault, not God's."

This impression is an exceedingly apposite one and in itself illustrates the value of an understanding study of our past to help us for our present and our future, for now, if ever, we have need to be optimists, and this shows us why. Other touches of a similar nature, such, for instance, as the importance the first generation of Friends attached to the spread of Truth through literature, a work both London and American Yearly Meetings have again taken up since this book was written (though we still have to persuade Quarterly Meetings to guarantee a book's circulation by agreeing to take a certain number beforehand) link this little history on to our present-day needs and despite the appearance since its first publication of several other most important books bringing to light further facts, it remains one of the handiest and best introductory primers to our history.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

WEDDED IN PRISON.

MAUDE ROBINSON.

All were quiet and shy at first, as the accent and idiom of the native of Westmoreland were a little difficult to be understood by the Sussex maidens. As they mounted the steep hill path, Ambrose stopped, looking up at some black specks which were circling round in the deep blue sky above them.

"There are ravens! I have not heard that croak since I left my mountains! Do they nest here?"

"Oh, yes,—in a big fir tree in the park." My brothers once climbed to it, for they wanted a young one for a pet, but they were only just hatched, and the squire's man chased the boys away, so that they did not dare to go again," said Mary.

"My brother Austin and I climbed to a nest on the crags and took home a young raven, which we taught to say several words;—but, oh, what a thief he was, and how the serving-maids did hate him!" said Ambrose laughing; then he went on sadly, "I wonder if he is there now? I have not seen my native valley for eight long years.

"Have you a mother there?" said Mary.

"No, the sweet soul died when I was fourteen, or I think she would have softened my father, who turned me out of his house when I joined Friends. He was a priest of the Episcopal Church, and was meaning to make one of me, so he felt it bitterly when I refused to preach for hire. But I had long felt that forms and ceremonies did not satisfy my soul's needs, and when I heard George Fox and Leonard Fell preach from a rock on the moor, a conviction fell on me that there was the appointed way for me to walk in."

"That was like my good father; he felt it was the right way for him, and mother always thinks he is right," and Mary sighed.

"Yes," said Cordelia, "you wouldn't believe what a difference it made to father. Like all sailormen, he used to swear at the groom—now he says, 'John, I will thank thee to saddle my nag.' He says 'thee' and 'thou' to the 'Squire and the rector, too, which makes them very angry."

"They are grieved to lose so good a man from our church," said Mary.

Ambrose looked at the girl in astonishment. "Art thou not a Friend, then? When I saw thy modest apparel I thought thou hadst broken with the world's people."

"As for that," said Mary, "I found that it grieved my parents to see me in my old farthingales and hoods, and it is a little thing to please them by wearing plain garments. But Cordelia and I go to the parish church as we have always done, and Parson Letchford is very kind to me."

"Especially since you came into your fortune," said Cordelia slyly.

"Hush, child, you have no right to say that. He likes my voice in the psalms and anthems. When his son, Ralph, leads us with his violin, Hurst Church is quite celebrated for its music."

"Yet music cannot fill all the soul's need," said the young man earnestly. "Does this priest of thine preach the true Gospel?" Mary could but remember how dull and incomprehensible the Rector's little essays, read from the pulpit, were, but she only said with dignity, "He is a very learned man, who is a Bachelor of Divinity of Oxford."

"A college degree does not make a man a true messenger. I would that you both could hear my dear friend, George Fox, 'the younger,' at the meeting tomorrow. Although he is so called, having been but a few years convinced, he often preacheth the word with a power like that of his great namesake,—and if ever a soul was sweetened and sanctified by the Life within, it is my dear old friend, with whom I have traveled for some months,—aye and we have lain in filthy gaols together for the truth's sake, and never a word of repining came from him."

"He looks a dear old man," said Mary; "but, see, Master Rigge, we have reached the top of Wolstonbury now and you can see the South Downs that we Sussex folk love."

Ambrose looked around, and his first exclamation was: "They are just like a lot of feather beds!" But seeing a look of chagrin on the girls' faces, he went on,— "It is because our Westmoreland mountains are wild and rocky;—oh, such noble crags! and fair lakes in the hollows. But these, too, are beautiful;—how soft and fine is the turf, and this is a true hill wind;" and he bared his head to the breeze with keen enjoyment.

"There is the blue line of the sea," said Cordelia. "Oh! Watch, Watch," she called to her puppy, who was rushing and barking around them; "why do you always go wild on the hill top!"

"The wind excites him. Hi! good dog," said Ambrose; "here is a stick for thee to run after," and he threw one to a great distance. Then, as if infected by the frolicsome mood of the puppy, he joined in the romp, racing hither and thither on the soft turf, until, breathless and laughing, he returned to the girls.

"It is worth while even to make a puppy happy," he said. "How all young things love freedom and exercise. It always pleases me to see boys and girls racing and skipping in green fields."

They took a path down the southern slope of the hill, through a narrow way called Chantry Lane. Here Cordelia lingered to fill her hands with the lovely blue, wild periwinkle, with which the hedges were draped. Ambrose and Mary went on to a cottage in the village, finding Master Lelliot busy in his garden. In a few minutes' talk it was settled that he could bring his gang of shears, and that Mary must see that her hundred sheep were washed and dried in readiness.

"And how is your poor Dan, Master Lelliot?" I have brought a book for him.

"Thank ye kindly, Mistress Mary. The lad is often very down-hearted, and a book passes the time to him;—a strange thing it seems to me who never learned a letter. You will find him sitting in the sun by the front door."

Turning the corner of the house, they found a lad of eighteen, his pale, thin face looking almost like that of an old man, while his useless, twisted legs were stretched on a chair before him. His whole face beamed at the sight of Mary. She talked to him kindly, and produced from her basket a number of the flat cakes called in Sussex "Plum Heavies," spotted with "Grapes of Corinth," which were a rare luxury in those days, but the Luscombes' seafaring connections brought many foreign things to their country home.

"Here is a book that tells of the voyages of Vasco de Gama and all the new lands he discovered. My father says the strange things he tells are all true, for he has sailed those seas himself."

"Oh, thank ye, Miss Mary, that will be a treat indeed; I have had no book lately but this old Bible, and I am sick and tired of that."

"That's a strange saying, my lad," said Ambrose; "for that is a book that is ever full of fresh messages for those who look for them."

"What could it say to the likes of me, sir?"

"That thou hast a Father in Heaven Who loves thee, lad."

"Looks like it, don't it?" said the boy grimly, pointing to his useless legs.

AND so vocal ministry comes to hold a middle place in our worship. It is essentially serving, helping. No matter how simple or faltering the utterance, words help true communion with our Heavenly Father infinitely more than silent worship that is reserved, critical. Silence can be baffling, killing. Probably, on the other hand, there is an awful silence to which no words reach and which no highest eloquence could surpass for bringing us a true revelation of God in the soul.—GEORGE L. HODGKIN, in "The Demands of Quaker Worship."

NEWSPAPER EVANGELISM IN JAPAN.

There are many mission stations in Japan, but as yet only a small part of the population is touched at all by Christianity. How to reach the great rural population and the dwellers in the many small towns where there are no missionaries is a problem which has been much discussed and to which many efforts at partial solution have been addressed. One mode of approach which has been tried in several districts with more or less success is by means of advertisements published in the newspapers.

In Kokkaido this method has been carried on for a number of years on a rather small scale because of the limited funds available. The matter published in this case was simply passages from the Bible for the most part, with an invitation to write to the missionary for literature and information. With some of those who had answered these advertisements regular correspondence was kept up, and a few names were added to church rolls as a result.

In the South, Albertus Pieters has carried on work of this kind for several years, and now is conducting a campaign under the auspices of the Federation of Christian Missions. At its meeting in 1920, the Federation appointed a standing Committee to institute co-operative work, and this committee drew up a set of rules and rented office space in Fukuoka, a large city in the southern island, Kyushu. Albertus Pieters was appointed manager and work was begun in Fourth Month, 1921.

Mimeographed letters are sent out from time to time to contributors and others interested, from which the following particulars are taken. For four days in succession an advertisement was published under the heading, "Books given away free," offering to send tracts to any one wishing to learn something about the Christian religion. From forty to eighty-five applications were received daily for some time. The advertisement was discontinued because the office had not a sufficient clerical force to handle so large a correspondence.

It costs on an average about twenty-five cents to handle one application, and the advertising is so regulated as to produce about 250 applications per month, as this is all that can be taken care of at present. So far as appears, there is no limit to the number that can be brought out if the means to handle them can be procured.

Most of the advertisements have consisted of brief articles on the Christian idea of God, with appropriate passages of Scripture. In answer to these many letters have been received. A few passages from these follow:

"I am a constant reader of the Fukuoka Nichi Nichi and am much interested in the articles you have been publishing recently. Please receive me under your instruction."

"I have read your hymn in the Fukuoka Nichi Nichi of July 1st. This is the first time I ever heard of the love of God."

"Reading your advertisement, 'God is Love,' has given me a desire to know this God."

The funds available for the first year amounted to $5,000, contributed by three missions. The next fiscal year begins Fourth Month 1st. Funds from individuals for this work are solicited, as well as from the various mission boards. Contributions may be made through any Mission treasurer, or direct to H. Kuyper, Oita, Japan, Treasurer, Committee on Newspaper Evangelism.

The last circular letter received is dated Eleventh Month 15th. One passage is as follows (speaking of members of the Zen sect):—"They readily admit that the Christian religion is good for the weak and evil, just as crutches are good for lame people, but since they are good without it, they are morally superior to those who need the help of Christ. A father will bring his son to me and say that the lad is too weak to resist temptation. Will I please teach him to be a Christian?"

Paul Kanamori has promised to write some articles for the work. One of his tracts, "The Way to Faith," has been much used by Albertus Pieters in answering inquirers.

JAPAN NOTES.

Work on the enlargement of the Girls' School, 30 Koun Cho, Mito, Tokio, was begun in First Month. The contractor is a man from Hiroasaki. The supervision of all the building work, including the new dwelling and the dormitory for boys, will be under the care of W. M. Vories of the Omi Mission.

Thomas E. Jones has received an appointment to teach in the Keio University, Mito. He expects to move to Tokio with his family in Fourth Month, in time to begin with the opening of the college year. Schools and colleges generally now begin their year in Fourth Month. It is expected that the Jones family will live with Gilbert and Minnie Bowles during the spring, and that the new house will be ready in the fall.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOARD OF MANAGERS OF THE CHEYNEY TRAINING SCHOOL FOR TEACHERS, CHEYNEY, PA., TO THE CORPORATION, FOR THE YEAR ENDING TENTH MONTH 18, 1921.

TRANSFER TO STATE OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL.

The most important business that has claimed the attention of the Board of Managers of the Cheyney Training School for Teachers during the year just closing has been the transfer of the property and control of the School to the State. A small Committee has given diligent attention to the negotiations, and has kept in close touch with the State authorities at Harrisburg through correspondence and conference. Senate Bill No. 338, which has become Section 2040 of the Pennsylvania School Code, passed both branches of the State Legislature and was duly signed by the Governor. This Bill places the conduct and management of the School directly under the State Department of Education, classifying the Cheyney Training School for Teachers as one of the Recognized Normal Training Schools of the State of Pennsylvania.

The examinations in the spring, 1921, were conducted under the State Department and the diplomas issued to members of the graduating class at Commencement on Sixth Month 15th were given by the authority of the State Department of Education.

The active management of the School will pass to the Board of Trustees to be appointed by the State Superintendent of Public Instruction and confirmed by the Governor. In the interval before such appointment, the Board of Managers appointed by the Corporation will continue to serve. The official and legal transfer of the property to the State, i. e., the farm, buildings and contents of the School, has not yet been effected. On Second Month 15, 1921, a Committee was appointed, with authority to act in this matter. On Ninth Month 26th the following Minute was also adopted:—"Our Committee heretofore appointed to negotiate with the authorities of the State of Pennsylvania for the terms of sale of the real estate and equipment of the Cheyney Training School for Teachers, to wit:—James G. Biddle, J. Henry Bartlett, David G. Yarnall, Richard S. Dewees and George Vaux, Jr., or a majority of them, are hereby authorized to enter into a binding preliminary contract with the State officials for such sale, upon such terms as to said Committee or a majority of them may seem proper, the final contracts and conveyance to be submitted to this Board for approval." Previous reports of this Committee, fully approved by the members of the Board of Managers, provided for the transfer to the State of the farm, buildings and equipment, with the stipulation only that we be reimbursed by the State to the extent of the indebtedness incurred in conducting the School since the removal from Philadelphia to Cheyney. This arrangement would make over to the State, at a minimum cost, a valuable plant for the training of Negro teachers, and would add to the permanent endowment funds of the Corporation the sum of money received, thus making a substantial endowment, the income of which will be used for promoting the education of Negroes expecting to become teachers of their own race, in accordance with the purposes of the original donors. The Corporation will, of course, continue, and through its duly elected officers and managers administer this trust.

ENROLLMENT.

The enrollment of last school academic year on Tenth Month 1, 1920, was 13 boys, 83 girls, total 97. This year the actual attendance on the opening of school, Ninth Month 20, 1921, was 18 boys, 89 girls, total 107. This increased enrollment is interesting in view of the fact that student charges for board, lodging and fees have increased in recent years from $80 to $180. The reasons for the increase were carefully explained to the students and they have been glad to take this increased burden of responsibility in sharing the maintenance of the School. At the opening of the new academic year, 1921-22, every available square foot of space has been taken up, and we have a considerable waiting list of young men and women of good preparation who are desirous of coming to Cheyney and are kept out only by our lack of dormitory and other facilities.

BUILDING CONSIDERATIONS.

The Executive Committee during the course of the year, under instruction of the Board, made a careful study of the future developments in the line of building and equipment that would be necessary to fully equip Cheyney as a training school for 250 pupils. Their report was approved and filed, and we hope may become the basis of a future building plan under the auspices of the State. Last summer, since negotiations were pending, it seemed unwise to enter upon any considerable plan for alterations, to say nothing of new buildings. The enrollment and waiting list we trust may lead through appropriations to be made by the next Legislature to the start of a forward building policy.

SUMMER SCHOOL.

It was not decided until early in the summer that improvements to the buildings could not be made for lack of funds. When that decision was reached, it was too late to arrange for the usual Summer School for teachers in service, the announcement having been made early in the spring that the School would be discontinued for 1921. It seems now that there should be nothing to prevent the holding of the summer session for 1922, and arrangements will doubtless be made for it to be conducted to the standard length of at least six weeks. The Summer School has been a vital part of the work of Cheyney, and every effort will be made to continue and improve it.

THE NATION IS BACK OF THE FLOUR CAMPAIGN.

The two outstanding examples of the way America has got under the task of sending flour to the starving people of Russia, are given by two cities, one in the East and one in the West.

In the city of St. Louis the American Federated Russian Relief Committee combined with the organization established there by our Service Committee and is conducting a campaign under the name of the St. Louis Committee of the American Friends' Service Committee for Russian Relief. E. C. Dreyer, one of the leading business men of St. Louis, is Chairman of the Committee which is now securing 200 of the leading business men of St. Louis to become members of the Committee. Part of its program includes the organization of the whole State of Missouri with branch committees in every community. Dr. Armstrong, the Secretary of the St. Louis Federation of Churches, has promised that every minister in the city will call the attention of his congregation to the need. The Committee has also planned to give the heads of the larger industries of the city a subscription sheet, asking them to ask each employee to contribute something. Every Missourian is asked at once to get in touch with this Committee, whose office is at 215 Merchants Exchange.

In Trenton, New Jersey, the Mercer County Russian Famine Fund has been organized, with headquarters in the Chamber of Commerce. Arthur E. Moon is Chairman of this Committee. They have already placed booths in the various stores of the city, and have collected a considerable amount of money in that way. They have organized a tag day for pedestrians and automobiles, and have made a most attractive tag which can be tied to automobiles, using the cut of the barrel of flour which has become the sign of the flour campaign. If any of the community would be interested in using this idea, the Service Committee would be glad to furnish a sample of this kind of publicity.

Have you an organization in your community? If not, you are the one to begin it. Write to-day to J. Augustus Cadwalader, Secretary for the Flour Campaign, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, and he can secure literature containing information and methods of work.

QUAKER WORK IN RUSSIA.

It was in mid-summer of 1918 that I found myself at the frontier post of Orsha, in West Russia. The Treaty of Brest-Litovsk had been signed three months before and the Germans had moved rapidly forward to occupy the vast expanse of territory allotted them. A rough, barbed wire fence was erected to mark the frontier, and on yonder side of it the German soldiers marched stolidly to and fro, clad in steel helmets and grey-blue tunics. Few people could be seen on the German side of the fence, but the Russian side presented a most moving sight. Thousands of refugees, Polish, Letts, Liths and White Russians, were herded together, encamped on the open ground, without any shelter at all and under rude shacks built of branches. It was the beginning of the great migration westward of those who had been driven east during the great war. But the Germans would not let them pass, and here they gathered and accumulated, without refuge, without food, without hope, waiting, endlessly waiting till they might be allowed to proceed to their ruined homes.

My companion was a doctor of the Quaker Relief organization. As he moved in and out among the masses of semi-clad and half-starved fugitives, he astonished me by his ability, despite deficient knowledge of the Russian or Polish language, to make himself completely understood, and to bring comfort to everyone by the kindness of his smile and gesture. The Quakers were working with what remained of the Russian Union of Co-operative Societies. A small hospital and kitchen were rapidly erected and the relief efforts undoubtedly prevented what might have been an epidemic, for the refugees made no sanitary arrangements whatever for themselves, and in the hot damp climate the danger of the spreading of disease was very great.

Similar work was being done by the Quakers in several parts of Russia. At Buzuluk, in Samara, in the very heart of what is now the famine-stricken area, they had a station which has become a source of assistance and relief to thousands. I remember, when I was in Samara, how repeatedly their work would be referred to by the populace with gratitude and admiration. Moreover, although for a time they fell under the shadow of the suspicion with which all philanthropic organizations were regarded, especially those under foreign management, their obviously disinterested and non-partisan character finally convinced everyone that they had no part to play beyond ministering to the sick without regard to creed, race or politics. In both of the Russian capitals they have distributed food, clothing and medicine, and though small in number, their labors have always been fruitful. No one who has come into touch with them can fail to be convinced that theirs is a work of grace that will help to revive in body and spirit a now abject people.

SIR PAUL DUKES.

(Representative of the English Government who is imprisoned in Moscow.)

FRIENDS' RELIEF MISSION FEEDS HUNGERING NOBILITY.

At the urgent request of one of the daughters of the Archduke Friedrich, who is now living in retirement in Budapest, the Anglo-American Relief Mission of the Society of Friends in Vienna has agreed to provide foodstuffs and clothing to almost one hundred members of the fallen aristocracy of Austria upon the same basis as it feeds her humblest citizens. Funds have been provided from the liquidation of the great estates of the former Archduke scattered throughout the territories of the old Austrian Empire—a liquidation now in process of execution by arrangement with an American syndicate—and upon the Archduchess' personal appeal, about one hundred titled persons, some of them prominent in the vanished life of the former Empire, who are now living in the pain and humiliation of extreme impoverishment without hope of succor or even sympathy from the present authorities of the Republic, will be allowed to purchase foodstuffs and articles of wearing apparel, new or second-hand, at approximately one-fifth of their value from the depots of the Friends' Mission. Most of these people are living in obscurity in Vienna, and those whom the Archduchess nominates will be provided with the minimum necessities of life to the extent which one dollar per month, expended at the depots established by the Friends' Mission, will provide. By a curious coincidence, the chief of these depots is in the Hofburg, the unoccupied imperial palace which was still in process of construction at the outbreak of the war; through the inexorable turning of the wheel of fortune, the very people who once chatted or danced in the brilliant corridors of the palace will now haunt its cellars and cheerless corridors in search of the wherewithal to maintain a slender existence.

CONSTRUCTIVE WORK IN VIENNA.

Agriculture.—The chief concern of the Mission in its productive work is to increase the supply of fresh milk. This has been accomplished by importing cows and bulls of good milking stock, and by selling fodder to farmers at a subsidized price. During 1921 the Mission added 1,018,809 litres to the Vienna supply of fresh milk and 410,480 litres in towns outside of Vienna. The Mission also imported 154 pigs of good breed; 1,474 English poultry, 7 goats and 9 rams.

Land Settlements.—During the war the food shortage increased to such an extent in Vienna that the need for fresh vegetables was paramount; and so many people began making gardens outside the city limits and putting up temporary shacks. From this has come the natural advance to the building of permanent houses and so bringing the population out from the overcrowded tenement sections.

From this also has sprung one of the most hopeful and constructive movements that Austria has to show to-day. Within the space of one year co-operative societies have been formed with a membership of 700,000, whose object it is to form settlements for garden villages where their members can live, grow their own food, keep poultry, goats and pigs and at the same time carry on their own trade in Vienna. Land has been granted on the outskirts of Vienna which is being cleared and put under cultivation. Through this land settlement scheme 1,300 one-family houses have been built. The Mission has aided this by grants of money; and two motor-trucks have been given for transportation.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

I.—SIXTEEN ADDRESSES IN THE COURSE OF ONE WEEK

Report of the Disarmament Meetings addressed by Frederick J. Libby around Philadelphia, Second Month 9, 1922, to Second Month 16, 1922.

At Moorestown, Lansdowne, Newtown, Wilmington and West Chester he spoke to meetings of both branches of Friends.

At Media he addressed a joint tea meeting of Friends. Many people who could not come for the supper arrived in time for the lecture so that the house was crowded. The attentive silence even on the part of the children was remarkable.

At Germantown the meeting was held in the Y. M. C. A. and at West Grove in a public hall. Advance publicity was given both these meetings with excellent results. At West Grove about five hundred people came out in spite of the bad weather for getting about in the country.

In the intervals between these large evening and afternoon engagements, Frederick Libby also spoke at Friends' Central and Friends' Select Schools in Philadelphia, at the public high school in Moorestown, at Westtown School, at the West Chester Normal School and at Germantown Friends' School.

On Second-day he spoke to a small group at the Union League and to the Kiwanis Club at a luncheon attended by two hundred or more business men of Philadelphia.

Sixteen addresses in a week's time is a record. The thanks of the committees is due to the Friends who co-operated so well locally as to make such a successful tour possible, and correspondingly our thanks as Friends are due to the speaker who brought us such a strong and informing message.

Frederick Libby has gone on to New England on another speaking tour. He says that he is finding an open door now wherever he goes. The average American is entirely willing to be convinced about the success of the Washington Conference and is merely waiting to have the facts clearly presented to him.

2.—THE NEXT STEP.

Frederick Libby urges Friends to write to Washington to their Representatives protesting against the army and navy appropriations for 1922, which are planned for $790,000,000.00. Last year they were $868,000,000.00. If we mean to show to the world our sincerity in calling the Washington Conference and our faith in its results, we must make a greater cut now in our appropriations. There is no argument being used to prove the need for such large sums. It is merely inertia. Before the war in 1915 we were only spending $315,000,000.00 a year.

3.—GRADUATING EXERCISES THIS MONTH AT THE WEST PHILADELPHIA HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

The Salutatory was entitled "The Necessity of Peace from a Human Point of View." Its keynote is given in the words, "We crave peace. Not an armed peace, nor a peace of contentment, but the peace of constructive action."

The Senior Essay dealt with the topic, "The Necessity of Peace from an Economic Point of View." This paper begins with the slogan, "Let the Past War be the Last War," and goes over the present economic situation here and abroad, closing with the statement that prosperity will come only with universal peace.

The Valedictory, "Educating for Peace," contains these striking statements: "False education caused the war. . . . Now education must have a new purpose. It must lead the world onward to a higher ideal, the abolishment of all war. . . . We, as the coming women of our country, find that a great responsibility is ours. The world's task of educating for peace is largely the work of women in their homes."

The address to the class by the principal was a fitting closing to such a commencement. He said, "the United States of the World need not be a dream only; it can be an ideal measurably within the powers of the nations to realize." From Lord Bryce he quoted these words, "Each of us as individuals can do little, but many animated by the same feeling and belief can do much. What is democracy for except to represent and express the convictions and wishes of the people. The citizens of a democracy can do everything if they express their united will."

THE WAY, THE TRUTH, LIFE.

I wandered, all astray,
Till He came by, who is the Way,
False, flickering fires mine eyes enticed,
Till Truth revealed itself in Christ.
Nor had I strength to win the strife
Before He touched me with His life.
Now, His sweet path of meekness leads,
He is the Highway for my deeds;
He is the Truth for all my thought,
The life whereby my life is wrought;
I care not if all else be dim,
For I have light if I have Him.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

WE are indebted to Charles L. Taylor, of Haverford, for information from the Esperanto Association of North America on the subject of "Esperanto in the School." Arguments that this universal language should be in the "regular school course" are put in very succinct and appealing form. Friends in England and on the continent of Europe, much more than Friends in America, have appreciated the "peace-making value" of such a common language. It is claimed that a child can learn the essentials of the language in six months. Romain Rolland is quoted as saying: "Esperanto ought to be officially taught and made obligatory in all the primary schools of Europe. Without that, any serious and durable international rapprochement cannot take place."

THE annual report of Friends' Library to the city Monthly Meetings records much useful work despite the handicap of a very limited income (the appropriations of the two Monthly Meetings amount to $150 per annum). In addition to the important field presented by teachers and pupils of Friends' Select School, the large Public Grammar School, on Race Street near Sixteenth, furnishes a good list of juvenile readers. These two fields present great opportunities for positive expression of our testimony in regard to proper reading for the young.

THE Monthly Meeting at Fourth and Arch Streets, on the evening of the twenty-third ult., listened to a very able representation of the claims of the meeting upon its members for willing financial support. Last year's budget required about $5,000 from an adult membership of 264 and the full sum was not collected. There were 143 separate contributions representing about 182 members. The aim for next year is to get 200 contributions. There is a favorable feeling in the meeting to the proposal to interest the children in regular habits of giving.

THE whole problem of meeting finance in the city becomes more difficult and more complex in the face of increasing costs and a diminishing resident membership. The city meetings hold some very valuable properties; two of these have values mounting into the millions; in addition there are numerous special trusts, most of them yielding no return for general purposes. Altogether so much is involved that the problems concerned should have the benefit of the best financial talent in the whole Yearly Meeting. Thus the future could be considered apart from the special points of view and personal sentiment of a single meeting.

SEVERAL Philadelphia dailies have given prominence to a report from British Columbia that the Doukhobors under Peter Verigen are proposing to enter upon a crusade against taxation, after taking the life of women and children under ten. It is said these are to be thrown into the Columbia River. Friends have been appealed to by the newspapers for information. Save the knowledge that the Doukhobors are opposed to taking life in any form they know nothing of the present threatened outbreak. William B. Harvey explained to a reporter that even when suffering from hunger, a Doukhobor would not kill a prairie hen for food.

BY permission of the Committee of six and approval of the city Monthly Meetings the Commissioners of Fairmount Park will affix a bronze tablet to the wall at Seventeenth Street and Parkway to commemorate the fidelity to duty of a park guard, Vincent Hanley, whose post was at that point, and who lost his life there in an attempt to arrest some bandits who were fleeing in an automobile.

SEEK, AND YE SHALL FIND.

[From the Spectator.]

God speaks to hearts of men in many ways;
Some the red banner of the rising sun;
Spread o'er the snowclad hills has taught his praise,
Some the sweet silence when the day is done;
Some after loveless lives, at length have won
His word in children's hearts and children's gaze.
And some have found him where low rafters ring
To greet the hand that helps, the heart that cheers;
And some in prayer, and some in perfecting
Of watching toil through unwarding years;
And some not less are his, who vainly sought
His voice, and with his silence have been taught—
Who bear his chain that bade them to be bound,
And at the end in finding not, have found.

YEARLY MEETING IN PROSPECT.

The week of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, to the one who is prompted alike by duty and interest to attend the sessions, offers as varied a program as any week in the year.

If his strength and his outside duties permit his attendance at the "extra meetings" called in the afternoons and evenings, he is brought into touch with problems of such various sorts, that the end of the week finds him mentally satisfied for the time with what he has received and willing to wait awhile till he can assimilate what he has gathered.

In this respect the week of Yearly Meeting contrasts very strikingly with the Yearly Meetings of forty years ago. There is not the same opportunity offered now as there was then for periods of close introspection. We allow less time for self-measurement and for messages of caution, reproof and encouragement.

Oftentimes an entire session passes without the display of the danger signal, and when it is shown it is a mild warning that there may be trouble ahead rather than a positive and determined effort to halt further progress for the present.

The railroads use both methods; at times the train moves cautiously forward, when it would be unwise to go under full steam, again the only wise thing to do is to halt.

We as a Yearly Meeting seem to have ignored in large measure the latter plan, and some will say that even the method of moderate caution is fast losing place.

It is a fair question to put to ourselves. Have we really changed in the short space of forty years from a body in which the judgment of a few ripened spirits dominated the meeting, and whose expressed opposition to a new measure brought a feeling of more or less willing acquiescence on the part of the great mass? Or is it possible that the whole body of Friends has become more alert to the Meeting's problems than was the case forty years ago and the group sensitiveness of the meeting no longer centres on the "facing benches," but includes the whole body.

I find it easy to give a partial assent to the latter suggestion. It is still, however, noticeable, that Third-day's session, when the reading and answering of the Queries gives the most natural opportunity for the meeting to rise to its highest level of spiritual exercise, is one of the best attended by younger Friends. Instances, too, are not rare when young men in business and with but one day off to attend the meeting, choose this session.

We cannot ignore the fact that the introduction of a wider range of interests into the Yearly Meeting schedule finds a more general response on the part of the unseasoned portion of the membership.

Forty years ago we heard as now from the Westtown School Committee, and from our one missionary effort, the Indian School at Tunesassa. Whatever else came before the body and brought problems of wide interest before us reached the meeting through the channel of the Representative Meeting. To-day the problems and the interests touched upon, including the afternoon and evening sessions, are many and varied.

One who has felt the solemnizing hush that has spread over the meeting when a spirit, a little more daring than most of us possessed, has favored an innovation, recalls the ease with which we apparently surrendered judgment and joined in with it. He appreciates that this contrasts strikingly with the custom of the former times, when an adverse sentiment from the gallery, briefly and positively expressed, but not without due tenderness and consideration for others, brought a comfortable feeling over the body and the routine business continued.

It is idle for us to wish to return to the former ways; it is not in the nature of things for us to do it; neither would it be for the best if we could. At the same time there are lessons which not a few of us learned at those Yearly Meetings of former years which it were well for us to ponder and emulate to-day.

An incident that occurred several years ago will never grow old or out of date to the writer, and it may with profit be revived here. A visitor from a distant Yearly Meeting was in attendance with credentials from her home meeting and she relates: "While the session of the women's meeting was in full course, a messenger from men's meeting came to our door, and announced that a minister of that meeting felt a clear call to visit in Gospel love our meeting;" she added, "I thought then that I had never experienced the over-shadowing presence of the Master upon an assembly as I did on that occasion. We waited for the answer of that same Spirit that had prompted him and it came with a like clearness that he had felt.

"In due time he came with a companion. I can almost quote what he said," she added with much feeling. "My eyes were opened to see and my understanding to comprehend what we to-day at our home meeting were forced to lose. Years ago we had time for such an exercise as the minister spread before us, but to-day we cannot stop the routine of business to meet such an exigency and so perforce it does not arise." Then in conclusion she said: "I have seen much and learned much in your wonderful country, but in the quiet of my faraway home, if favored to reach it, I shall revert with keenest satisfaction to the visit of the minister with a message, who came to our women's meeting."

If we can have a measure of the spirit of discernment that will be granted us if we in sincerity seek for it and wait upon its coming, we shall have time to transact all the business that concerns us with a dignity and solemnity befitting its nature, and we shall at the same time be able to grapple with the added problems which the times call upon us to help solve. We shall look upon the meetings of the past as periods of especial favor when the Lord was in His temple, and that temple was our hearts. We shall recall those saintly faces that looked down upon us from the raised benches, and we shall know that to be true which we then felt to be so, that they were living in accord with His leadings and were doing His bidding.

Because our day is not a copy of their day will not discourage us, but we shall be made humble by the thought, that were they the motive power of the present as they were of the past, to-day's problems would receive a support from them that we cannot outdo.

THE COMING OF THE LORD.

WM. LITTLEBOY.

As is always the case in times of world crisis the minds of many Christians are turned to-day towards the hope, which, in one form or another, has been present in the Church of Christ throughout the centuries—the hope that the Lord will immediately appear in apocalyptic fashion to save a lost and ruined world. How far, and in what sense, is that hope justified? The question is one of immediate practical importance. A wrong view of what we are to look for is not immaterial; it may be fraught with grave consequences in life and conduct.

Let us frankly admit that there is much in the language of Jesus, as recorded in the Synoptic Gospels, which, taken in its literal sense, seems to indicate some catastrophic manifestation of Christ, a coming in the clouds of Heaven with power and great glory. It is also certain that a keen expectation of such a "parousia" prevailed in the first two Christian generations, and that as time went on a deep sense of disappointment was felt at the non-realization of the hope.

It is not possible within the limits of this paper to go into the very interesting critical aspects of this subject, but in order to understand this teaching aright, we need some acquaintance with the apocalyptic conceptions with which Jewish thought was saturated at the time of the earthly life of Jesus. He inevitably expressed Himself in language with which His hearers were familiar, though He constantly raised its meaning far above the current significance of the words He used. We need also to remember that the minds of the disciples were filled with these conceptions, often in a very crude form, and it is likely enough that their report of His words may be to some extent colored by their own ingrained ideas.

The purpose of this paper is to suggest certain considerations which may lead us to the conclusion that the material and external form which the "Second Coming" assumes in the minds of some is not the highest interpretation of this bright hope or nearest to "the truth as it is in Jesus."

1. Historically, it is worth while recalling the fact that the expectation of a great world catastrophe, in the midst of which Christ should appear in glory, is no new phenomenon, but one which has constantly re-appeared during the Christian centuries, and has always issued in disappointment. This fact of experience should put us on our guard.

2. There is inherent in this expectation in its external form a measure of spiritual indolence, and a pessimism unworthy of a believer in Jesus. It represents in effect an appeal to God to work a miracle to extricate us from the slough into which we have walked deliberately and in spite of clear warning. God has placed us here to work out our own salvation and that of the world in co-operation with, and dependence upon, Him; and He has indicated clearly enough our line of service and the spirit which is to animate our labor. But in these last days the world has once more rejected Christ; worse still, His own disciples have thrown Him over; we have despised all His counsel and would none of His reproof. Now we are face to face with the consequences of our unfaithfulness; and it is indolence on our part to expect a Divine intervention of external character to save us from the results of our own sin. No, we shall have to work it out: to learn wisdom through years of bitter disillusion. And it is doubtless well that we should work it out. Our salvation lies not in looking for a portent, but in humble acknowledgment of our sin and in return to the obedience which we owe to Him. It is a matter of experience that believers in an outward "Advent" usually lose, sooner or later, their interest in the humanity around and relax their efforts on its behalf. How, indeed, should it be otherwise? If the world is to be saved to-morrow by an outward manifestation of Christ, why should I incur the pain and labor of doing that which will so soon be done by the direct action of Christ Himself?

Furthermore, this expectation in its external form reveals an unworthy pessimism; it represents a counsel of despair. In its essence, it is a confession that we have lost faith in man, and of "that of God in man;" that we have given up the fundamental Quaker faith that there is in all men a Divine element capable of responding to the appeal of the Spirit. It means that we regard man as too obstinate or too debased ever to accept the invitation of Christ—that he must be either forced into the Kingdom, or destroyed from the face of the earth by an act of sovereign might.

3. This external and overmastering assertion of power runs absolutely counter to the Divine method of dealing with men as shown in the New Testament. God will never compel; He will never take the world by storm; a victory of compulsion is with Him no victory at all. When the Saviour of the world first entered it, He did so as a helpless baby cradled in the manger of a village inn. God dropped a little seed of life and love into the world, and left it to grow in silence and secrecy until, like the tree in Nebuchadnezzar's dream, it should overshadow the whole earth. Jesus Himself settled the matter once for all in the wilderness when He refused to make His appeal by a spectacular display. Had He thrown Himself from the roof of the temple into the crowded court below He would have rallied the nation as one man to His side; but not one heart would have been touched by the prodigy, nor one life raised to higher issues. In the same way He always refused to work "a sign in the sky" as a guarantee of His authority. His method of life-giving was inward and silent, like the leaven working in the meal or the seed sown in the field. The only victory He sought was that of love: the only loyalty He valued, that which was willingly offered by the free choice of the spirit.

A spectacular "Second Advent" would violate altogether this principle of Jesus. It would be a confession on His part that love had failed and that He had gone back to the alternative of force; if men would not surrender voluntarily, He would compel; and is such a change conceivable? If love fails there is nothing left to fall back on. For if Jesus were to come in the clouds of heaven attended by His angels, men might be overwhelmed by terror, by amazement, by a torrent of emotion. But a victory so won would be barren indeed. And, on the other hand, if sinful men are to be swept away in a great world cataclysm, love admits final failure, and abdicates her supremacy; which is only another way of saying that God leaves the helm forever.

4. To think and speak of Jesus as about "to come" implies that for the time being He is absent from the world. If it be replied that He is of course always spiritually present, but that at His "Second Advent" His presence will be in some sense emphasized, we answer that, on the contrary, such a return to earth would be to submit Himself once more to the old hampering limitations which He laid aside after His resurrection. And at once all sorts of embarrassing questions arise as to time, place, circumstance, to which no intelligible answer can be found. Jesus told His disciples that it was expedient for them that His bodily presence should be withdrawn, because only so could He enter into the most intimate spiritual association with His own. What has happened to reverse diametrically the conditions of His association with His people?

5. Is then our hope vain? Are we the victims of a great delusion, a tragic misunderstanding? This was the problem that exercised the minds of Christians at the end of the first century. Eagerly had they expected the return of their Lord in glory; day by day had they scanned the heavens for some sign of His appearing. And now they were passing through a time of reaction and discouragement; the figure of the historic Christ was becoming dim and distant; few, if any, remained who had seen the Lord in the flesh; fierce persecution was rending the Church in pieces; and Heaven was silent and apparently indifferent to their distress. How could such things be? Why did not their Lord come to them as He had said? Was He indeed "slack concerning His promise?"

The Divine answer to these distressful cries came through the fourth Evangelist. In the Gospel of John most of us recognize the high water mark of the New Testament revelation. The author addresses himself throughout to the special needs of his immediate readers, and in particular to the agonized complaint that their Lord had failed them in their time of need. He discards entirely the apocalyptic form of expression which occurs in the earlier gospels, and turns the attention of his readers to the great spiritual verities which underlie this incidental and symbolic covering. In the fourth gospel Jesus says essentially the same things of His future relations with His disciples as in the Synoptists, but He says them in a different way. The message of John may be summarized thus: "Christ has fulfilled His promise; He has come as He said; you are looking too far afield; He is more intimately near to you than He could possibly be if He were encompassed as of old by the limitations of the body; He is making His home in the very hearts of those who love Him; He can never be nearer to you than now." Any one who reads slowly and prayerfully the great "Supper discourse" (xiv-xvii), will rise, impressed with the extraordinary intimacy and sacredness of that mysterious relationship between the disciple and his Lord; and as he dwells upon it he will be convinced that he already has potentially far more than any outward manifestation of his divine Friend could give him.

John tells us of the appearing of the risen and glorified Lord to His disciples on the evening of the Resurrection Day. He had not "come" into the barred and bolted room; He was there already, as indeed He is always present with His own; there was no change in Him; what had happened was that their eyes had been opened for a brief moment to apprehend what was eternally present. None of those who had seen no beauty in Jesus, none who had despised and rejected Him, were able to behold Him now; only loving spirits could know His presence; only the pure in heart could see God.

And so John suggests that the tenor of our prayer should be, "Lord, that we may receive our sight." We are to live in love, our faces turned to the light; and more and more shall we be conscious of the greatest fact of all life, the constant presence with us of the Lord of Light and Love. This is the great, the splendid Hope which we have as "an anchor to the soul," the hope that never fails. Any day we may see Him with clearer vision. Some day we shall see Him as He is.

"TEACH US. . . to give and not to count the cost; to fight and not to heed the wounds; to toil and not to seek for rest; to labor and not to ask for any reward, save that of knowing that we do Thy will."

LEAVES FROM A SOUTHERN JOURNAL.

[The following was received too late to be used as a concluding paragraph to the article in our issue of two weeks ago. We are particularly glad to have it because of the pleasant reference to the Cheyney School.—Eds.]

(Later)—I should add to the impressions of the colored people, that on the last day of our stay at Summerville, a visit to the colored school in the town left a pleasanter feeling. It was overcrowded; the children in some grades coming in two shifts so as to make more room, but the class-rooms were neat and well-ventilated, with growing plants in the windows, and pretty curtains, stencilled by the older girls, who are taught sewing and domestic science. A little building for the manual training which was nearly done had been largely built by the boy students.

And when the pleasant and capable Principal, Gertrude Ashe, told me she had been trained at Cheyney it was pleasant to see how from our Pennsylvania hills, the good influences had flowed to the coast plains of the Southland.

Even the sight of a Negro man from the convict gang, chained by the leg to the cart he was driving along the public street, could not blot out the comfortable feeling left by that school where newer and higher thoughts and ideals will surely carry some of the boys and girls farther along "the upward track" than their parents have been able to travel.

BRIGHTER YEARS.

O North, with all thy vales of green;
O South, with all thy palms!
From peopled towns and fields between Uplift the voice of psalms;
Raise, ancient East, the anthem high,
And let the youthful West reply.
Lo! in the clouds of heaven appears
God's well-beloved Son;
He brings a train of brighter years;
His Kingdom is begun.
He comes, a guilty world to bless
With mercy, truth and righteousness.
O Father, haste the promised hour,
When at His feet shall lie
All rule, authority, and power,
Beneath the ample sky;
When He shall reign from pole to pole,
The Lord of every human soul.
When all shall heed the words He said
Amid their daily cares,
And by the loving life He led
Shall seek to pattern theirs;
And He, Who conquered death, shall win
The nobler conquest over sin.

ACCURACY IN MEETINGS FOR BUSINESS.

There is an old saying, "Silence gives consent."

The truth is that silence is often far other than "consent." We are apt to realize this, if, when conversing with friends, few or many, and ardently urging a project, we meet with "a dead silence." The application which I am making of such sentiments, at this juncture, may surprise my readers.

In some of our meetings for business, an endeavor is manifest to get away from a "stereotyped" style of expression. This attitude calls also for care, on the other hand, lest we lose the accurate language which, to my mind, so often conspicuously marked the meeting utterances (particularly on doctrine) of the generation just preceding our own.

One phrase again and again has given me especial concern. Sometimes it may be warranted, but should there not be virtually unanimous accord to admit it? I refer to the words, "fully united with."

United with—to the full—impresses me as a sweeping assertion. It may oppress tender spirits.

Probably it will be urged that a clerk is dependent, in the framing of his minutes, upon those who speak in the meeting. This may be true so far as the mere fact is involved of noting approval or disapproval of a measure. But if religiously concerned members, who are wont to share in the exercise of the meeting, maintain silence, should not an observant and considerate clerk be cautious, and avoid so superlative a word as “fully?”

Objectors may not always be required openly to manifest opposition. They may be called sometimes to “passive resistance;” and language unduly comprehensive may burden and embarrass them.

Is it not sufficient to use the simple words “accepted,” “united with,” “approved,” or (if peculiar emphasis be deemed desirable) “met with much approval,”—when confirming a proposition?

While this matter has especially arrested my attention and given concern, other modes of expression may call for equally careful consideration. Certainly the requirements of our Query—Answers—so searching a part of our Discipline—demand vigilant and conscientious treatment, not only by our Overseers, but by all those to whose judgment they are ultimately referred and who then have a share in responsibility for them. The counsel is ancient—of eminent origin—and of present-day appeal, to employ:

“Sound speech that cannot be condemned.”

AT TUNESASSA.

We are distant from many activities, but people and things abound: meetings and movements of education and uplift are entertained and encouraged.

Our pleasant home life compensates somewhat for our geographical situation. This feature has long been one of Tunesassa's cherished assets.

We are in sympathetic touch with the Superintendent of Education upon the New York State Indian Reservations. Our teachers have opportunity to attend local school conferences and share in their discussions.

Edith M. Dabb, Secretary of the Y. W. C. A. for Indian work in this county, has visited the School. She has since shown a continued interest in our work.

We are delighted with the week's help which Dr. Elizabeth Allison gave us. Her talks to the girls and boys on hygiene were much appreciated.

Ada Smith, of the Sybal Carter Club, stopped for a few hours en-route to California, and partly considered the scheme of organizing a group of sewers on the Allegheny Reservation. Eventually their product is to be sold for them by the Club at an attractive profit. Character building is emphasized by the S. C. C., in its contact with the Indians. The Principal of Salamanca High School also values this School.

The spirit of gathering to Christ, which led to the founding of Tunesassa, is the admirable aim and ambition of this worth-while Mission to-day. A splendid, serious responsibility still rests with Friends toward the Indian.

The late Lydia Pierce once said that “Tunesassa School is the only place where the ‘Old Party’ may learn of Jesus Christ.” A foremost Christian Indian woman of Allegheny Reservation loves to tell, that she first ascertained at this School there was such a book as the Bible. A young man, a pupil at Tunesassa four years ago, writes that his Christian life began during his school days there.

The Indian values the message of the Gospel, presented in its simplicity, sincerity, sweetness and strength, because it stimulates and stirs his soul. Should not we have faith in our Faith, that through indwelling and exercise of spirit, and watch, fulness unto prayer, we may be favored to discover our part in the extension of the dear Redeemer's Kingdom on earth?

BOOK REVIEW.

SELECTIONS FROM “CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA,” BY RUFUS M. JONES.

With the receipt of a copy of this small volume of eighty-six pages comes a message that two hundred and fifty copies have just been placed on sale at the Book Store, 304 Arch Street. This should satisfy us that some one thinks there will be found in the pages of this book food for reflection on the part of those who read and give away good books. One who has a right to be heard writes: “I have long felt that there are very few Christian writers of the early centuries who have such a great, fresh, vital message for the present-day world as has Clement, and this little book gives the cream of his message. I very much want present-day ministers to know him and love him as I do. It is very striking how close his conceptions of Christianity are to those of Phillips Brooks.”

Another has written: “On the whole, I do not know where we shall look for a purer and truer man than Clement of Alexandria.”

Who was this saintly man? is a question raised with not a few. There is little beyond what the ordinary encyclopedia contains that would interest us, but what he has written and the way he has done it, revealing the secret springs of his own inward life make an urgent appeal to every Christian, and it is more than fancy that leads one to think he makes a peculiar appeal to the Quaker line of thought.

Clement lived between 150 and 200 A. D. His extant writings comprise three separate Essays or Treatises and the Extracts contained in the volume in hand are taken from these. No. 1 sets the task of proving that Christianity is a great advance on the religions of the pagan world; No. 2 sets forth the lessons needed in childhood and youth in which the Instructor is none other than the Word of God, a veritable social order treatise of the second century. The third cannot be grouped. It is called the Stromata, which means “a scrap bag,” and contains the wisest sayings, most aptly expressed, of the three.

In future issues of THE FRIEND we may be able to print several of these selections, any one of which merits reflection. In the meantime it may be well worth while to become sole owner of a copy of this welcome little volume.

FIRST STATE EXAMINATION AND ITS RESULTS.

Dr. Albert Lindsay Rowland, Director of the Teachers' Bureau and official examiner for all the State Normal Schools, conducted the first State examination at Cheyney early in Sixth Month. The examination took the form of actual teaching before Dr. Rowland, who scored up the candidates by a standardized system of markings that covered knowledge of subject matter, personality, resourcefulness, the application of the principles of teaching, the meaning of the technique of the class-room and the exhibition of professional promise. The result of the examination was that all the candidates passed successfully and were recommended to the State Department for certificates qualifying them to teach in the State of Pennsylvania. These certificates will be converted into permanent diplomas after two years of successful teaching. Several of the Seniors secured high rating, and one was sufficiently distinguished to be given special mention on Commencement Day. At the conclusion of the tests, Dr. Rowland spoke in a most encouraging manner of the candidates and to representatives of the Faculty and the Board of Managers, expressing his satisfaction with the preparation of the candidates and assuring us that they had averaged up as well as the candidates of any of the other State Normal Schools.

COMMENCEMENT.

The Commencement was held Sixth Month 15th. Addresses were made by Dr. Albert Lindsay Rowland of the State Department of Education who spoke in high terms of the spirit and work of Cheyney and his expectations of its future success, and by John Gribbel of Philadelphia. and also by Senator MacDade.

COMMUNITY AND EXTENSION WORK.

The students and teachers have continued to carry on the usual helpful program of singing Negro melodies and of providing wholesome recreation and entertainment in many nearby communities for both white and colored audiences. They have also kept up the community evening classes at the Gay Street School in West Chester, in the Union A. M. E. Church at Media, and the afternoon classes in the Anthony Benezet House in Philadelphia, and the Home and School Centre of South Media.

In these ways the ideals and general spirit of the School are made known and put to actual use in the community. And the people of the community appreciate this co-operation. One pleasant instance of this was the scholarship of $100.00 given to the School on Commencement Day by the Cheyney Willing Workers Club of Ardmore, Pa., under the leadership of Addie Bowser, a former Cheyney student, and assisted by the Main Line Business League. It was a gift of good-will, and it manifests a spirit of self-help within the race group which the Cheyney management greatly values.

SCHOOL SPIRIT.

Within the School the same spirit has prevailed. Student government has continued to be a helpful feature of our inward life. The councils for young men and young women give valuable training in self-direction, in the forming of correct judgments, and in co-operation towards the best ends of the common school life. The Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., and the First-day School have kept up a wholesome and unpretentious religious spirit. The contributions to the First-day School weekly by the students and teachers amounted to enough to provide two half-scholarships for worthy students in need of assistance. This award each year creates warm interest throughout the student body and calls for discriminate voting.

FACULTY.

It is a satisfaction to the Board of Managers who are about to turn over the conduct of the Cheyney Training School for Teachers to the appointees of the State of Pennsylvania to feel that the present Faculty are to continue service under the new management. We feel that under our Principal, Leslie Pinckney Hill, there have been gathered together a devoted body of men and women of unusual professional attainments and of high moral enthusiasm in the leadership of their race. Under the more liberal financial policy made possible by State management his Faculty will be strengthened by the appointment of several new teachers who we are sure will find the spirit at Cheyney a challenge to high and true endeavor. No matter how careful the oversight or how deep the responsibility of a Board of Directors of an educational institution, the influence of the institution is created and must be fostered and insured through the teaching force.

The Managers of the Cheyney Training School for Teachers wish at the end of their stewardship to pay tribute to the devotion of our teachers and to give honor where it is due.

A FINAL WORD.

It is difficult at this time to express our feeling in turning over to other hands the work that has claimed the attention and care of the Society of Friends for so many generations. We feel that in taking this step we are promoting the cause for which the Institute for Colored Youth and the Cheyney Training School for Teachers was called into existence by Friends of earlier generations. We prefer to have the final word with regard to the stewardship of the Society of Friends voiced by our Principal as follows:—

"As we pass from the old to the new régime, we want our former managers to know that they have been building on deep foundations for more than two generations of direct and disinterested attachment to the School, and have set the highest standards of faithfulness and good judgment. State institutions sometimes get to be cold, impersonal and mechanical. We all sincerely and earnestly trust that many of the new State managers will be Friends whom we have known and loved, that the fine interest they have manifested here all these years will be even more actively sustained and that, although there is to be a new administration, there may remain here the same spirit. To lose that spirit would be to lose the best gift the School has ever had."

STANLEY R. YARNALL,
Secretary of the Board of Managers.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

WEDDED IN PRISON.

MAUDE ROBINSON.

Ambrose took up the Bible and rapidly turned the leaves. He laid it on the lap of the cripple, with his finger on the words "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth;" and sitting down, he gently and earnestly endeavored to turn the boy's thoughts to the true value and meaning of the Gospel message. It lasted but a few minutes, but the lad drank in the words as a thirsty soul, and begged Ambrose to come again.

"That I will, if way opens," he replied; then as the girls joined him he said, "Poor fellow! I know what it is to lie with iron shackles on my legs, but with us there was always the hope of speedy enlargement, and his imprisonment is for life. May he soon find that rest which sweetens the hardest lot;—perhaps thou canst help him, Friend Mary?"

Mary made no answer, and Ambrose seemed to look for none. The walk home was quiet and pleasant. George Fox, "the younger," joined the party at supper, pleasing all with his cheerful courtesies.

Next morning, when the girls were working together, feeding their poultry, Cordelia began—"I am going to the meeting at the Widow Shepherd's house;—won't you come with me, Mollie?" Mary looked doubtful, and said nothing, but when the little party was ready to start, the meeting being held at an early hour to avoid collisions with the Church attenders, it was her strong, young arm which was offered to her lame father, and she sat down by him in the large kitchen of a neighboring house, where the mistress had been one of the first adherents when George Fox and his friends made their great evangelistic tour through Sussex.

Truly, George Fox, "the younger," was under a fresh anointing that fair morning. Even Ambrose, who had so often heard him preach, was astonished at the fire and the searching quality of the old man's sermon. The room was crowded, many men standing in groups about the door, and in the silence that followed heads were bowed, and low sobs heard from those who had been "tenderly reached." Among these were Mary and Cordelia Luscombe. Little was said, but from that day both girls threw in their lot with the Friends who had before attracted their parents, and never looked back.

The evening meeting was again a striking opportunity, but as they came out George Fox leaned heavily on Ambrose's arm, and could hardly walk the few yards to the Luscombe's house.

"Thou hast worn thyself out in ministering to us to-day," said his hostess kindly. "Take him up to his bed, Ambrose, and Mary shall bring him a hot milk posset. She used to brew them of the best when I was ill last year."

The old man was propped up on his pillows when Mary came up with her nice basin of warm food. He thanked and blessed her, and when she tripped away, he said, "She is like the Mary who was the sweet wife of my youth, Ambrose; may thou find such a helpmeet when thy time comes,—a woman in whom the heart of her husband can safely trust."

He lay back on his pillow. "Now farewell, dear lad, may the Lord bless thee and keep thee."

Ambrose slept that night with the soundness of healthy youth. When dressed next morning he went to the bedside of his old friend and was startled to see his face grey and drawn, and his right hand lying helpless, while the poor tongue tried in vain to articulate. Alarmed, he called his host and hostess, who from their greater experience of illness pronounced it the dead palsy from which there was no recovering. Both protested that they felt it a privilege to have so saintly a man under their roof, and Ambrose knew that in Norwich his old friend had property that brought him in sufficient means to pay all charges. Ambrose could not leave him, and nursed the helpless form night and day with every device that could give ease or comfort. He produced from his saddle-bags some tools, and in the long hours in the sick-room set about mending all the harness, saddles and leather work belonging to Captain Luscombe.

"I apprenticed myself to a Friend in Kendal," he said; "for as long as folks want to go from place to place the saddler's trade can never go out of fashion."

Every afternoon he was released by his hosts, and took long walks, often over Wolstonbury Beacon to visit the crippled Dan Lelliot, who looked for his coming with great joy. It was often Mary who was his helper in the sick-room, for she felt it a refuge from her old associates, Ralph Letchford and his sisters, who were always teasing her to join in their Mayings and junketings which had forever lost their charm for her. Parson Letchford was furious. It was not only the loss of a regular worshipper at his church, but since a great aunt had left Mary a considerable farm, which she managed with the help of an old bailiff, he had secretly determined she should marry his son Ralph, an idle fellow, whom his father had never taught any way to earn an honest livelihood.

From the day that Mary joined Friends, the Rector started a course of rigorous persecution, taking for tithe from their farms and houses five times the value of the sum he could legally claim.

To Ambrose Rigge, of whom he heard as preaching in Hurst and the villages around, he had a special animosity, but as he was no parishioner, he could not claim tithe from him.

So three months went by, the invalid Friend slowly losing strength, and at last, after a second stroke, becoming perfectly unconscious. Who could wonder that Ambrose and Mary—working together daily in loving cares for the sick one, sitting at meals and often attending meetings together while Captain Luscombe or his wife took charge—found that their friendship ripened to warm love? Their betrothal was fully approved by Mary's parents, who appreciated the sterling character of the young North-countryman. Only a few days after this happy event George Fox, "the younger," passed away, and his remains were interred in the little burial-ground close to Twineham Church, which remains the property of Friends to this day.

Before Ambrose could decide what was his next duty, the Rector had him arrested and taken before the local magistrates, who tendered to him the Oath of Allegiance. Ambrose had never taken any part in politics, and although King Charles the Second was not a ruler to his taste, he was perfectly ready to abide by the laws. Yet swear he would not. He explained that the New Testament rule, "Swear not at all," was strictly and literally binding on his conscience.

Urged on by Parson Letchford, the magistrates committed him to Horsham Gaol, and thither he was conveyed in irons like any criminal. For several weeks he suffered every indignity at the hands of the gaoler, being so brutally treated that at last the Sheriff of the County visited the gaol and dismissed the drunken gaoler at whose mercy the prisoners had been. Ambrose was not without means, for in the saddle-bags of his old friend had been found a will leaving his small income to the youth who had been as a son to him. Taking advantage of the Sheriff's righteous indignation, Ambrose offered to pay for a room to himself.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

The Army and Navy Journal comments on the popularity of the summer camps for military training. If the War Department's plans for these during 1922 are approved and Congress appropriates the necessary funds, 227,000 men will be enrolled. Of this number 27,000 will be civilians, 3000 in each of nine corps areas. The age limits for the three courses are from seventeen to twenty-seven. To combine military drill with summer vacations and life out-of-doors is an astute move on the part of the army experts. Americans who would not join the army will thus be kept in touch with the military point of view and military discipline.

SELECTIONS FROM THE BULLETIN OF NATIONAL COUNCIL FOR REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS.

FREDERICK J. LIBBY, Executive Secretary,
Second Month 11, 1922.

YOU SPEAK FOR AMERICA, MR. PRESIDENT.

"I once believed in armed preparedness. I advocated it. But I have come now to believe that is a better preparedness in a public mind and world opinion made ready to grant justice precisely as it exacts it. And justice is better served in conferences of peace than in conflicts at arms.

OUR ARMY AND NAVY APPROPRIATIONS.

Why are the Army and Navy appropriations going to be cut by Congress fully one-half? Because it would be political suicide, with elections approaching, for any man or any party to sanction wilful extravagance in government expenditures. The people will remember that when we were on a peace footing before the war $300,000,000 was more than enough for both army and navy.

The Conference has been a success. The President, the Conference delegates, everybody, has affirmed what is clear enough to the ordinary understanding—namely, that the impending war between America and Japan has been averted. A new understanding has come between the two nations. We don't want the Japanese to stay in Siberia and we have told them so in frank words that all the world has heard. We want the remnant of the twenty-one demands, not yet repudiated, to be repudiated and have told them that, too, before the world. They have replied in diplomatic language to the effect that they are not yet prepared to leave Siberia and that they will deal with the rest of the Twenty-one Demands as a matter that concerns China and themselves. Yet we are not going to fight about it. Our case awaits judgment at the bar of world opinion. Patience and firmness on our part will win without resort to force, and we know it. "Justice is better served in conferences of peace than in conflicts at arms."

We are not going to fight Japan nor are we going to fight any other nation. Scan the horizon as you will, you will be unable, if you are at all familiar with world conditions, to discover in any quarter a war threatening the United States. Our military friends have had only Japan in mind when they have warned us of impending danger. The naval limitation, coupled with the Four-Power Pact, has happily banished this cloud from the sky. Moreover a better understanding has come throughout the world by means of this Conference, and the whole civilized world is demanding permanent peace and relief from the burden of armaments.

LET AMERICA SHOW THE WAY.

It is for America to lead the way in rigid economy in military expenditures with no less boldness than that which gained us world-wide prestige on November 12th. Our budget estimates call for $700,000,000 for the Army and Navy for 1923. In 1915 they cost us $315,000,000. This was more than we had ever spent on them before. The nearer Congress brings the appropriation to this figure, the better case it will make with the voters "back home."

The farmers want the army and navy appropriations slashed. Why? Because when this bill has been paid no money remains for purposes that are vital to their welfare.

The workers want the army and navy appropriations slashed. Why? For the same reason. A great nation like ours ought to be able in times of national unemployment to build necessary roads, canals and public buildings, and our Army and Navy so cramp us that we can do none of these things.

Business men want the army and navy appropriations slashed. Why? Because taxes are sucking the life-blood of our national prosperity.

The organization women want the army and navy appropriations slashed. Why? For all of the reasons named above. When they ask Congress for a few hundred thousand dollars for the preservation of our children and mothers, Congress replies that it has no money. It is true. The Army and Navy have taken it. Write to your local paper what you think about it.

COLD BUSINESS JUDGMENT AND COMMON SENSE NEEDED.

The war is over. We want peace and the fruits of peace. Vague alarms about conceivable wars with imaginary enemies in some distant period leave us cold. Hysteria and emotionalism have had their day. It is time to give cool business judgment and common sense a hearing. Our representatives in Congress will make no mistake in the eyes of their constituents if they cut the army and navy appropriations to $400,000,000 and thus become able to point to an economy that will be visible without a microscope, while at the same time finding a few millions for things the people want.

WHAT WILL THE NATIONAL COUNCIL DO NEXT?

1. Consider whether the next step is not backing the treaties,—all of them,—until the Senate has completed what the Conference has begun. The treaties as a whole in the present state of world opinion guarantee peace in the Pacific. The defeat of any one of them would weaken seriously our demand for the drastic reduction of the Army and Navy appropriations.

2. Then comes the reduction of the Army and Navy appropriations. Timidity here will nullify the moral value of the Conference. Don't be frightened by war talk! Don't be fooled by the old "preparedness" arguments! America is great enough to lead the world in cutting army budgets. Economic pressure everywhere will compel every nation to follow where we lead. Use your common sense!

3. The concentration of the manufacture of munitions under Government control is another step which Congress could take immediately, and which would remove one "menace to peace." The private manufacture of munitions is so described in a recent report of the League of Nations.

4. Do you know any good reason why America should not participate in the International Court that has just been organized at The Hague? If you do, tell us! This is the third step.

5. That Conference on European rehabilitation must come before you or anybody else can prosper. As soon as France is ready to discuss fundamentals, the Conference should be held and America should be there. As long as humanity struggles Uncle Sam is going to be in the struggle with his coat off, doing his part to help.

6. The National Defense Act as amended June 4, 1920, deserves your study. General Pershing himself had advised scaling down its provisions. It authorized a peace time army of 280,000 enlisted men and 17,000 officers. The reduction recommended by the War Department is insufficient both from the standpoint of reasonable economy and from the standpoint of the new conditions created by the Washington Conference. This Act prepared us for war with Japan. That war has been averted. Our national good faith requires that we now organize for peace.

7. Education and organization, with provision for financing both, as projected in a recent Bulletin are beginning. To be adequate, the organization of local Councils for Reduction of Armaments must exist in every community. Only thus will education for progress towards our goal be provided for. Our national headquarters will supply information on the issues to the journals of our affiliated organizations and to the press of the country at large. We are arranging to extend widely the service of our Speakers' Bureau while giving up for the time being our Washington Forum. We will co-operate with you in every way possible in your local work. We ask you, in turn, to create a local Council to co-operate with us. Its membership should include local representatives of the organizations that compose the National Council. Its Executive Board should comprise individuals vitally interested. It will be your task through the schools, churches, clubs, libraries, and the local press, to carry on the work of the Washington Conference in the cultivation of international understanding and good-will. President Harding and Secretary Hughes are doing their part. Will you do yours?

FRIENDS' MEETING IN SYRIA.

[The following has been sent us and we gladly give it place in THE FRIEND. That there is but little in our accustomed form of worship, that may not appeal to certain spirits, meets its challenge in this and similar experiences. The paper is an abbreviation of a letter from C. G. Naish, which has already appeared in print.—Eds.]

It may sometimes occur to Friends at home to wonder how far the meetings in foreign countries are similar to what we know as Friends' Meetings here, and how far the spirit, as well as the method of Quakerism, has permeated the church life of these newer Quaker communities. Those who ask the question will be interested to know something in detail of the meetings at the "outpost" in Syria.

The First-day meeting is a real Friends' Meeting in being quite without pre-arrangement. The periods of silence, though not often long, are understood by many of the attenders to be not simply waiting for mere humanly delivered messages. English Friends take vocal part only occasionally; the weight of this service is carried by five or six Syrians, of whom two are not members of the Society.

Our pre-war congregation used to include the pupils of the two High Schools, with which addition the large room was practically filled. Some of the older boys and girls of the present-day school attend voluntarily; and the body of the meeting is occupied by forty to sixty persons, a number probably quite equal to the pre-war attendance other than the school children.

During the first half hour of the meeting, the children of the congregation, those of members, teachers, and others closely associated with us, are taught in an adjoining room by three Syrians, all Protestants, and two of them Friends. The subjects include stories of early Quakerism and reasons of our special beliefs, as well as Scripture lessons. The children come into meeting in the second half, and are quietly ushered into special seats. The improvement upon the previous lack of discipline and wandering attention is marked.

Every Sixth-day afternoon a Meeting for Worship is held. Most of the English Friends attending value this meeting as the centre of our common Christian life. Several of our Syrian Friends who are really familiar with English are regular attenders, and it is here that our distinctive method of worship is most plainly shown to those most ready to appreciate it. The attendance has been from eight to twenty-five since the war; the average about twelve.

On First-day evening an English meeting is held. This was in its origin a Bible class for the older pupils of the two schools to which others were invited. An arranged address is generally given by one of the foreign staff, or by some visitor; occasionally by a Syrian Friend whose knowledge of English is sufficient. It is a warm, friendly meeting, and although the number of older scholars attending is now very much smaller, it is our chief instructional gathering for teachers and workers of the immediate circle, and the attendance is encouraging, about thirty in the winter, and over fifty in the summer, when a number of old scholars and college students are in the village.

Both Brummana and Ras-el-Metn congregations have Preparative Meetings of their own which send representatives to the Three Months' Meeting, so called because its functions are those rather of a Monthly than of a Quarterly Meeting here. It is also, however, the final authority of the Quaker Church in Syria. Its clerk (Tanius Cortas) has represented it at Dublin and London Yearly Meetings. The English or American visitor who should attend the Mount Lebanon Meeting would be impressed with the Quakerly atmosphere of the meeting. Without understanding all the proceedings, which are conducted in two languages, any Friend from abroad would rejoice to recognize not only the external marks of Quaker business meetings, but what we believe to be the essential spirit of our belief manifesting itself in the familiar ways.

Such a small church, so stripped by emigration (it has about half its membership away from the country), feels content with sister bodies even more vital than do larger sections of the Society. It corresponds with the Yearly Meetings of London, Dublin and Philadelphia, and with Friends in Ramallah (near Jerusalem), India, China, Ceylon, Madagascar, Pemba and Constantinople. Every year letters are sent to absent members.

Applications for membership are dealt with as here, but the welcome of the accepted Friends is a much greater joy to a small church where every member is known to every other, and the admission is a personal pleasure to everyone.

After meetings we always sit down to our love-feast. It seems to me that every quarter we have a happier time of fellowship than on the previous occasion, probably because I have learnt to love the individual members and the whole church more each time. True fellowship is in the Father and the Son; and rarely have I understood the meaning of that verse better than in our quarterly gathering.

As dinner comes to an end, the cheerful general conversation gives way to simple speech-making, in which absent friends and old times are remembered, thanks returned, and hopes and good wishes expressed. Then it seems natural for silence to fall over the gathering, broken by one and another in simple earnest prayer. The Ras-el-Metn Friends have two hours' walk to get home, so we separate, feeling that we shall still be joined in heart and with the hope to meet again.

These are real meetings—meetings with God. Truly there is in Syria, as the result of the faithful labor of fifty years, a living Quaker faith which is not merely a reproduction of Quaker mechanism. In Syria there are those who have answered to the illumination of the inner light. In Syria there are those who have proved that there is one, Christ Jesus, who can speak to their condition.

AT THIS END OF THE SCENE.

[NOTE.—The following article is from Norwich, Ontario. It indicates how far-reaching the constant appeals of the American Friends' Service Committee are. The article and the spirit of the community will be clearer for this extract from the covering letter.]

DEAR EDITOR:—

We are not meaning to boast but we are wanting to tell others what has been done. Last time the village aunt with her bustling about brought forth a great bundle of men's clothing which had been discarded by some street-car conductors who were now too poorly to wear out their old clothes. The ardent sympathizer is a retired school teacher who gives what we consider comparable to the "widow's mite" as nearly as any one we know. After having sent off a contribution once before we were feeling rather self-satisfied, I expect, when she arose after meeting and asked us if we had really divided our loaf in half with those poor people or had we just broken off a wee bit from one end? This query is perhaps a good one for many of us to ponder. We so enjoy being comfortable that we seldom give, I fear, when it really is a sacrifice.

With the many distressing accounts which reach us of the extreme suffering in eastern Europe our hearts are saddened, then stirred and we begin to find ways in which "we can give of our abundance to aid in their necessity." The ardent sympathizer and the village aunt seem to bring forth the greatest results of all, with their zeal, enthusiasm and wits combined. First, a little description of them will help you to better understand these results. The former stays at home, except for making calls and going to meeting, and keeps her cottage neat, but besides this she reads and thinks. Then her sympathy wells up for those poor sufferers and she tells the village aunt, when she comes in to dinner, that "something must be done and the sooner the better." With this, forth goes the village aunt among her many friends entreating them to ask their friends what they are willing to do. She is the one to reach them for she radiates kindness in an abundance that accords well with the way her ample cape covers her broad shoulders.

Notwithstanding the two previous packings of the winter, bundles, baskets and boxes come to hand. Then the village aunt goes to meeting and tells each Friend she greets of the fifty dollars' worth of unsalable goods one storekeeper gave and declares it will take a team to draw it all. So a team is sent the next morning and things are all gathered at one home for packing that afternoon. Married and unmarried women, and an English guest assemble, bringing with them patching materials, bran sacks and whatever they have found amongst their children's clothes which could be spared. One woman had taken the pains to make some small boy a pair of trousers out of some out-grown knickers of her son's. First, there were men's trousers and vests to mend. These had been reserved from a previous packing and had been washed by one having an electric washer and ironed by one who proved herself a proficient presser. Then bags and papers were spread out on which to pile each kind of article, as they were sorted. Really almost every imaginable article of clothing was there to be packed, from a woman's knitted hood to a pair of men's work shoes. A dozen coats, eight of them new, made one parcel; another one contained children's clothes, including babies' shoes and bed-room slippers. Four dozen pairs of new stockings and a wool-filled quilt were also sent. Finally, each parcel was securely sewn up and the shoes bagged. The Friends then departed, saying, "Farewell all." The next morning a kind Friend loaded the whole lot—including a bag of beans which had just been added by one of the young couples of the neighborhood—and took them to the express office on his milk wagon. The faithful treasurer was to be there to transact the business of shipping and so the goods were sent off, we hope, in time to alleviate some of the misery which now exists.

THE PRESENT NEED IN POLAND.

In Poland lies much of the richest agricultural land of Europe. This has long been the natural granary of Europe.

To-day hundreds of miles of fertile land along the old eastern battle-front lie unploughed. The peasants, refugees in Russia since 1914, are returning at the rate of 4,000 a day. There are 500,000 who are registered and are still to come back. Two hundred and fifty thousand have already returned. Of these, many returned too late to plough and plant their land. They must live on whatever their neighbors can give, a few potatoes, or a handful of sunflower seeds.

The Poles lack almost everything that is needed for reconstruction—horses, ploughs, seeds, spades and saws.

The government is endeavoring to help, but is not able to meet the tremendous problem. It furnishes lumber for rebuilding the destroyed homes, and has furnished 1,000 horses for wood-hauling and ploughing under the supervision of the Friends' Unit.

Forty thousand dollars is urgently needed for agricultural implements and seeds in this work of ploughing and planting in Poland; $1.50 will buy a plough, $1.25 will buy enough oats to plant an acre, 2 cents will buy a spade.

To meet the need for clothing in a constructive manner, sheep are needed to restock the eastern section. There were thousands of sheep in this district before the war, but the continual passing of the armies destroyed every vestige of the old flocks. The peasants of Poland all spin and weave their own linen and woolen cloth. Since 1914 but little flax has been grown, and the death of the sheep has exhausted the wool. Their stocks of clothing are now gone. Sheep can be bought in Southern Poland and transported to the devastated areas.

The most economical and the most constructive way, because it is a permanent way, of rehabilitating the clothing of Poland, is to supply sheep. The Service Committee is, therefore, asking money to purchase sheep. One sheep costs $1.50. How many sheep will you give? Send your money to the Service Committee, marking it "For sheep for Poland."

SAVING A CHILD IN VIENNA.

"Someone in America gave $10 to 'Save a child in Vienna,'" wrote Katherine Amend, from Vienna, recently. "I don't know whether that ten dollars meant much or little to that person, but I know he would have felt a thousand times repaid for the gift had he been with me yesterday.

"I had gone to call on Frau Schneider, whose little daughter is receiving one of these gifts of love. As I left her she said: 'Please, I don't know—perhaps the lady can help. Our janitress lost her husband in the spring. She is so industrious and brave, but I know her little girl is often hungry.'

"So I found my way to the basement door and I needed only my 'I am from the Children's Mission' as an introduction.

"I think perhaps Marie can have the packet of sugar and cocoa and meal and fat," I said.

"Marie turned to me, and I wish I could make the donor in his comfortable home in America see the dreadful look of eagerness that came into the child's drawn face at the mention of food.

"'Food—for me?' she whispered, and stroked her mother's hand."

NEWS NOTES FROM THE GERMANY UNIT.

A recent allocation of $50,000 by the Three-Million-Dollar Drive, for the purpose of buying clothing for the German children, is causing great joy in the hearts of 67,000 children in this country. The clothing is being bought through the agency of the Friends in Berlin, and the Friends are co-operating in distributing the clothing with the German Central Committee for Foreign Relief and with the Welfare Committees in each of the 300 cities and towns where distributions will be made. Each boy or girl will receive two sets of underwear and two pairs of stockings. The balance of the money will be invested in hundreds of yards of material for making clothes for tiny babies. One of the most real joys in connection with this clothing is that it comes in mid-winter. With the whole country now shrouded in snow and ice, warm clothing is a prime necessity.

One tremendous need which we have not yet been able to touch is that of linen for confinement cases. Some cities have already obtained lending sets of such linen,—obviously an emergency measure,—but it is very expensive, and many city governments are too poor to appropriate sufficient funds to meet this need.

AMERICAN Friends will be interested, in view of their co-operation with American Mennonites during the war in France, to know that the Mennonites in Holland are pursuing much the same course as we with regard to Russia. John Fleischer, head of the Mennonite Church at Winterswijk, Holland, writes us under date of First Month 12th, that his congregation has sent its first shipload of supplies to Russia. As these relief materials are meant mainly for Mennonites in Russia, and as Russian Mennonites exist mainly in the South of that country, their relief supplies are sent in by way of the Black Sea and Odessa. J. Fleischer visited the Berlin office some time ago, and told us at that time that Holland Mennonites had plans for bringing back Russian children in their empty ships to keep them in Holland until conditions in Russia justify their return. He told us that Dutch Mennonites would be willing to care for 1,000 Russian children in this way. This little group of people in Holland is more nearly giving to the limit of its ability than most groups of the world.

LETTERS of appreciation of the work done in Germany through the agency of Friends flow freely into the Berlin office. The other day a beautifully engraved letter came from the city of Frankfurt-am-Main. The Oberbürgermeister of the city, in expressing his warm thanks and regard, stated that it was the intention of the city to name a street within its environs "Quaker Strasse" as a lasting memorial in the eyes of the children of Frankfurt.

One of the ways to get a matter before the eyes of all the people of a community in Europe nowadays is to have something concerning the matter printed on the paper money which circulates locally. At the present time such paper money is made in denominations which have less than one cent exchange value. This means wide circulation. Recently the city of Gotha in Thuringia printed on its paper money a picture of a (supposed) Quaker, distributing food to hungry children, with the following verse:

(TRANSLATION.)

"In times of need, long, long ago
St. Augustine gave us bread, you know,
The Quakers to-day from a faraway land
Bring bread to put in each little hand."

The city has also coined a piece of money in porcelain which bears on the reverse side the imprint of the Friends' Relief Star. Each of these pieces of money has an exchange value of about one cent American.

SHIPMENTS received during week ending Second Month 25, 1922—138 boxes and packages received; 8 anonymous; 2 Mennonites.

Contributions received during week ending Second Month 27, 1922, $58,038.66.

THE WAY OF PEACE.

To-day we want, and—if we are to live—must have, the application of Christ's message to everyday life. We must have individual conversions expressing themselves in the collective life of us all. It is not guns, poison gas, submarines, and bombs which will establish the reign of peace. No, it is the seeking peace by doing justice. This alone can save mankind.

Soviets, Parliaments, Unions, Churches—all these are but the machinery of affairs. We have tried all these, and we are faced with ruin. Let us turn our minds to realities and learn the simple truth: that it is we individual men and women who, by saving ourselves, will save the world, and also learn the equally simple truth that there is no salvation for us except through service in common with our fellow-men and women.—[Taken from an article by George Lansbury, Editor of the London Daily Herald, and sent us by D. FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

WESTERN QUARTERLY MEETING.—Western Quarterly Meeting proved to be a time of favor. Friends assembled in goodly numbers from their respective Monthly Meetings. One striking feature of this Quarterly Meeting is the fact that the majority of its members get their living off the land. It is the most rural of all our Quarters.

There were several visitors from other sections, to whom also a part of the vocal service in the deeply solemn meeting for worship was committed. One could not help observing the manifest deepening in the best life on the part of the younger members. That the younger Friends are feeling the weight of things, now that so many beloved banner-bearers have been removed from mortal sight, to serve in another sphere, where death is no more, is a matter of profound thankfulness.

After lunch most Friends remained for an arranged meeting, which was of the nature of a conference. One of the visitors addressed the company on "How I Became a Friend." The meeting was enlivened by many questions put to the lecturer, which drew forth further remarks bearing upon vital Christianity, and the testimony committed to Friends. Friends returned to their homes with glad hearts, for it was felt that the Lord had been with His people.

BURLINGTON AND BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING was held at Burlington, N. J., on Second Month 28, 1922.

The first session was a season of deep overshadowing by the Holy Spirit. A unity of concern was expressed through two communications that we seek to know what it is to truly "enter into thy closet and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret." We should strive to lock the doors of our minds to worldly thoughts and pray without ceasing.

Another Friend urged us to greater faithfulness in following the Divine Guidance, feeling that at this time when the world is starving for the "Bread of Life," our opportunities for influence are far reaching.

The annual reports for Yearly Meeting claiming much time of the second meeting were prepared.

Max I. Reich presented a concern and was granted a minute to visit in Gospel love, meetings and Friends in Ohio and Indiana with a special concern for the inquiring youth of those parts.

A concern arose and a letter was written and sent to our Senators urging their approval of the treaties submitted by the Conference on Limitation of Armaments.

The Meeting for Ministers and Elders, held the day previous, forwarded for our information the answer to their Fifth Query which the meeting at large appreciated.

It has been announced that Carl Heath, Secretary of the Friends' Council for International Service will deliver the Swarthmore Lecture this year at the time of London Yearly Meeting.

The exact title has not been published, but it will deal with Friends' attitude toward the public.

This will be the sixteenth lecture in the Series. The list comprises some of the best thoughts that have come from the Society of Friends within the last quarter century.

Word has been received from Joseph and Edith Platt, of their safe arrival on First Month 27th, in Mukden, China, where they are engaged in Y. M. C. A. work. They sailed from Vancouver, B. C., on the fifth of that month.

THE Macmillan Company, 64-66 Fifth Avenue, New York, is issuing a neat eight-page catalogue of its publications written by Friends. The booklet bears the title, "A Selected List of Quaker Books," and lists a score of works by well-known Friendly authors.

SEVERAL who attended the Young Friends' Conference at Jordans summer before last will recall Walter Koch, as one of the small party of Germans who were present. He has just put through the press a work of his own composition under the ambitious title, "The Attitude of Quakerism to the Social Problem." American Friends, with two hundred and fifty years of Friendly traditions behind them, would be interested to measure up with this fledgling.

WITH the energetic campaign that finds a centre at the Washington headquarters of the Council on Disarmament, we should be alive to use every available means to copy their example in our various communities.

One such, which has for its nucleus a small residential and manufacturing town, has organized a large joint Committee of the two meetings and is diligently at work through various sub-committees.

Some of these are the following:—

The introduction of a "Peace Film" into the exhibition given by the movie company. This has been easily accomplished, resulting in showing, at very little outlay, a film to a house of three or four hundred people. Another was the offer of good speakers on Disarmament at the Chapel exercises at a large Normal School in the town. This has resulted to date in three such addresses having been delivered before a company of many hundred young men and women.

Another Committee has been charged with the putting of peace posters in any reasonable places permissible. This includes factories, blacksmith shops, country stores, etc., etc. Another group is busy, especially on Seventh-day evenings, in distributing well-selected peace tracts in public places in the towns and sometimes using the parked automobiles as worthwhile recipients.

There is a Committee to select and purchase books on Peace and Disarmament to be placed on a special shelf in the public library of the chief town of the district. Another Committee has promised to offer short signed papers dealing with problems of Disarmament—these to be published in a local newspaper having a wide circulation.

Still another Committee has approached the School Directors with the suggestion of a peace essay contest.

Speakers have been secured at no expense, except their carfare, to address Teachers and Parents Leagues at the district school-houses as well as at the larger school-houses in the towns. The same plan is likely to be taken up with the Grange Meetings. A few other avenues of approach to the public are under consideration. It is very evident that the ways and means are many and in very many Friendly centres there will be found willing helpers if a few will take the initiative.

Now we perceive that the wisdom of the Nazarene applies to all human activities and relations, and constitutes the only basis on which man can continue to exist and to prosper.—
F. MERTTENS.

THE CHALLENGE OF OUR GALLERIES.

One of the great contributions of Early Quakerism to human knowledge and experience was the revival of prophetic ministry. We still echo this revival in our testimony for a "free Gospel Ministry." This testimony reaches some of the deepest fundamentals of our position. It includes our belief in the direct relationship between man and God, because everyone must have a direct communication with God to be the vessel of the overflowing of his Spirit. It leads from this to our position of Democracy, our belief in the equality of all men before God, and the consequent supreme value of personality. This single testimony is enough to make a truly "alive" Quaker shake the country for ten miles around.

What, then, is the matter that we are not causing earthquakes sufficient to upset our City Hall tower, or the Bellevue-Stratford and Ritz-Carlton Hotels? Surely, if one man can affect the country for ten miles around, we have no need to complain about small numbers! But what, then, is the reason that we have not been shaking the country? For surely, we have fallen very far short from even the constricted goal of this legendary ideal.

As in all such cases, we must recognize that there are many causes. To attempt to name them all would be futile and pointless. However, one point seems significant. As a result of this revival of the prophetic ministry we developed our system of galleries of facing benches in which those most likely to speak may sit. This was certainly a great advance in its time. It is still undoubtedly more democratic to have twelve men and women sit facing the meeting than to have only one. But hasn't this had a deterrent effect on us communally by separating out the select? Since we adopted this form for the expression of our testimony, the rest of the world has been moving on, and we have been progressing in other lines. Have we advanced in proportion here or have we been slowed up (I will not suggest that we have been held static) by the fixedness of this or other forms?

The original ideal in the revival of prophetic ministry was, and should be, to have everyone share in the meeting, to have the meeting be a community of will devoted to a common purpose. But at present we fall deplorably short of any such ideal. There are a few spirits of deep insight and close communion with God, who virtually have all the meeting. I know it is common experience, among us who do not often preach, to come to meeting expectant, wondering what will happen. Then, as we enter and see some familiar character on the top bench we sigh deeply and settle our vertebrae in the accustomed slouch as we wait for him to speak.

This is a view of our system at its worst, but it shows the possibilities for its failure. Every strong preacher in our number is just another inducement for the rest of us to shed the responsibility for the spiritual character of our meetings. The logical conclusion from this would be that ministers who excel the rest of us very far are a bad thing. Yet intrinsically, they are surely a good thing. This forces us to the only other conclusion. Every minister in the Society of Friends who reaches greater heights than his fellows is NOT a reason why we should shed our responsibility! He is a CHALLENGE TO THE REST OF US! His presence should merely stimulate us to try to keep up with him!

Our inequality of abilities and the example of modern industrial specialization have led us to lean on those more proficient to an entirely unreasonable extent. In spiritual things there can be no division of labor. This is one place where proxies cannot do the work. It is part of this fundamental concept of prophetic ministry that the value of a message cannot be settled by us. The contribution of the most timid and untalented of us may be more important than the discourse of the person in the gallery, who is accustomed to preach and who thinks in much more extended terms. This is old doctrine to most of us, but it is far from common practice.

If we truly modelled our practice on this concept there would be much silence in the meetings, broken by many short suggestive utterances scattered all over the meeting. A Friend can be heard from the back bench as well as from the gallery, and better from the middle than from either front or back. Finally, the rise of a strong young minister in any locality would not mean an additional slackness for the other members there, but would result in a heightened spiritual experience.

"THE GREATEST MAN ON EARTH TO-DAY."

That is what the great poet Rabindranath Tagore calls him. He says: "To see a whole nation of different races, of differing temperaments and ideals, joining hands to follow a saint, that is a modern miracle and only possible in India. I do not agree with Gandhi in many things, but I give him my utmost reverence and admiration. He is not only the greatest man in India, he is the greatest man on earth to-day."

John Haynes Holmes, the famous preacher, says of him that Gandhi has the spirit and ideals of Jesus, and that under his leadership for the first time in the history of the world the Sermon on the Mount is being put in practice on a national scale.

The world is desperately in need of great men to-day—in need of great saints and great statesmen more than any other kinds of great men, some of us think. So that when we hear the story of a man who is both great saint and great statesman it becomes both a pleasure and a duty to tell about him and what he is trying to do.

Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi is about forty-three years old. He was educated first in India and then went to England to study law. He was called to the bar in 1891. After a short legal career in Bombay he went to South Africa to conduct an important case. There he found that his fellow-countrymen were suffering constant injustice and persecution at the hands of the British Colonials. Most of the Indians in South Africa were indentured workmen, without education, money or social position. Gandhi, a high caste Hindu, the son of the Prime Minister of a great Native State in India, a lawyer of promise, decided to settle in South Africa and cast in his lot with these poor "coolies." For eight years he fought the battle of Indian rights,—fought hard, steadily and constitutionally. His chief weapon was the ancient Quaker one of non-resistance. He and his followers refused to obey the laws which they felt to be unjust and went to prison in the spirit that our ancestors showed when they suffered for the right to worship God according to their own consciences. More than once angry mobs threatened Gandhi with death. He and his compatriots were "led out in prison garb to grace General Smuts' triumph under Kafir guards armed with rhinoceros-hide whips." In the end he won—won the respect of the whites and the cause of Indian constitutional freedom in South Africa.

Of the struggle he himself says: "We did not want to be governed by the Asiatic Act of 1907 of the Transvaal. . . . Two courses were open to us—to use violence when we were called upon to submit to the Act, or to suffer the penalties prescribed under the Act, and thus to draw out and exhibit the force of the soul within us for a period long enough to appeal to the sympathetic chord in the governors or the lawmakers. We have taken long to achieve what we set about striving for. That was because our Passive Resistance was not of the most complete type. . . . For the exercise of the purest self-force, in its perfect form, brings about instantaneous relief. For this exercise, prolonged training of the individual soul is an absolute necessity, so that a perfect Passive Register has to be almost, if not entirely, a perfect man. We cannot all suddenly become such men, but, if my proposition is correct—as I know it to be correct—the greater the spirit of Passive Resistance in us, the better men we will become. Its use, therefore, is, I think, indisputable, and it is a force which, if it became universal, would revolutionize social ideals and do away with despotism and the ever-growing militarism under which the nations of the West are groaning and are being almost crushed to death, and which fairly promises to overwhelm even the nations of the East."

The name "Passive Resistance" for such an irresistible force as Gandhi here describes is an unfortunate one. It won religious liberty in England in the seventeenth century as used by George Fox and his fellow-believers. It won Indian rights in South Africa as used by Gandhi in the early nineteen hundreds. It is being used again under his leadership in the greatest experiment in practical religion and government since the days of Fox and Penn. For Mahatma ("Saint," as they call him) Gandhi is trying to win national freedom for India by a great national movement using non-co-operation and non-violence as spiritual substitutes for war. The whole nation is in a state of revolt against British rule, and there are many Indians who would use violence, even terrorism, but the popular idol is Mahatma Gandhi, and so far his program has the official sanction of the Indian National Congress. To understand the significance of what is now going on in India one must have some knowledge of its economic and political condition.

After many years of British rule the average income per capita is $10.00 per annum for India's 300,000,000 people. At 1916 prices, one meal of rice a day would cost $1.05 per annum. In addition, taxes according to the new budget are exacted in cash averaging $1.40 per capita. "Is it any wonder," as Norman Thomas says, "that large sections of the population are living under famine conditions, that between 5,000,000 and 7,000,000 of these undernourished people died of influenza, and that 75,000,000 are receiving barely one square meal in two days? This starving people contributes to Imperial Britain for the benefits of her administration and interest on capital an amount estimated variously between $100,000,000 and $200,000,000." To stop the unrest which this condition of affairs has produced, England has resorted to martial law, with the result, as the Duke of Connaught put it, that "the shadow of Amritsar has lengthened over the fair face of India." India is in revolt.

What of this statesman-saint, Mahatma Gandhi? He believes that the British Government in India is "an irresponsible, insolent and godless bureaucracy" and that the winning of independence for India is not only a civic but a spiritual duty. His program is as follows:

1. Rejection of all government titles and honors. It is stated that 30,000 people have returned such honors to the English government.
2. Abstinence from drink—because no drunkard can be an efficient worker in a sacred cause like this. This is also a blow at British rule because the liquor traffic is a government monopoly from which it derives enormous revenues. Saloons are disappearing everywhere, and opium and liquor are being boycotted throughout the provinces, in spite of British attempts to crush the movement.
3. Withdrawal of boys and girls from a system of education which is under foreign control and the creation of a school system throughout India, in which the education shall be primarily moral and manual and shall be given in the native languages. The Vice-Chancellor of Calcutta University complained recently that in Bengal the College attendance had fallen off 23 per cent. and the school attendance 27 per cent.
4. Boycott of English courts and lawyers and the settlement of disputes by arbitration. It is said that thousands of lawyers of eminence have given up their practice in British courts.
5. Boycott of foreign cloth, which is imported from England, where it is woven of raw materials exported from India, and a return to the weaving of cloth in native villages on the native spinning wheels of old. This boycott has succeeded remarkably. It is said that $1,500,000,000 worth of foreign goods is now rotting in the harbors of India. The spinning wheel has been adopted as the national emblem. The National Congress has undertaken to distribute two-and-a-half million hand looms, and men and women of all ranks are using their leisure in weaving. "We have willed," as the Secretary of the National Congress puts it, "to become poor that India may be rich; we have spurned every pleasure that India may have the joy of Freedom; we make ourselves small that India may be great; we become weak that invincible strength may be hers."
6. Withdrawal of Indians from the British Government service, army and police. The enrollment of thousands of volunteers for the establishment of national schools and arbitration courts in the villages, and for the non-violent service of the motherland.

7. The non-payment of British taxes.

Not at once, but gradually, this program is being worked out. "A new India is being built and when the inner walls of the regenerated civilization are strong enough to stand, the outer walls will tumble to pieces." As Gandhi, himself put it, "The Times of India considers the non-co-operation movement to be 'an easy descent to hell.' I respectfully urge that it is a difficult ascent to heaven. If it was a movement to produce anarchy, surely it could be precipitated any moment."

Part of the secret of Gandhi's success with the masses lies in this simple life, which is a proof of his absolute sincerity. His life, like his movement, is based "on self-sacrifice, self-discipline, unflinching determination and the capacity for unlimited suffering."

He lives as simply as possible. He eats only vegetables, rice and nuts. He sits on a mat on the floor and sleeps on hard planks. He dresses like a workingman and walks barefoot. He travels third class.

Gandhi is fearless. He says in one of his writings, "A man who has realized his manhood, who fears only God, will fear no one else. If man will only realize that it is unmanly to obey laws that are unjust, no man's tyranny will enslave him. This is the key to self-rule."

If he lives, a man like this has a great part to play in the future of the world. Whether we agree with him in his attitude toward the British or in all the details of his program, we must acknowledge that he is a great man, attempting against great odds one of the greatest experiments that the world has ever seen. As Tagore says, "The soul of India has found a worthy symbol in Gandhi; for he is most eloquently proving that man is essentially a spiritual being, that he flourishes the best in the realm of the moral and the spiritual, and most positively perishes both body and soul in the atmosphere of hatred and gunpowder smoke." Was such a lesson ever more sorely needed in our war-worn Western world?

WHAT MEETING MEANS TO ME.

(A SYMPOSIUM OF THE OPINIONS OF YOUNGER FRIENDS.)

I.

OUR MEETING.

To a young man of the age of most college students religious problems begin to take form in a way that demands careful thought and consideration. A man then takes definite viewpoints on his form of worship and on his individual creed.

After his decision has been reached, or approximated, in regard to his personal belief the first question that will arise is the one on his method of worship. To most of us young Friends the answer has already been suggested by our membership in meeting. We either continue in the way in which we have been brought up or else we consider carefully any change in our mode of worship. What then does our meeting mean to us? Is it merely a place where we go to hear others speak of God, or is it an institution of which we are active members? Too often the former is the case.

If more of us would realize that interest always depends on investment we would find greater reward from our attendance at meeting. We should go to meeting with a desire to help in the general welfare and not a mere wish to glean good from the efforts of others. Meeting will mean more to us if we try to pray for the needy and for those we love instead of filling our minds with personal thoughts of little value. There is nothing so irritating or harmful to one's peace of mind as to be present at a meeting in which no one is assuming an attitude of reverence. Let us then do our best by controlling our own thoughts and making use of the silent time to pray to God for strength and the power to help others towards the right.

II.

I have attended very few of the meetings except Haverford, and with the ministers they have here the meetings are alive and uplifting most of the time. I feel that those meetings are best in which some speak from the floor as well as from the facing seats.

But there is one thing which does impress me strongly—I am rather upset by the standing for prayer. It seems to me a useless form and it breaks in on my meditation and worship a great deal. It seems to me that it would be better and break in less, just to sit in a reverent attitude.

(A Student from the Middle West.)

III.

My first introduction to the silent type of meeting, which happily occurred at Westtown, was pleasing. I found that meeting was a time of bodily rest, mental relaxation and spiritual recuperation. I was told to harken to the Inner Voice, and to act in accordance with its suggestions. However, doubts soon arose in my mind concerning the methods of spiritual food-getting, due to the fact that students rarely spoke, or if they did, said little. Moreover, there was little unity to the sundry messages from the gallery, whose content suggested previous preparation.

At last, I have realized what the trouble was: the trouble was with me. I believed in a mystic faith that permitted close association of man and God, even to the violation of physiological and mental law. Why are meetings lukewarm, floundering, dead? Why are most "movings of the Spirit" taking place in the galleries? Why are many modern young people slightly disgusted with the silent meeting? Because the meetings are clothed in mysticism, which is conducive to ritual, dogmatism, misleading figures of speech and crooked thinking; which stifles liberalism, broad-mindedness, clear illustrations and straight thinking. This sort of mysticism encourages the emotional, the feeling side of religious life at the expense of the intellectual, thinking side of religious experience.

We have little use for many of the vestigial organs in our Church. We need less imitative group acquiescence to old theories (whether true or not), and more original individual research for Truth.

I believe, with all my heart, that the silent meeting is the highest mode of worship. It is potent with possibilities for Christian growth, terminating in Christian leadership. However, the success of this type of worship depends on the attitude of the partakers. God is ready to bless, "Now is the appointed time," but we must learn not only to feel deeply in religion, but to think fearlessly as well.

IV.

Often, I must confess, meeting means nothing big or worthwhile. Often it seems to me that everyone is trying to lean on someone else, and I feel like shedding the responsibility, too. Often, I feel what I would like to call Spiritual Exhaustion. We are on the steps before the pool of Bethesda, but too much used-up to enter the water.

But sometimes, meeting is a tremendous experience, when I get shaken up and straightened out inside. And then I seem to get a lot of fresh power. It is much as though I come with an empty spiritual storage battery and go away with it filled for the coming week.

And once in a while meeting means even more than that, when I can feel an unseen presence come in contact with that larger self that extends, like an "area of Personality" in all directions about the visible body. Then it is that I have been able to understand that excellent phrase used by the founders of Quakerism, "The Peace that Passeth Understanding."

But the great value that I find in meeting and the thing that keeps me attending, is the dynamic power that I find in a really "live" meeting. It is in the waiting, spiritual ministry of our silent meetings, and only there to any broad extent, that we can find the released energy with which we may shake the ground for ten miles round about.

V.

Work and play, love and worship are four very necessary elements in human experience, because these all lead in the direction of God. Worship is the force which balances and supports the rest, and just as work and play and love tend to bring mental and physical fatigue, so do they also bring spiritual fatigue from which worship alone can revive us and quicken our souls in the presence of God.

Worship reminds us that our souls are parts of God and that even though we may ignore him we cannot get away from him. It convinces us that the most religious people are not those who talk or write the most about God, but those who best prove their love in faithful performance of what they believe to be His will.

To me it seems that our meetings for worship offer just the right opportunity to move aside from all the facts of work, play, and love and give us a chance for perspective. They allow us to scrutinize these facts in quiet and weigh and check the worth of each element in them. They urge us to determine our own rating with God as Christians and to find His rating with us.

Just to be able to sit in quiet, testing all these things and seeking to reach out by means of that to some new miracle of truth is worship, because it leads us to God—and this is what our meetings for worship mean to me.

VI.

Often enough it doesn't mean anything, except to make me conscious of my failure to seize the opportunity that was there. Sometimes, however, these barren experiences are the result of a group indifference which no amount of faithfulness on the part of scattered individuals can break down. We keep floating about on the surface. Pearls are found by diving.

Much of our ministry is born of apprehension—a fear of famine prompts the use of yesterday's manna. "It seems to me," "I have been thinking," "In a book I was reading the other day," that is often, really, "as the scribes." We claim that it is still given to men to speak with authority. We must believe in this harder, and seek that authority. Then what is spoken will get across to the hearers. But this kind of ministry can arise only rarely in meetings where the ground is unprepared. Try to make conditions favorable for such outpourings of God's spirit.

When we do have a good meeting it makes up for weeks and months, even, of the emptier sort. We must always go in hope, confident He will draw nigh to us every time we are able to draw nigh to Him.

"UNSEEN FORCES."

I came home a day late from Yearly Meeting and so missed the ride that some friendly Friend might have offered—so I walked and part of the walk the first day was through the hills of West Virginia. These hills along the Ohio are very beautiful, they lifted my spirit. But before long I came to desolate, dirty and ramshackle houses—mere huts, through the cracks of which I could see rows of dirty beds. The walls were simply weather-beaten boards nailed on the frame. They did not overlap, and in shrinking had left wide chinks which were sometimes covered with tin and sometimes frankly left open. The presence of children indicated that in some of these small shacks families were living. At first I had thought that they were "company bunk houses." Here and there in a discouraged looking doorway a man sat with head in his hands, and I recognized, by much association with his kind, a man out of a job. In this house hung a dirty lace curtain, in that a thin drab woman, struggling bravely against the coal dust, hung out clean clothes which would be covered with a fine layer of dust before they were dry. I passed a dance hall and then a dirty school-house. On the road in front of the school the children played with a tin can, while behind them rose all the wonder of a tree-covered hill fairly calling out to be explored. My spirit came down from the hill tops and trudged heavily with me through the dust in the road, and worse still, the dust in the air.

For now I had come to the power plant. The coal which was to be made into light and power—into electricity—was mined in the nearest hills, carried across the road on which I walked and dumped in huge piles from which rose a black curtain of dust. These piles of coal were everywhere. They dominated the place completely, no one dreamed of looking at the hills while in their presence. They had given their color and their monstrous dullness to the shacks around them and even to the men who lived in these shacks. Life had surrendered to coal and was slowly being buried under it. The black curtain of coal dust before each door was more than symbolic, it was death's agent as well as death's sign.

At last a young lad in a Ford asked me to ride. He offered me the seat in the rear bashfully, but I sat by him instead, for I wanted to speak to someone. And he was glad, because he was still struggling against the surrender to coal, and also, I dare say, because the dance hall was an unhappy substitute for human fellowship. At first he was shy, but finally sensing my sympathy he told me many things; about his family in the country, about his job, about his friends who had no jobs, about how hard it was to keep clean in that hole in the hills—"This shirt was clean this morning and look at it now!"—about some of the company's dealings with the men. He was no union man. He had no dream of better days and better associations between men, but he had a heart for justice, and so he told me bitterly how long ago the company had bought up the hills for fifteen cents an acre and built the shacks and now rented them at twenty dollars a month. He may not have known the actual fact of the matter—but that is the thing this lad was carrying in his mind. By this time he had carried me way past his own destination so I made him let me down; we thanked each other, I for the ride, he "for the company" and we parted. He went back to coal. I went on into the clean country, into the "holy mountain" where "they shall not hurt nor destroy." That was a far off prophecy.

That night when I turned on an electric light and remembered the light-makers themselves I knew that I would never again be able to be grateful to "unseen forces." The darkness which came when I turned out the light was kinder to my soul than the light had been. For the "unseen forces" to me henceforth are men; light makers who toil in darkness, not even toiling in order that we may see, not even seeing through their darkness by the light of sacrificial fires.

Now I know that every spiritual experience is unique; that this day in the hills can probably mean nothing to you for all it is unforgettable to me. Why I write I do not know except that it seemed to me rather untrue to speak of those bent, black light-makers and power builders as "influences" and "invisible forces." It seems to me that until we love God in these people as we love God in ourselves and our families, we can never get any meaning out of economics—not any constructive meaning. And the reality of our love of God in them is known even to ourselves only as we share their suffering and learn from it. The student of economics who does this is rare, it seems to me. He would be the first to say that information on economic fact is not the equivalent of knowledge of human relationship in the production of material necessities.

ALICE EDGERTON.

SEEDS OF PEACE.

Another great attempt to institute world peace has recently closed and we may now ask ourselves whither such things are leading us.

At the Washington Conference, an attempt was made to usher in world peace by the signing of solemn treaties. If it stops here, we will know that modern statesmen either have failed to learn the lesson of the recent war, when one nation felt compelled to break the most solemn treaties that had then been made to save its life, or else they do not want peace. In either case, the "scrap of paper" incident may be repeated.

In spite of the new treaties which are designed to prevent preparations for war, one nation will be able to fight another. If the treaty places too heavy a disability on capital ships it will simply cause a re-organization of navies on a new basis,

The attempts to prevent the development of a merchant marine suitable for quick conversion into a navy are too vague and general to be effective.

Although submarine attacks on merchant vessels, and the use of poison gas have been formally "outlawed," just as the military transgression of Belgium was before 1914, nothing has been said about the economic blockade. This is a more horrible weapon than gas, because gas at least puts its victims out of the way quickly, while the boycott forces them to slow starvation which counts its first victims among the women and children.

But why bother with the matter of disarmament? If we are going to outlaw all preparations for war, we will be driven from pillar to post, constantly outlawing some new contrivance with which one nation may fight another. There are no limits to the weapons with which men may fight. For a long time in the late war, the Russian army was armed with sticks and stones. But, finally, all these prohibitions will be overthrown when two nations feel that their interests clash.

War is like a fire of which armaments and international conflicts are only one flame. You may pour water on this flame or you may smother it till it disappears, but you will not have extinguished the fire and you will have to constantly fight that flame. But meanwhile, this repression will merely drive the fire to break out fresh somewhere else.

Even now other flames are blazing up. The relations of labor and capital (investments of absent stockholders); competition of capital with capital; even competition for trade are a few of these flames of war. This may not always be evident, but the relations of labor to capital may be seen in the recent miners' strike in West Virginia and the steel strike at Pittsburgh. But all are based on strife, on the spirit of gaining even at the other fellow's expense.

This spirit is the central point of combustion in the fire that is war. For such a cause there is only one remedy. George Fox once said: "I live in the virtue of that life which takes away the occasion of all wars." To repeat this here may seem to some a tiresome reiteration of a commonplace, yet it gives a hint of the only method of bringing in universal peace. Only as we can bring each individual of mankind to live in the light of the life that does away with the occasion of all war, only as we substitute the love principle for the strife principle, only as we bring men to co-operate for the common good instead of each grabbing for himself, can we abolish war.

"I WAS IN PRISON AND YE VISITED ME NOT."

Most Americans do not know that there are still some 300 men in State and Federal prisons "for conscience' sake." Nearly 150 of these are what is known as "political prisoners"—men convicted under a Federal law. Nor do they realize that America is the only country that has not freed its political prisoners, even England now having released the Irish revolutionists. This should be of especial interest to Friends because all of these men are men of character who are imprisoned because of loyalty to principle. Not all of them claim to be religious, but all of them suffer imprisonment for the ideal of brotherhood which is a first concern of the truly religious man. Moreover, many of these prisoners are men who spoke so clearly against war—on social and humanitarian if not religious grounds—that they were arrested for "obstructing the draft." Because they had families or were not of draft age, they were not classed and treated as regular C. O.'s. Many of these men are serving five, ten and twenty-year sentences. Others are being deported, penniless and without their wives and children, to lands which they left as children and where they are unknown and will be ignorant of present conditions and ways of making a living. Yet others are badly broken in health as a result of the terrible prison conditions. Finally, all of them have been so long out of contact with people that they are almost friendless; and some, of course, stand alone because of their unpopular principles.

Esther Harlan, 1012 N. Sixty-sixth Street, Philadelphia

(who has had letters from nearly all of these men and knows some of them personally), has been working for their relief. In a personal letter to an interested friend, she writes:

"If thee knows any one who will write to prisoners—not just once and forget to reply to their letter, but once a month or so regularly—will thee speak about them? As thee knows some of those whose letters are hardest to read are the staunchest in loyalty and have endured the most—endured unbelievable things. I am compiling a list from a number of sources of all political prisoners—not only in Federal prisons, but in State jails. I want eventually to be in personal touch with all but I can't cover the ground alone. Some of them write that they haven't had a visitor in two years and hardly a letter in two or three months. This is inhuman of us. It must not go on like this years on end—ten or twenty! I am compiling also a list of their birthdays. Does thee know any one who would take such a list and send a greeting as the dates fall due? It makes a break in the monotony—a splash of color in the grey days. Compared with the need, not only of material comfort, but of human recognition, it seems almost as if nobody were doing anything."

The letter speaks for itself. The self-sacrifice speaks for the men. Our actions speak for us. Do they say what we want them to say? If not, ask Esther Harlan what we can do and to what men we can send some of the human recognition of which she speaks.

THE BLOT ON AMERICA'S REPUTATION.

A few months ago this country was very much incensed and somewhat mystified by demonstrations in France against the American Consulate on behalf of Sacco and Venzetti, two Italians on trial for murder. Great indignation was expressed at this attempt to interfere with the regular administration of justice.

But we must remember that America is known abroad as the country which has kept Mooney in jail long after practically every one connected with his trial has admitted it was a frame-up, based on manufactured and perjured evidence; a country which at that time still kept Debs under lock and key; the only country which has not released its war-time political prisoners since the close of the war. It was quite easy therefore, to get these French syndicalists to believe that this Sacco-Venzetti matter was merely another trumped-up charge to get rid of a couple of labor agitators. And in such cases past happenings have not led them to put much faith in the justice of American justice.

Whether they were right in their characterization of that particular trial I do not know. But this I do know—the blot upon America's reputation for justice still remains. One hundred and thirteen political prisoners still remain in Federal prisons, convicted during the war-time hysteria.

The case of four Philadelphia men, Walter T. Nef, John J. Walsh, Benjamin H. Fletcher and Edward F. Doree, now in Leavenworth, is typical. They were among the group of ninety-eight I. W. W. men tried in Chicago. During the course of the trial various government agencies, by illegal means, seriously hampered the work of preparing the defense, depriving them of a fair opportunity to present their defense. After a trial lasting several months, the jury in twenty-five minutes, found all ninety-eight guilty on all four counts. The conviction was reversed on two counts. It stands on two others which charged conspiracy to persuade draft eligibles not to register or to desert, and to cause insubordination and mutiny in the armed forces of the United States. As a matter of fact, two at least of these Philadelphians repeatedly counseled and urged men to join the army. Captain Alexander Sidney Lainer, a lawyer, detailed to attend the trial by the Military Intelligence Division,—General Staff, U. S. Army, has characterized it as follows:—

"The I. W. W. were convicted in a wave of hysteria at a time when measured judgment could not be expected. If the people of the U. S. only knew the facts in the I. W. W. cases, they would demand in the name of fair play that every one of these men be released."

Pamphlets giving in detail the case of these four men and petitions for their release may be obtained from the Civil Liberties Committee, 1400 Morris Building. Let us all join in the protest against holding men in jail, in peace times, on unjust convictions for war-time offenses, merely because they happen to have a different social philosophy.

"MARCH IN PEKING."

[By Margaret Soutter Woods, aged ten years, daughter of a Medical Missionary in the Union Medical School of Peking, China.]

March is cold, sometimes; remember,
Not as bad as cold December.
It whistles to the grass to rise,
And makes buds swell before our eyes.
That's what March is like.

March is warm, but don't forget,
Summer weather's not here yet.
Warm and cold sometimes 'twill be,
And that is bad for you and me.
That's what March is like.

Dusty winds, dirty faces;
Sunless skies and ugly places;
Tattered children in the street,
Begging for some bread to eat,
That's what March is like.

Will it be like this always,
Dreary, dusty, hopeless days?
No, for spring will follow fast,
Sunny days; warm rain at last.
We'll forget what March is like.

SHALL WE SEND DELEGATES TO THE FIVE YEARS' MEETING?

I.

In regard to the question of the approaching Five Years' Meeting, I can say that I very sincerely desire that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting may send "fraternal delegates." Such delegates have no voting power and are only responsible for their attitudes on the various questions which come before the meetings. Manifestly all delegates cannot be heard from vocally. On important questions Philadelphia Friends have been courteously asked to speak at both of the Five Years' Meetings which I have attended. Both times the views of our Yearly Meeting were received most kindly.

It is unavoidable that members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting should be in attendance at these very important gatherings. It is a fact, as I said, that they are courteously asked to speak at times. For these two reasons alone I think that a few of our Friends should be officially appointed to represent our views and to be responsible for and to our Yearly Meeting.

In addition, it is a fact that we are very closely affiliated with the Five Years' Meeting in the Service Committee, the Peace work, Young Peoples' Movement, Missionary Council, Book Concern and Indian Aid Association. Why, then, should we refuse to appoint suitable representatives to be present at the official meeting of these other Yearly Meetings and to take such part as we are invited to or as we may feel under a strong sense of duty to take?

Only advantage will result to all of us unless our views are wrong or weak. Believing as I do in the excellence of our particular points of difference from the Five Years' Meeting and respecting thoroughly as I do their points of difference I can only see benefit to all of us from a cordial, brotherly relationship in the midst of our recognized differences.

Any one who was at the London Conference of All Friends should never again doubt the ability of the most divergent views to be harmonized and made fruitful when guided and sanctified by the Spirit of Christ's love.

I hope Philadelphia Yearly Meeting may appoint a few delegates to go in that spirit to receive and to give what will be for the promoting of friendship among ourselves and Quakerism throughout the world. There are too few of us and the work is too great for us to keep apart. We must seek for and emphasize the deep things of God—for these the world is in dire need.

S. W. ELKINTON.

II.

I am tremendously anxious that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting shall not send delegates to the Five Years' Meeting this year.

To begin with, I recognize that we would not be joining the Five Years' Meeting; that we would not even be agreeing with all their views; that it might only be an expression of our sympathy towards them. But the test of the matter is, Would it be understood that way by Friends at large?

Sending delegates is, in one sense, only an outward form of expressing our sympathy. Forms are only symbols for spiritual realities, and when they cease to be such they lose their raison d'être. The form of our method of worship and our method of conducting our business meetings are only expressions of our belief in the deep spiritual connection and affinity between God and every man. Likewise, the forms observed by members of the Five Years' Meeting are the expression of their view of the fundamental verities, which, however, differs a little from our view.

Now, if the form of sending delegates to them will be interpreted as indicating our spiritual fellowship with and sympathy for them, then, the more delegates the better. But, if it will be misinterpreted as our participation in and support of their forms, I think we should scrupulously avoid that form of expression for our sympathy and fellowship. The underlying spiritual realities are free and mobile; it is only when they come to the surface and crystalize in forms that they are fixed.

I feel, after living among the members of the Five Years' Meeting at Earlham, that, at present, our sending delegates would be misunderstood. It would be felt that we were not vigorously opposed to the pastoral system. That is one of the key-points in their form, against which we have held a continuous and consistent testimony. If we send delegates to the Five Years' Meeting, it will be impossible to impress the fine distinction between our belief against the pastoral system and our desire to extend and receive spiritual sympathy and fellowship—it will be impossible to impress such a nice distinction on Friends in the sections more remote from the scene of action.

In 1920, at the All Friends' Conference, I met a Friend from Jamaica, who told me that we had sent fraternal delegates to the Five Years' Meeting in 1917. Unfortunately, I was not informed accurately enough so that I could correct him, but this illustrates the way in which we shall be misunderstood, if we make our distinctions too fine.

The members of the Five Years' Meeting have much to give us, and—would it be egotistical to say that we have something to give them? They are evolving toward their ideal; I think we are approaching ours. Some day, it may be, we shall be able to send delegates with no danger of misunderstanding. But so long as the symbol, which to us means one thing, will be read for something else, let us avoid it. Let us speak only in terms which involve no misunderstanding.

NOTES.

THE Young Friends' Committee has planned a Meeting for Worship to be held on First-day afternoon of Yearly Meeting week, Third Month 26, 1922, at 3.30 P. M., at Twelfth Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia. All Young Friends between fifteen and thirty-five years of age are invited.

We would ask our Older Friends to believe us very sincerely when we say that the age limit has been placed, not because we wanted to be exclusive, but only because it does not seem to be possible for a group of young people to carry the responsibility of a meeting to the same extent when there are older ones on whom they can depend. We know that you, too, want this meeting to be a time when all may come to know our Heavenly Father better. We believe that you care so much that we may ask your interest and your help, at the same time we ask you to forgo the fellowship of meeting with us. We will gather as a group of younger members, desiring to be better able to take our places in the work of our meetings. We shall be much concerned that the spirit of the meeting will

END OF THE YOUNG FRIENDS' NUMBER.

THE FIFTH QUERY.

The Fifth Query reads: "Are you careful to discourage the unnecessary manufacture, sale and use of all intoxicating liquors? Do you avoid attendance at theatres, operas, dances and other harmful diversions, and are you careful to keep in true simplicity at the times of marriages, burials and on all other occasions?"

At the approaching Yearly Meeting a minute from Concord Quarterly Meeting will ask the larger body to consider the re-wording of part of this language. It will suggest that all mention of specific forms of diversion be omitted, and that the Query be worded so that attention will be forcibly directed to the whole subject of the use of our leisure time.

I have been requested by THE FRIEND to state the basis of the concern from which this minute arose. This I will try to do briefly and in good faith. Let me say first, to those to whom any such idea is wholly distasteful, that no plea is to be made for a theatre-going, dancing régime, either for young or old. The question is, does the present wording accomplish what it is intended to accomplish? Queries are for two purposes: partly to inform the Yearly Meeting in regard to the affairs of the subordinate meetings; partly, and perhaps this is the more important, to bring individuals face to face with their own responsibilities and short-comings, especially in connection with the spiritual aspects of our beliefs and practice.

Now it seems to some of us unwise to make out lists of certain specified things that are wrong, unless it be such universally condemned acts as most of those mentioned in the ten commandments. The tendency is, when specific things are mentioned, to take credit for abstinence from these rather than to be anxious in regard to positive, constructive testimonies for the things of the spirit. A man might, after listening to the queries, conclude that, since he did not dance, go to the theatre, use intoxicating liquors, or attend other churches, he was in good spiritual condition; or such a feeling might insensibly steal over him and give a false sense of comfort. Whereas all that time he might be fostering an un-Christian pride, a spirit of dissension; he might be underpaying his farm-hands; he might be making it impossible for himself to enter fully into the responsibilities of upholding a waiting, spiritual worship.

The specification of certain acts as intrinsically wrong also causes persons to dwell on minute distinctions; I have known those who would attend dramatic representations at Wither- spoon Hall, or at the Academy of Music, or at a college auditorium, who would never dream of going to a regular theatre. And I have no doubt that there are those who interpret "theatre" in such a way that, to their comfort, attendance at moving picture halls falls without its scope. The direction of attention to the minutiae of conduct, the breadth of our phylacteries, rather than to the underlying principles that should govern all conduct, seems, then, a dangerous thing.

Furthermore, since all these undesirable diversions cannot be listed, attention is too exclusively centred on a particular group; and others, not having been specifically queried after, come to be considered as negligible, so far as the individual conscience goes. Such might be the regular attendance of children at moving pictures, or the use of the Sabbath as a general picnic day, to the detriment of the home circle atmosphere.

be such that all may worship, realizing that it is more important that we should meet with God, than that we should listen to the most valued exhortation. There will be no spirit of aloofness from you in our hearts and we ask your trust and your fellowship.

On Fifth-day morning of Yearly Meeting week, Third Month 30, 1922, at 10.15 A. M., the Young Friends' Committee is planning to hold a Children's Meeting in the East Side of Fourth and Arch Streets Meeting. All children from ten to fourteen years of age are invited.

Let me illustrate this by referring to the old form of the Query that asked whether we encouraged a form of worship where ministry was exercised at stated times or for pay. Monthly Meetings were so taken up with consideration whether any of their members attended the services of other denominations and lamenting this attendance, that they did not dwell on the really important question of the full and right use of our own form. As it now reads, there is no opportunity for satisfaction or lament over mere abstinence or participation; consequently our attention is often turned into fruitful fields.

But not only is the theory upon which the Fifth Query is worded a bad theory; the result is unsatisfactory. We live, and it is not wholly unfortunate, in a stiff-necked and rebellious age. There is very little use in telling young people that it is wrong to go to the theatre or to dance. They will not believe it unless they come to that conclusion themselves. Here again, we are not arguing that these things are good or harmless; it is simply a question of the best method of persuading a generation of young people, who have discovered that they know more about life than their fathers did, or who are re-valuing everything, that a surrender of the ancient discipline (in a large sense) may mean a surrender of the ancient spiritual power. But there is only one sound attitude to take. The discipline that the coming generation submits to must spring from its own sense of need. The order must be, first, a deep sense of the value of things spiritual; next, a way of life that will express these values. The mere discipline, coming first and obligatory, is no guarantee at all of subsequent spiritual power. And it does little good, and perhaps some harm, to hold up, year after year, certain acts as wrong, which they and many of their elders in responsible positions in the church do not think are intrinsically wrong. In thus providing a definite point for indignation, we draw attention away from a really vital principle of conduct. Our duty, then, is not to tell young people what they must avoid, except in the way of kindly advice, but to make them, by our example, so hunger and thirst after righteousness that all the details of conduct will adjust themselves automatically and in a great variety of ways.

Are we then, under the pretence of a concern for the tactful wording of the Query, really opening the doors for every indulgence of individual whim? For myself, I am willing to say that I do not think that persons, whether old or young, who find dancing especially, or theatre-going, or card-playing, a frequent necessity for their happiness will come to be those persons who will take up the exacting best traditions of our Society. It is not that they will be wicked; they will probably be refined and cultivated. They simply will have chosen other things. But I think history shows that a strong, voluntary ministry, a willingness to be called to unusual services by a voice from within, an ability in times of violent-public feeling to keep true to an inborn sense of right, do not go hand in hand with these or any very distracting forms of amusement. Never have deep spiritual experience and exercise been found as characteristics of a person who takes his pleasure in unintellectual self-indulgence. But I hasten to add that I think many of the coming generation, having made their trial, will come to the same conclusion. And for one, I wait the result with the utmost faith. Deep and lasting is the hold which our principles frequently get upon young people, and it will not easily yield to a temporary interest in conflicting forms of amusement. But even if I am wrong, I still should desire each person to find his own sincere way to that sort of life which seems noblest and most complete to himself.

Let me conclude by contrasting two sorts of Queries and their effects. Do you avoid attendance at theatres, operas, dances and other harmful diversions? On hearing this one sort of person may feel satisfaction at mere absence from these indulgences; another may be made more rebellious and think, "No, I do not; and do not intend to avoid them." But suppose the language was something like this: "Are you careful to spend your leisure time in such pursuits as will not only recreate the mind and body, but will also make you more sensitive to the requirements of the Holy Spirit? This would lead neither to comfortable satisfaction nor to rebellion. It holds up a standard too high and too well recognized as reasonable to allow anyone to feel either satisfied or rebellious."

CARROLL T. BROWN.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

THE following is from Bulletin No. 14 of the National Council for Reduction of Armaments:—

The cool common sense of the nation is urging a policy of drastic economy upon your representatives on Capitol Hill. The Army and Navy appropriations constitute the only field where further economy is practicable. Therefore, while the Army Staff advocates the maintenance of the present force of 150,000 men, regardless of expense, and the Secretary of the Navy advocates a cut of not over 10,000 men in the Navy personnel, our Congressmen are debating, not whether these recommendations should be carried out, but how great a cut will satisfy the taxpayers, and yet in their judgment insure protection to the country.

HOW FAR TO CUT.

With regard to the Army, the question has narrowed down practically to a difference of opinion as between an Army of 75,000 men and an Army of 100,000, or thereabouts. With regard to the Navy, the figures run between 50,000 and 80,000. A Navy of more than 80,000 men or an Army running much over 100,000 men is not even being considered seriously.

We support the 50 per cent. cut in the appropriations, from $700,000,000 to $400,000,000 for the two arms of defence, and leave it to our Congressmen to allocate this sum according to their own judgment. We maintain that this reduction is not excessive at this time for the following reasons:

1. When the treaties have been ratified, universal testimony affirms that war between America and Japan will have been made, humanly speaking, impossible during the life of the Naval Holiday.

2. Allowing for 60 per cent. inflation in the cost of living, $400,000,000 now is the equivalent of $250,000,000 before the war.

3. The 50 per cent. saved is needed for other things. Business men want taxes reduced and the money liberated for business uses. Farmers, Labor, Educators, the Organized Women have been seeking money from Congress in vain for the constructive uses of peace.

4. The 5-5-5 ratio is a maximum and not a minimum. No nation is under obligation to spend on armaments the entire sum permitted by the treaties.

5. Every civilized country will immediately be compelled by the burden of taxation to follow our example in economy on armaments. Reports from London indicate that England is reluctant to build the two battleships permitted her by the treaty. France looks to us for more convincing arguments than moral precepts.

WILL THE TREATIES BE RATIFIED?

All of us are watching the Senate to see if it will nullify the work of the Conference or finish what has been so well begun. Present indications are that the treaties will all be ratified. The American people want the Conference to succeed. A reservation interpreting the Four-Power Pact is likely at this writing. Watch the papers and if doubt arises as to the fate of any of them, let your Senators know your interest in the issue.

THE CONFERENCE AND PEACE.

JAPANESE PREMIER LOOKS FORWARD TO TOTAL DISARMAMENT.

"The Imperial Government . . . believes with the other Powers that the present agreements are the first step toward realization of a real and lasting peace, and that such agreements will grow in the future even into an understanding for the total abolition of defense equipments."—PREMIER TAKAHASHI, to the Japanese House of Peers, Second Month 7, 1922.

HOOVER'S COMMENT.

"The jeopardy of war has been most assuredly driven beyond our generation. . . . The points of friction between ourselves and Japan have been settled."—HERBERT HOOVER, at Chicago, Second Month 22, 1922.

POPE PIUS XI WILL WORK FOR PEACE.

"My one great desire is to help re-establish peace and harmony among all nations. The Conference at Washington accomplished much toward the pacification of the world. America has shown herself most unselfish both during and since the war."—POPE PIUS XI in a message to the American people, Second Month 8, 1922.

WHY IS THERE A FAMINE IN RUSSIA?

Famine is not a new thing in Russia, states Professor James Mavor, in a recent article in the Wall Street Journal; the government of Catherine II encountered the danger when the population of Russia was only a fraction of the present numbers. The Czarist government during the nineteenth century repeatedly encountered it, and did its best to deal with the distress it occasioned.

There are four reasons for a famine situation in any country, and perhaps least of all in Russia, apart from the variation of the seasons. These are:

- 1.—The rapid growth of population which renders necessary an increase in food beyond the temporary means of supply.

- 2.—Habitual self-containedness of the population involving the absence of commercial mechanism for the introduction of occasional necessary additions to the local supply of food.

- 3.—Inferior and primitive cultivation of peasant lands, resulting in absence of reserves of grain to insure against want in years of deficient crops.

- 4.—Absence of means of transportation elastic enough to admit a sudden increase of external food supply.

All these conditions existed in India, where for centuries famines have recurred with frequency. The British Government of India has always grappled with the question by means of railways, irrigation and administrative efficiency. The provision of casual and intermittent relief was found to be no final solution of the problem.

In China the same conditions exist and no Chinese government has ventured to supply the appropriate remedies.

In Russia, a deficiency of crops in certain districts and especially in those districts, such as Kazan and Saratov, which now are in a very desperate plight, has been a frequent occurrence. Even when an excess of grain was obtained in other regions, difficulty was always found in transporting supplies into the famine-stricken area because of the absence of adequate transportation facilities.

In those regions where the peasants have lived habitually with a slender margin between life and death the conditions have reached a limit which is appalling. The terrible incident of famine is not so much mere want as a disease to which lack of nutrition exposes the people. Typhus, cholera and what is usually called influenza become epidemic, and the influence of the famine is spread far beyond the region afflicted by the want of food.

Certainly humanity will render all possible relief. At the present English and American Quakers, and the American Relief Administration, are performing a remarkable service. Yet the difficulties are enormous. Russian relief is really a tragedy and the tragedy consists in the magnitude of the task in proportion to any possible means of accomplishing it.

THE RUSSIAN FAMINE—HOW TO HELP.

The Situation.—In the fall of 1920 the farmers of the Volga Valley planted their wheat and rye as usual. Then the drought commenced. No rain fell until the end of Seventh Month and no harvests were gathered. The result has been widespread suffering and starvation among 15,000,000 people, and 15,000,000 more are vitally affected by the shortage of food. To-day they are dying by the thousands. Fifteen million are absolutely dependent upon outside help.

America's Aid.—Congress has voted $20,000,000 to help save these desperate people who see death at every hand overwhelming them. The Americans' private subscriptions at the present time total $10,000,000. The Soviet Government is expending $10,000,000 in gold in this country for wheat and seed. But this total of $40,000,000 can only save 5,000,000 of the starving. Who will help save the other 10,000,000?

The Need.—There are only two American relief agencies working in the Russian famine area to-day—the American Relief Administration, of which Herbert Hoover is Chairman, and the American Friends' Service Committee. In spite of all that can be humanely done, Dr. Nansen estimates that 5,000,000 of these peasants will die before summer. The problem before the American people is the saving of the 5,000,000 others who have not yet been provided for, but who can be saved by a prompt and generous response. The American Friends' Service Committee will accept contributions for these famine victims.

Will You Give Corn?—The large crop of corn last year and its present low price make it possible for rural communities to save life by giving corn. Five bushels of corn will save the life of one of those hungry little waifs along the Volga. The Service Committee will accept carloads of shelled corn at any point, pay all the cost of transportation, convert the corn into hominy and grits and distribute it to the famine victims in Russia without any deduction. Six thousand elevators in the corn belt of our Central West have been appealed to for free service in receiving, shelling, storing and loading corn. They have responded nobly. Any person or organization interested in collecting corn for the famine sufferers is asked to notify the Service Committee at Philadelphia.

Will You Give Flour?—From people who do not have corn to give flour is asked. The American millers have been asked, and have generously agreed, to sell flour for Russian relief at cost. Every community should be able to raise a flour fund for famine relief. A barrel of flour will save a life. The Service Committee will accept flour at any point, pay all transportation cost, and distribute it in the famine area. Every pound of flour given in famine relief will mean a pound of food in Russia where children cry for a crust of bread. The Quakers are feeding in a definitely assigned area in the district of Buzuluk, which has been apportioned to them in conference with the American Relief Administration, and for which they are entirely responsible. These people are entirely dependent upon America's gifts, as no congressional aid will go toward these sufferers.

America can save these sufferers. Everyone should help. Somebody must lead in every community. Volunteers are needed to collect food and money to enable the Quaker volunteers in Russia to save some of the starving millions. If no one is collecting in your community, you are the one to do it. Write to-day to the Service Committee, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, for particulars and instructions.

SHIPMENTS received during week ending Third Month 4, 1922—106 boxes and packages received; 2 for German Relief.

Contributions received during week ending Third Month 6, 1922, $46,370.51.

THOMAS CHALKLEY'S CAUTION ON THE MINISTRY.

A true minister of Christ is to take no thought what to say, but in the same hour that which he should speak to the people, will be given him, that is, in a general way, and if it is not given from above, I believe he or she ought to be silent, for they receive freely, if they do receive anything from Christ and so they ought freely to administer; and where little is given, little is required, all which is plain from Christ's own words in the New Testament; and Christ's cross is to be taken up by His ministers in their preaching, as well as in their conversation.

When I first felt a necessity on me to preach the Gospel, I had but a few sentences to deliver, in great fear and tenderness, with some trembling, with which my brethren were generally satisfied and edified. After some time I felt a concern to preach the Gospel in other countries and to other nations, than that in which I was born, which to me, was a very great cross; but feeling the woe of the Lord to follow me in not giving up to it, after some time I took that cross up for Christ's sake and the Gospel's; and in taking it up I experienced the truth of the apostle's doctrine that: "The gospel of Christ is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." Thus through a continual labor and spiritual travel, I witnessed a growth in experience and an enlargement in expression and heavenly doctrine and my heart was mightily enlarged to run the ways of God's commandments, and divers were convinced and some, I hope, thoroughly converted, and many comforted, and God, through the ministry of His dear Son, glorified, who only is thereof worthy forever.

And, my friend, I find to this day, that it is safe for me when I am ministering to the people, when the Spring of Divine life and power, from which sound truths and edifying matter spring and flow into the heart, abates, or stops, to stop with it and sit down, and not to arise or speak publicly to the people without some spiritual impulse or moving and openings.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

We learn with much pleasure as this issue of THE FRIEND goes to press that Elizabeth B. Emmett, well known to a host of American Friends through her book, "The Story of Quakerism," is just leaving England for Philadelphia with her sister Anna Braithwaite Thomas. It is expected that with their sister, Mary Caroline Whitney, now a resident here, they will be in attendance at the Yearly Meeting.

WITHIN a few days there has come to us a copy of the printed minutes of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, held last autumn, at Woodland, N. C.

Possibly the two most outstanding features of this Yearly Meeting, as reflected in these minutes, are the close fellowship that seems to subsist throughout the membership, and the apparent lack of outside interests, that claim so great a share of the thought and financial support of the churches of to-day.

Parts of the minutes read like Paul's salutation to the Church at Philippi, but lack on the other hand the spirit of out-reaching service that characterized everything that came from Paul's hand.

We note, however, with satisfaction the strong effort being made for the abolishing of Capital Punishment in the State. There was also drafted a letter of approval addressed to some in authority at Washington.

Letters of loving greeting and of sound counsel had been received from at least two Friends outside the State, and these with the usual Epistles from various Yearly Meetings made an impressive feature of one session. A memorial of Abbie A. Hollowell, a gifted Minister, was produced. This dear Friend possessed a rare gift. The Committee commissioned with the preparation of the memorial have been fortunate in giving in brevity and simplicity the record of the life of one whose daily walk was the instrument, in a peculiarly winning way, of leading many to the Lord.

IN THE FRIEND for week before last we published the Annual Report of Cheyney Training School. In said report reference was made to several plans nearing completion which were of vital interest to the Institution. Within a few weeks the final transfer of title to the State of Pennsylvania has been effected and a cash payment of $75,000 has been made to the former Management.

Cheyney now ranks with all the other Normal Training Schools in the State, thirteen in all, and like them is under the supervision of nine Trustees appointed at Harrisburg. That the authorities at the Capitol have a full measure of confidence in the past management, witness the appointment of five members of the old Board, two women members, both Friends, and two colored men. The Trustees are James G. Biddle, David G. Yarnall, George Vaux, Jr., Richard S. Dewees, Samuel L. Smedley, Mary Fales Comfort, Martha G. Thomas, Dr. Tunnell and John Harris.

The Corporation of Cheyney will continue to administer the trust, but in order to avoid confusion, the original name being now assumed by the new Trustees, application will be made to have the charter title exchanged to the Richard Humphreys Foundation.

Richard Humphreys,—a Friend from the Island of Tortola, left by will the sum of $10,000, which was the foundation for the present School. This transaction occurred more than a decade prior to the war that freed the slaves and was the original step that resulted in the opening of the Institute for Colored Youth in Philadelphia, the first school of its kind and grade in the province, if not in the nation.

Philadelphia Friends may well congratulate the Management on the step that has just been taken, but we all need to be solicitous lest in the passing of this School from under the control of Friends, the interest in the higher education of Negroes may lose its hold upon us.

B. NIGHTINGALE, a Congregationalist, has recently published in England a book, "Early Stages of the Quaker Movement in Lancashire."

Written by one who has made very extensive research in fields akin to this and not in the least tinged with hereditary predilections, nor yet prejudiced against Friends, the book will be found to contain much of interest.

The following short extract from the Preface shows the spirit of the man toward his subject:

"What has especially impressed me in the study of seventeenth century religious history is the wealth of Quaker literature relating thereto and its value to the student, not merely because of the light which it throws upon the Quaker movement, but not less so upon non-conformist religious history in general. No student of that history can neglect it without the most serious loss. He will often find there the information of which he is in quest when it cannot be found elsewhere."

The following from the American Friend brings before us one known at least by name to many of our readers:

Third Month 12, 1922, marked the ninetieth birthday of Luke Woodard, minister, evangelist and author. It is unusual for one to write a book in his ninetieth year, but "A Panorama of Wonders" is the product of his pen at that age. In its ten chapters entitled "The Wonderful Book," "The Wonderful Event," "The Wonderful Man," etc., is found a clear delineation of the fundamentals of the Christian religion as he has taught them for sixty years. In the foreword the author explains that he wrote the book under the impression that being "no longer able, to any great extent, . . . to proclaim with the voice the glorious truths of the gospel, I should put them in permanent form," the prime object being to promote the cause of the Redeemer. The book is well-printed and neatly bound by Nicholson & Company, Richmond, Indiana, and contains a present-age portrait of the author. It may be obtained for $1.00 postpaid, from Luke Woodard, Fountain City, Indiana.

The Ancient Friends' Meeting House in Newport, Rhode Island, and the Meeting House Grounds are to be Sold

The Meeting House property at Newport, Rhode Island, having been offered for sale by the Trustees, and Rhode Island Monthly Meeting having approved of their action, a movement has been started by about 20 men and women to buy the property, and allow it to be used for a much-needed community centre. An option was secured on the property, which option soon expires, to purchase it for $28,000. The Newport Trust Company has agreed to loan $14,000 on mortgage, to be paid when the other $14,000 have been raised by subscription. Of this $14,000, eight thousand has been promised. Friends have been communicated with, so far as possible, and they approve without a dissenting voice and are contributing. The Committee is forming itself into a corporation, and the plan would be to preserve in its ancient appearance the oldest part of the Meeting House (1705) and that the whole property shall serve a useful and dignified purpose. As many Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting have worshiped in this house, it is hoped they will feel interested to subscribe. For further information consult

STANDARDS AND STANDARD-BEARERS.

A Friend who came from a distant State described the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of to-day as being "in a transition stage," founding this opinion upon his contact with a large group of our young people, and the varying opinions of their elders, as reflected in them.

A transition stage is hopeful or not as the transition is toward a higher or a lower state of existence. In itself it is not always a comfortable state, but one which requires a patient spirit, and a steady glance fixed on the goal. We may at times fully sympathize with the child who, disgusted by a crawling caterpillar, was heard to wish that "God would just finish that butterfly."

In the affairs of our Yearly Meeting, from year to year, there comes a time when it is felt by an individual whose "concern" extends to a meeting or a community, that our Discipline no longer accords with our practice;—that there may be needed a re-statement of some ancient truth which will more deeply impress it, or that it is a weakness to continue in its present form a Query to which the answers have become largely negative.

Then follows the serious question whether in adapting our Discipline to present practice, we shall be "lowering our standard."

Having recently been interested in an earnest discussion of such a question, the writer has since been thinking of standards and standard-bearers. The definition which most accords with our Friendly use of the word is "something elevated as a signal or beacon," and when those of us who have a backward glance across the years think of "the standard-bearers," we recall men and women whose lives were in full belief and accord with those "minor testimonies," which we seem now to be laying aside. Not that they were always accepted without a spiritual struggle, but we can bear testimony to a calm and joyful allegiance to them when accepted and again repeat, with Whittier—

"The blessed Master none can doubt, Revealed in holy lives."

But while loyalty is always a beautiful trait of character, and spiritual loyalty a noble virtue, the years of the great war have taught us how futile is any enforced loyalty and how our regard for any symbol depends upon its highest interpretation.

"I have always loved my country's flag," said a Friend to me a few years ago. "It was always beautiful to me. But now it means War." And we know that a shallow and mistaken "Patriotism" has been proclaimed under its shelter.

Only last year, in William Penn's own loved State, a family of children has been sent away from school because the parents, true to their Mennonite faith, could not feel it right for them to join the others in "saluting the flag."

Feeling, then, that the standard-bearers must be loyal to the banner they hold aloft before the world, if they are found faithful in the conflict, and that this is just as true in the spiritual sense as in the outward,—what is our right course?

We love the wisdom of George Fox in saying to the young Penn, about his sword, "Wear it so long as thou canst!" Yet we cannot always think of our sons as William Penns; or our daughters as Elizabeth Frys, turning from a careless, frivolous girlhood to a life of entirely consecrated service. We know there are so many "broken tethers;" so many young lives swept away from safe foundations by the craving for excitement; and thoughtful people of all religious denominations recognize that some of the popular amusements bear a character, and are carried to an excess which has never been known before in the history of our country.

Yet we Friends have had along with all this, unmistakable proof of the fidelity of our young "standard-bearers" to what they feel to be the vital principle of Christianity.

Again and again we have marvelled to see them bearing what we could perhaps not have borne in the cause of Peace. In military camps, as conscientious objectors; as our ambassadors of good-will in the war-wasted countries; in many lines of Christian service they have worked, and are still working, in a spirit which has made the name of "Quaker" known and loved where it had never been heard before.

Frankness and honesty are strongly characteristic of our young people to-day. If they cannot conform to the standards of their elders, they do not seek to conceal it, but rather freely to put before us their reasons.

If, then, they seem to us restless or dissatisfied, inclined to revolutionary or radical measures,—unappreciative of what seems to us good—may we not think of this as a "transition stage?" Whoever has watched a butterfly emerge from its chrysalis knows what a long and painful process it appears. Bit by bit the wings unfold as the creature works itself out of its tight shell, and the sun must shine long upon them before they show their true colors and begin to expand, ready for flight.

May we not hope, that through some such "transition stage" our Yearly Meeting is working its way toward an honesty of purpose, a faithfulness to new manifestations of the everlasting Truth, which shall bind us together, older and younger, in loving loyalty to the great Captain of our salvation?

YEARLY MEETING.

The near approach of our Yearly Meeting brings prayerful question and searching of spirit for ourselves and our group. The times are so momentous, the doors opening on every hand, the opportunities for service are so varied and urgent; where shall we enter? Which way shall we choose? The call of missions, the needs of the oppressed of other races, the problems of our social order, the invitation to co-operation with other Christian churches, the great cause of international peace and many other interests will claim our thought and sympathy and demand decision as to co-operation or the refusal of it.

How shall we be able to meet and rightly deal with these matters? Let us answer by another question, what is the primary function of our Yearly Meeting? Is it not to draw us into spiritual fellowship under the great Head of the Church and to quicken and strengthen the spiritual life among us in order that we may be fitted for even greater service as individuals and as a Society, in helping to bring the Kingdom of God and the good tidings of Jesus Christ to a world in sore need of the message? If this be so, then waiting humbly, sincerely, and earnestly for the guidance of the Master is first and most essential. But following upon this waiting comes the duty of carrying out His bidding. In the past Friends have often been fearless and unflinching in following the call of duty. We must not be untrue to our tradition. This is no time for a timid caution or a halting service or for looking back, but for courage, devotion and faith. God needs men and women with faces forward, with shoulders squared and with hearts aflame with love for Him and His service.

"They must upward still and onward,
Who would keep abreast of truth."

May we in the coming Yearly Meeting so unitedly and devoutly seek Him that we may find Him in yet fuller blessing, who is ever ready to respond to our need and desire; and may we be living epistles of His purpose and message, who is waiting to use all, even these least, who are ready to run His errands and follow His leading.

"And the Lord said unto Moses, speak to the children of Israel that they go forward."

THE PASTORAL SYSTEM.

What is the Pastoral System as known among Friends? In some quarters, it is quite customary to hear expressions of condemnation of a co-called "Pastoral System." In order to ascertain what is condemned, let us resort to some authoritative explanation of what is meant by such a system. The apostle Paul in sundry places refers to the pastoral gift in terms of commendation. We do not oppose the recognition of the pastoral gift as understood by Paul. Bearing this in mind, let us endeavor to learn what are the duties of a pastor as prescribed by the Discipline of the Five Years' Meeting where this system among Friends has its chief adherents.

This Discipline is divided into four parts. At the end of Part I various spiritual gifts are described, among which we find the following explanation of the pastoral gift.

"There is also a pastoral gift, which consists especially in ability to do personal work with individuals or with families. This gift fits the possessor of it to comfort those who mourn, to lead the members into a closer religious life, to arouse in the young an interest in the things of the spirit, and to impress others with a sense of the scope and reality of the spiritual life. It is the gift of shepherding and feeding the flock."

These duties are very similar to those enjoined upon the Overseers by the Philadelphia Discipline. We recognize that such helpful gift often accompanies a gift in the ministry, for as the Discipline of the Five Year's Meeting states, various gifts "are frequently united in one person, who is thus peculiarly qualified for helpful service." We believe no concerned Friends can entertain any serious objection to this definition of the pastoral work.

But we have not concluded our examination. In Chapter V of Part II we find the following section: "The Ministers, Elders and Overseers of each congregation constitute its Pastoral Committee. The Monthly Meeting may appoint other members to co-operate with them in this work." This Pastoral Committee in each Monthly Meeting constitutes the Local Meeting of Ministry and Oversight. There is nothing radically wrong with this arrangement. No vital principle is affected. It is a mere matter of detail. Many Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting are ready for the admission of Overseers to the Meeting of Ministers and Elders. Meetings are to be held once each month, not once in three months. "It is the duty of this Committee to have a general oversight of the shepherding of the flock, to be watchful of the interests of absent members, to visit the families of attenders of meetings, to extend a special care to those attenders who are not members, and to invite them to join in membership when they are prepared to do so. They shall extend a watchful care over the Associate members, and encourage them to become Active members so soon as they are prepared to do so."*

We now come to a crucial point in this discussion. In Chapter XII of Part II, there is a section which provides for the appointment of ministers for special service. "When particular meetings feel the need for the special service of ministers, the initiative therefor shall be taken by the Pastoral Committee of the congregation. They shall submit their proposal to the Monthly Meeting for its action. Such ministers shall carry on their labors in harmony with the principles of the denomination and agreeably to the provisions of this Constitution and Discipline, taking care that, in all meetings for worship, opportunity be afforded for the free exercise by the members of the congregation of any gifts of service which the Lord may confer."

This section sanctions the appointment of a minister for continuous religious service within the limits of the Monthly Meeting, but distinctly does not require him to monopolize the exercises during the time of public worship. There must be opportunity for the free exercise of gifts in all meetings for worship. Baltimore Yearly Meeting adds this note to the section which has just been quoted. "Gospel Ministry ought not, in our apprehension, to be demanded at stated times of human appointment, but it should be exercised in that ability which God giveth on the occasion. . . . The servants of Christ who labor in the ministry are to be highly esteemed for their work's sake, and when they leave their outward vocations, at His call, to preach the Gospel, their outward wants should be cheerfully supplied, if needful; yet we consider the gift of the ministry to be of so sacred a nature that its exercise should never be placed, either by ministers or by congregations, upon a financial basis." This clear note of Baltimore Yearly meeting supplements, but does not oppose, the section providing for the special appointment of ministers. Since we grant that ministers, and other concerned Friends, may be rightfully called to religious service in foreign lands, may it not also be conceded that ministers may feel a call to devote years in the service of the Master in our own land? While so engaged, it is reasonable to expect that their human needs and the needs of their families should be amply supplied. George Fox spent all his mature years in proclaiming the Gospel at home and abroad. It does not appear that at any time he lacked

*Children born in families where both parents are Friends have been termed Associate Members since 1902. When they shall have made a "credible profession of faith in Jesus Christ . . . and shall have accepted the doctrines of the Gospel as held by Friends," they are enrolled as Active Members in full membership. However, the subject of Birthright Membership is not related to the Pastoral System.

money or a decent outfit, yet his parents and relatives were people of quite moderate circumstances. We may properly infer that his followers were reasonably liberal with contributions to maintain this valiant preacher of righteousness.

While there is no direction that Monthly Meetings shall appoint a minister for special service, but only such meetings as "feel the need," it appears that most meetings of the Yearly Meetings composing the constituencies of The Five Years' Meetings, do "feel the need," since generally those meetings have secured the services of such a minister, who is usually termed the "pastor." Hence the term, The Pastoral System. It is a serious matter when one man regulates all the activities of a congregation, or assumes the responsibility for the execution of all the functions of the church. There may be some danger that the overseers, whose duties are pastoral, will allow these duties to be discharged by the one man under appointment to shepherd the flock. That pastor is the more successful who sees to it that individual members are not idlers and that the democratic methods, providing for individual responsibility, which have obtained from the rise of the Society, are fully maintained. The remuneration, or the salaries offered, afford slight encouragement to a professional ministry. Many of the so-called pastors have left profitable business to engage in a service whose earthly rewards are scarcely a step from abject poverty. They cannot be said "to preach for hire and divine for money." Many young men, of high ability, have given up good business offers, feeling that the Lord was calling them to special work in the spread of the Gospel.

The chief danger, as apprehended by many Friends, is in the tendency to establish a stated form or program of public worship. Such practice is distinctly discouraged in the section, already quoted, which provides for the appointment of a special minister; however, in actual practice, it may be stated that the agenda for the exercises of the meeting for worship are usually prepared in advance. To some Friends such a program does not appear to be in accordance with our long-established theories of the nature of public worship. There are various angles of approach to this subject, and for the present we forbear further discussion, except to state that it is quite probable that Friends have been slack in recognizing the gift of the Ministry of instruction and of exposition.

The Apostle Paul recognizes with approval the gifts of Pastor, Preacher, Evangelist and other gifts. Personally I feel some hesitation in denouncing a Pastoral System any more than a system that involves the appointment of Ministers, Elders or Overseers. I may properly criticize a ritualistic, or pre-arranged form of public worship, but that is not an essential part of the Pastoral System. In fact, the freedom of all to take part in public worship is distinctly authorized in the section of the Discipline which provides for the special service of ministers. The various meetings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting would be helped by an enlargement of pastoral work.

It is a mistake to assume that the Pastoral System involves the idea of a commercialized profession or of ritualistic worship, and this conclusion is supported by the citations made in this article from the Discipline of the Five Years' Meeting. It is not denied that in recent years some practices have crept in which appear subversive of some of the principles of our Religious Society, but in offering our affectionate admonitions, let us be careful to use appropriate terms.

ALBERT H. VOTAW.

THE EXPERIMENT OF ECCLES.

[This item comes to us from Charles S. Taylor of Haverford.]

In 1916-17 occurred the celebrated "Eccles Experiment." Eccles is a city in the English County of Lancashire and contains 41,000 residents, of whom the majority are workers in factories making cotton goods or machinery. In such English cities almost all children leave school at the earliest permitted age, fourteen years, for the parents need the income which the children can earn. Hitherto in the highest classes the only language taught the children has been French; but because of the short period during which it can be taught, many think, that from an educational view-point the time devoted to the incomplete instruction is lost because the scholar hardly ever continues the study and does not use the language at all after school days.

An eminent British educator, Dr. Scougal, royal chief inspector of schools in Scotland, called attention to Esperanto as an important educational appliance, and recommended, that in schools where scholars have to leave at the age of 14, Esperanto be taught as the only language, not including the parent tongue, since it can be taught entirely in one school year period, and after that the scholar possesses something which he can use to some purpose.

Other eminent educators in Britain also have recommended Esperanto, especially Professor J. E. B. Mayor, of Trinity College, Cambridge, a very well-known professor of Latin, who has praised it as a help to the learning of other languages, and Professor Gilbert Murray, of the University of Oxford, professor of Greek, who has said, "the situation in Europe after the war quadruples the need for a common instrument of communication between the peoples and I think that there does not exist a more profitable method for a man to well employ his free time, than by learning Esperanto."

The educational experiment in Eccles well justifies the assertions of those eminent educators.

Two hundred children were taught Esperanto in the four highest classes of the school, "Green Lane Council School," and after only six months' instruction the scholars were able to read the language fluently, to write it from dictation almost without error, to write letters in it with comparative facility, and to talk and answer questions with a good degree of fluency.

The children at the beginning did not use a text-book. The instructress dictated to them the words to be learned, rules, anecdotes, etc. As a text-book the scholar received "Gulliver in the land of the Lilliputians." Conversation between the scholars was encouraged, and after a few lessons the children briskly responded to questions, and between themselves asked and answered in the class. That the children voluntarily used the language was certain from the words of the children on the playground which one could hear.

After two months the children began to correspond with children in other lands, and from their correspondents learned much about countries, customs, etc.

Urged on by the enthusiasm of the children, the royal inspector of schools learned Esperanto himself.

ONE ALONE.

God and one alone can weld the broken world anew;

The miracle of mending is perfection in the few.

Union is wrought when God Himself fuses the iron thru—

In Syria Elisha cleansed one.

Whether men kill from the will to rule or from hope to free the slaves,

Faith in bloodshed chains their souls down to the dead in graves,

Loyalty to the false in these is treason to Christ who saves

By Truth, the Freedom of God.

God sends an army of only one the hating mob to meet;

Till humbled by love the haters come, rejoicing in defeat;

Thus does a priest of truth alone make tyrant nations sweet

As the gentle Lamb saying "Come."

There is glory in the union of Father and of Son,

Atonement is a harmony it is death to shun,

It shortens fires, slack and cold, so the life of God can run

To the intense glow of the cross.

CRITICISM, in the common sense of looking for faults, is ordinary enough, but the true criticism is appreciation—the power of discovering what is worthy.—G. CURRIE MARTIN.

FRIENDLY AMBASSADOR OR MISSIONARY.

THOMAS E. JONES.

In Japan one is often faced with the question of how most effectively to meet the needs of this rapidly changing country and of how to find a nomenclature that will apply to the work one is trying to do. It is difficult to realize the rapidity with which the reading public and the student class are changing in Japan. One often hears it stated that the student body in this country has changed more during the last two years than it did during the preceding twenty years, and that this is a reflection of a change passing over the whole country. If this is true it calls for a re-examination of our whole missionary ideal and approach. One must ask, Have the forces working for the Christianizing of this country kept pace with its rapidly changing society? The proverbial reluctance of the church to keep up with the advance of social ideals may apply to missions and churches in Japan as well as other countries. With renewed urgency, therefore, we are compelled to face the questions: What do we consider our mission in the country? and what do the Japanese consider it? In view of present circumstances, what is the most effective way to attain the object of that mission? And what can we and the world at large hope for as some results of an adjusted program of work? Answers to these questions will be attempted from the student point of view, although I believe the same thought is reflected in an ever-growing public opinion.

In the first place, let us take a brief review of what we have considered our mission in Japan. (I am speaking of general attitudes only, not particular cases.) We have considered ourselves prophets of a God omnipotent in prestige and power, who will judge the "Quick and the Dead," a God of love, who is at the same time a God of wrath. We have come as heralds of this coming King, who will demand a reckoning of the saved and the lost. We have come as agents "sent to snatch the brands from the burning." We have come with a "call." We have been clear regarding our message and status before leaving our homes. We have come, completed, consecrated or even sacrificed to the Lord's using. We have left all on earth that we prized as dear, home, family, friends and institutions, for what we consider an unknown world. Days, weeks or years have separated us from our homes in time, and centuries have separated us in custom and environment. Such a conception of mission, while noble and heroic, has tended to put us in an uncompromising and dogmatic frame of mind. And let me say here that I do not wish to disparage the "call" or work of missionaries in the past. Who can read the pages of missionary history and biography or observe the practical results of such work without being deeply impressed? And, furthermore, much of this good work is continuing, and the lives of these consecrated men and women are still having their effect. But there is another side to the question. It is one that is especially noticeable in Japan. It is about this other side of the question that I wish to write in this article. I say we missionaries, because I include myself. We are all more or less caught in the traditional missionary system and philosophy. For most of us, perhaps, subconsciously, but nevertheless truly, our philosophy has run something like this: We know the truth and have given our lives for it. Those to whom we have come do not know it and have done nothing for it. We are apostles "sent," they are Gentiles to receive. Our commission is to speak, theirs to listen; ours to command, theirs to obey; ours to administer, theirs to serve.

In past years the Japanese have been willing to work in harmony with such a point of view. Schooled in feudal respect for authority, both in education and government, and fearfully aware of the foreigners' superiority in economics and sciences, many Japanese have tended to look to the foreigner. They have called him "sensei" (beloved teacher), and have followed with blind devotion. (Or, on the other hand, with equal naïveté, they have thought the foreigner a spy, who would work some sort of disaster to the Japanese nation. Generally speaking, the missionary has been both loved and feared by the community. At all events, he has not been regarded indifferently. He has counted for something. He has been a force which the Japanese could not ignore. His teachings, customs, and life have been interesting because they represented a whole world beyond the Japanese Empire. It was a world Japan wanted to know and surpass in power and prestige. The missionary has been sought on all sorts of occasions. The externals as well as the deeper meanings of western civilization have been his to give, and the Japanese have demanded them. A "General Missionary" has been the thing, the more general, the better. A specialist would have been out of place or at least counted for little in proportion to his training.

In more recent years, however, there has grown up a tendency neither to hate nor to adore the missionary. In some cases he seems rather to be tolerated or ignored. The trappings of western civilization have been learned or are being taught by moving pictures, books, business men, and travelers. The missionary has ceased to be an indispensable interpreter of the west. Again, the general level of education has been markedly raised, so that the missionary is no longer looked upon as a scholar of exceptional merit. In our comparatively small town of Mito, Ibaraki Ken, there are a Ph. D. from Harvard, a graduate from the Universities of Chicago and Columbia, and several physicians and others who have studied in the universities of Europe and America. When authoritative opinions are wanted, by large groups of people, these men are usually asked to speak in preference to the missionary. Gradually, but surely, it seems he is coming to occupy the same place in the Japanese community that the little parson around the corner does in America. He is coming to be regarded as a religionist and an idealist. He may preach his panaceas or denunciations, but the world moves along in its same old scramble for bread and brass. It has been very difficult for the missionary to comprehend the character or extent of this change. He is aware that they may work incredibly long hours and pray an incredibly great deal, but the attendance at the morning meeting for worship remains its scanty forty or fifty, while the most recent "movie star," musical concert, or street side-show attracts its hundreds or thousands. Before this whole new world of changing values and prestige, the missionary stands none the less devout or determined, but increasingly powerless to make his efforts visibly count.

What is to be done about it? How can the missionary of the future attain the object for which he gives his life in coming to this country? Our method of approach must be changed. Testimony to this fact was brought out in three entirely different discussions by representative Japanese this summer. The first was by a group of university students, most of whom were Christians or near-Christians attending a Bible conference in the mountains. They pointed out that the chief characteristic of the future missionary must be sympathy. He must be willing to "talk things over" with his followers. This is due to the fact that a real wave of democratic feeling is passing through the student body and beginning to influence public opinion. These students do not know the meaning or limitations of democracy yet, but they are sure of one of its doctrines. That is, they do not wish to be "dictated to or dogmatized at." They wish to believe a thing or do a thing, not because they are told to do so, but because it appeals to their intelligences and hearts. I am amazed to find how readily and keenly students are coming to disagree with their college professors. The missionary of the future cannot rely upon his position as a foreigner, teacher, or even an "Apostle sent" to convince the Japanese. He must possess real merit as a leader or teacher. He must be the kind of man who could lead effectively his own people. He must be an expert, a specialist, or an outstanding man. Unfortunately such men find so many calls at home that Mission Boards can scarcely persuade them to go abroad. These students recognized this fact, but maintained that such a condition no less proved the validity of their contention. They pointed out that the possession of a "call" is not sufficient reason for sending a man to the mission field. Perhaps the Student Volunteer Movement and the Mission Boards have attached such importance to this qualification that other requirements have been overlooked. To be sure, belief in the Christian message and in the power of Christ is necessary to effective work, just as belief in one's business or country's administration is necessary for an effective salesman or ambassador. But with belief in one's message and the power behind it goes a knowledge of men and an inclination to understand the other person's point of view.

HOW THE FRAGRANCE SPREAD.

We, too, had read about the shy and elusive trailing arbutus and had talked about it, and had wondered if by some happy chance we might find its hiding-place and have one more fragrant memory to look back to from the years to come. Our friend, the nature lover, who tramped the woods for birds and flowers, said there had been many botany classes and that if it had ever bloomed in our woods he thought it was now quite extinct—yet he had found it, some miles away, near one of the little-frequented drives in Idora Park. When we went there we found other things, the rock-caves and the tall dark pines, and the rush and roar of the water as it came down near the old abandoned mill, but never the flower we longed to see.

One of my friends, who is a stenographer in a lawyer's office, said the trailing arbutus grew in one spot near Willow Grove Park, and that a young man had brought her a spray he had obtained by bringing the plant indoors and giving it light and warmth, it had blossomed even earlier than nature intended.

But our arbutus came another way. A few young friends in New York went forth to gather it, and sent quite a fine box full to their friends in Ohio, and in their home I first found it, and shared their joy in the pale pink flowers, the shining leaves, and the delightful fragrance. They shared their treasures with me, and as I carried them home, I showed them to our neighbors, one of whom, remembering her school-days, said, "We used to hunt for them." And the minister said, "Our parents used to find it in the mountains," so we each remembered some glad springtime, when we too were young; when we wondered about the pot of gold at the rainbow's end and the other dreams.

I sent a few of mine to our daughter who works in a big city, and who remembers how we discovered America, years and years after Columbus and the others discovered it, by tramping among the fields and forests of long ago.

And there were others who saw perhaps for the first time the trailing arbutus. So the fragrance born in the New York hills, and gathered and sent to friends here, and shared with us and with our friends spread and its influence widened. It is always so with kind deeds everywhere.

WEDDED IN PRISON.

MAUDE ROBINSON.

Horsham gaol was a large mansion looking out on to the Carfax, or central square of the town, and Ambrose secured a good room with a large window, barred indeed, but looking out on to a plot of grass. The group of Friends in Horsham visited him freely, and he began to fill his time working at his useful trade of saddlery. It is believed that Monthly Meetings were held in his room, or the minutes were copied by him, for many of the old records of the time are in the exquisitely neat handwriting of Ambrose Rigge.

At that barred window, on many summer evenings might be seen a group of eager listeners, as the young Quaker minister standing within, preached to them sermons which brought not a few into the fold of Christ.

Several times Captain Luscombe and Mary came on horseback to Horsham to cheer the captive, ever hoping that some change in the law might lead to his release, but none came.

Meanwhile the Hurst Quakers were more rigorously persecuted, and one day Ambrose looking from his window, saw Captain Luscombe and Mary, both brought handcuffed to the gaol. Refusing title was their offence. The Captain's sentence was but for three months; Mary's being for a larger amount due from her own farm, was for six months. Gladly did Ambrose share his room with the Captain, and Mary could be with them cheering both with her sweet helpfulness. To the old man accustomed to sea winds, the airlessness of the prison was very trying. At night Mary had to share the women's ward with half a dozen women of the roughest sort, for no other room was to be had, and she suffered more than she ever let her father and lover guess from this arrangement.

Many were the consultations as to what was best to do, and when the time drew near for the father's release, he proposed to the young couple that they should be married in prison. Ambrose's heart thrilled with joy. "But would it be legal?" he asked. "As legal as any of the Friends' marriages which are taking place every week. The priests try to keep all weddings in their hands, but if you take each other before sufficient witnesses, it cannot be denied that your marriage is a right one."

So it was arranged. From all the country round came Friends and crowded round the barred window on the gaol green. Just within stood bride and bridegroom, with parents, brothers and sisters, and after a solemn silence, and earnest prayer from a "public Friend" in the waiting group without, Ambrose and Mary in loud, clear voices made their promise of loving faithfulness until their lives' end.

Together the wedded prisoners settled down, mutually helpful, until the day when Mary's term of imprisonment was up. But even then she would not leave her husband. Free to come and go, she went in and out of the gaol, taking comforts, books, and the materials for his saddler work,—attending meetings and carrying his messages of encouragement to many sorely persecuted Friends.

Their eldest child was born in the prison, and time dragged on until Ambrose had been nine years in close confinement with less and less hope of release. But help was at hand.

George Whitehead, when visiting Friends in Sussex, saw the patient prisoner, and determined to win his freedom if possible. He obtained an interview with King Charles, and a royal pardon, but it was not until six months later that all formalities were finished and Ambrose stood on the Gaol Green a free man.

George Whitehead wrote: "He would often mention my part in his release with cheerful and grateful acknowledgment, for Ambrose Rigge was of a loving and grateful spirit and temper and not apt to forget acts of kindness."

The Rigges made their home at Horsham for a while, and then at Gatton, near Reigate, where Ambrose taught a school, and was accused of being a Jesuit by the enlightened rector, who persistently spoiled his goods for tithes and church rates.

But never again did prison doors close on the worthy man, until at a good old age he was laid to rest in the burial-ground at Reigate Meeting House, where the great wild-cherry tree yearly spreads its white petals on the nameless graves of so many who had suffered for the truth's sake.

THE good man walks unswervingly, being very well persuaded that all things are managed consummately well, and that progress to what is better goes on in the case of souls that have chosen virtue, till they come to the Good itself, to the Father's vestibule, so to speak, close to the great High Priest. Such is our Christian, faithful, persuaded that the affairs of the universe are managed in the best way. Particularly, he is well pleased with all that happens. In accordance with reason, then, he asks for none of those things in life required for necessary use; being persuaded that God, who knows all things, supplies the good with whatever is for their benefit, even though they do not ask.—CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA.

A FRIENDS' MEETING AT OAKLAND.

[Anna Walton of Philadelphia, now visiting in California, sends us the following.—Eds.]

On First-day, Second Month 12th, a meeting of unusual interest was held by Oakland Friends in the Extension Room of the Y. W. C. A., their present place of gathering.

Our Friend, Robert William Clark, well known as a worker in Alien Enemy Camps in England, had made a list of those in or near San Francisco, Oakland and Berkeley who have membership or close association with the Society of Friends, and had sent cordial letters of invitation to some eighty such persons. Somewhat over sixty attended the morning meeting, including a few Friends from San José, and about eighty partook of the lunch served by Oakland Friends and were at the afternoon gathering.

The morning meeting was a time of devout worship in which gathered spirits were drawn to each other and toward the source of Light and Life. Wm. C. Allen, Elizabeth H. Shelley (Isaac Sharp's daughter), Lydia B. Cox and Donald Erskine spoke with a unity of exercise which was felt to be enforced by the fellowship of silence in the assembly.

The interval was a very social time, friends meeting friends, some whose parents had long since been closely associated; a number of English residents adding interest.

The pastor and some others from Friends' Church in Berkeley came in the afternoon.

At the afternoon session, after a devotional opening, Russian Relief, Poland's need of sheep and the present call to support the national Anti-Lynching bill were presented. Anna Brinton then conducted the program on Reminiscences of Friends' Secondary Schools. Anna Walton gave a brief introductory outline of the object and founding of these, Ackworth and Westtown especially. About twenty-five old scholars from the latter live around the bay and a good number of the former, also two Sidcot old scholars. Moses Brown School and the Boarding schools at Barnesville, Ohio, and Pickering, Canada, were reported. Wm. C. James conducted a lively symposium of experiences of Westtown old scholars and Evelyn Rosher and her young brothers, who with a sister were triplets recently at Ackworth, delighted their hearers with tales of training, sports, voluntary Natural History excursions, investigations and diaries in which their school excels. These were followed by memories of an Ackworth scholar of about 1850, which picturesquely contrasted the old time with the new.

Regret was expressed that the young Friend who was to represent George School was not present and that the speaker for Vermillion Academy had to leave before making his report.

The afternoon was one of those social-religious occasions so characteristic of and so essential to a Quaker community.

One could not help feeling that there is a place and a need among this group of that which a Friends' meeting alone can fully supply, and though its regular attendance may be small, since distances and pressure of life are felt, it will be a centre of spiritual life and a gathering place of hungering hearts.

Nearly eight years ago a Friends' meeting was organized in Berkeley, California, by a small group of Friends of both branches, living in and near San Francisco.

For a few months they met in San Francisco, but for more than seven years the meetings have been held every First-day morning without intermission in various rooms rented for the purpose in Oakland, and changed from time to time, as became necessary.

In the midst of a population of about a million people there is no other place of worship where meetings are held after the manner of early Friends, and if this meeting is to continue and furnish a centre for Friends and Friendly influences in the community, it seems almost imperative that it should have a permanent home. Hence its members are making active efforts to acquire means to build a small meeting house.

They have already collected and promised about $3500.00. A visiting Friend who attended the meetings last summer has given $500.00 and offers $1000.00 more, if enough can be raised within the very near future, to make the sum $6000.00.

Being but a small group, and believing there is a real need here for a meeting that may fill a great want, they are asking the help of other Friends.

Should any of our readers desire to follow up this matter they should communicate with Charles E. Cox, 855 Chapman Street, San José, California.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

NEW WAR WEAPONS.

Five new weapons of war were tried in the recent World War,—blockades, tanks, aircraft, gas and submarines. Two of these were considered by the Conference at Washington and outlawed, submarines and poison gas. The agreement reached was, however, limited to only five nations. Consequently, a new conference is being planned with the purpose of making this agreement universal. Our government is left at liberty to call the conference wherever and whenever it seems best. Two jurists are to be appointed by each of the nations participating in the Washington Conference. They are to report to their own governments which will, if they approve, take steps "to secure consideration of its recommendations by other civilized powers."

WHAT THE NATIONAL COUNCIL FOR LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS IS DOING.

THE ONE RIPE PROBLEM OF OUR TIME.

Organization and education, step by step, each year contributing progress toward the clearly-seen goal will bring the success hitherto denied. This problem, and this problem alone, is ripe for settlement in our time. We must be definite. We must be practical. We must be patient. We must stick together. We must be tolerant where we differ on details. Common sense and the highest idealism alike support our position. The thing just now is to urge untidily the measures on which we agree. But stand ready against reaction. Brace against the back wash!

WHAT ARE YOU DOING FOR THE CAUSE?

New York Council Active.

The New York Council for Limitation of Armaments, after five months of fruitful activity under the direction of Ruth Morgan as Chairman and Mary Childs Nerney as Secretary, is continuing and extending its work. From its motor parade on Armistice Day to the recent publication of an excellent pamphlet on the Far East for study groups it has shown a resourcefulness and a readiness to do whatever needed to be done that merit the highest praise. "It is believed that there is not a single small town up-state which has not received some of our literature." "Approximately 175,000 pieces of literature have been distributed." The New York Council, among other things, has pushed the animated cartoon, "What's the Limit?"

Massachusetts Council Formed.

The Massachusetts Branch of the National Council for Reduction of Armaments has just been formed in Boston. It will extend the organization in Massachusetts "Back to the Grass Roots." Its Executive Board includes Dean Lewis of Amherst Agricultural College, E. Talmadge Root, Secretary of the State Federation of Churches, Professor Felix Frankfurter, Lucia Ames Mead, and Lawrence Higgins. Mass meetings are being arranged under its auspices in various parts of the State.

County Councils Organizing.

Some counties are finding a county organization more practicable than community organizations. The Loudoun (Va.)

County Council for Limitation of Armaments has now been a going concern for nearly three months. The editors of all of the County papers are on its publicity board. The County Treasurer speaks for it from the economic standpoint. Ex-service men pass the plate at its meetings. Traveling men who do business in that part of Virginia report Loudoun County to be more intelligent on the subject of the Washington Conference than any other section they visit.

Bucks County, Pennsylvania, held a meeting Second Month 26th to form a Bucks County Council for Reduction of Armaments.

EVER since the war the churches have had a great deal of adverse criticism because they have not shown the increase in membership expected as a result of whatever spiritual impetus resulted from the war. Yet, from statistics just given out by the Secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, it would seem as if the adverse criticism had been, to say the least, hasty. It appears that the total membership in all religious bodies in the United States is almost 46,000,000, an increase of over 4,000,000 in five years.

The Roman Catholic Church leads with a membership of nearly 18,000,000. Of the Protestant churches, the thirty bodies related to the Federal Council of Churches have nearly 20,000,000 members.

As to the various denominations, the Baptists have now passed the Methodists in membership, the Baptists numbering over 7,800,000 against a Methodist membership of nearly 7,800,000. Third in rank come the Lutheran bodies, with a membership exceeding 2,400,000. Fourth come the Presbyterians, with nearly 2,400,000.

Practically all of the major religious faiths, the report reads, have made a gain, except the Unitarians (who show a loss of some 30,000 as compared with the 1916 figures), one of the minor Methodist bodies, and the so-called "Churches of God in North America."

The Salvation Army, with a reported membership of nearly 36,000, shows an increase of only 65 persons over 1916.

As a final summary, the report concludes, during the past five years an average of 2,173 persons have joined the various churches of America every day.—From the Outlook.

HOME LETTERS FROM CANTON.

[Morris Wistar Wood was graduated from the University of Pennsylvania last summer as a mechanical engineer, and, following what he felt to be a call to the foreign mission field, a month later started to China, where he was offered the position of teacher of mathematics in the middle school of the Canton Christian College. After a trip through Japan, Korea, and parts of northern China, during which he visited the Friends' Mission in Japan, he reached Canton, and took up his work among the four hundred and fifty students of the college. All these young Chinese men speak some English, and on this account their teacher does not lose time because he does not speak Chinese. The letters are written purely for his own family and are correspondingly informal.—Eds.]

First letter after arrival.—My last letter was written from the steamer, I think, and mailed from Manila, and so much has happened since then that it is quite impossible to give more than the barest outline, but I shall do the best I can.

This morning we had a wonderful church service right here on the campus. Fully five hundred persons there, nearly all Chinese. In the afternoon we went to another service at the British Concession at Canton.

There must be well over a dozen men teachers here under thirty years of age and we can have a real good time together. One fellow was football captain at his prep. school and another beat me a set of tennis yesterday (I won from him the day before), while another good-looking chap named Van Dyke is a splendid singer. His name in Chinese is nearly "One Duck" so he is known as One Duckee, while my name is just half way between "Ooda" and "Wood duck."

I have five mathematical classes a day for five days of the week, as well as one informal English class and one Bible class. There must be well over two hundred fellows in these, in all, and my chief concern is the hopelessness of really getting to know any of them. They all look more or less alike. Besides these classes, three other young teachers and I are in charge of the daily drill exercises. There are about two hundred more of these, but some of my classes probably duplicate the names.

My sun helmet is new, but I am getting used to it and the everlasting heat. My room is great, with three sides all windows and the fourth has a door from the porch. I will send some pictures soon. I could go on for pages about first impressions, etc., but must postpone that for the present.

Letter of Ninth Month 25.—The week has passed very fast and I have just an hour now in which to write letters. On Third-day I got up at 5.30 to go and meet Henry Hodgkin and his wife who were arriving from Hong Kong. We then had breakfast together. Have had some fine tennis this week with Knipp, the head of the physics department. He is said to be the best tennis player in Canton.

Henry Hodgkin gave us two good lectures and then he went up to the city where he had a very interesting talk with Sun Yat Sen. It seems that Sun used to be a Christian, but the church advised him not to revolt. So he says now, "They did me no good, and at present I am powerful; our government has more people under it than are in the United States, so why should I go back to the church." Chinese logic, perhaps.

My second year mathematical class sent a deputation to their adviser, asking that he ask me to talk more slowly as they did not understand all I was saying. It rather provoked me as I ask them a dozen times a day whether they follow me, but the Chinese idea of politeness makes them always assent.

John D. Rockefeller, Jr., is well known here on the campus, and is expected to visit the school soon again. I imagine the school buys enough stuff from the Standard Oil Co. of N. Y. to pay his expenses. All our illumination is by their oil, and the coolies use the oil tins to carry water everywhere. When cut diagonally in half we use the tins for dust pans. I wish you could see them cutting the grass. No lawn mowers are necessary for it is just as cheap to get a squad of coolies to cut the fields with knives.

At present I am doing my best to learn Cantonese. I must hold to that for six months now, and then take up the written characters, and finally Mandarin. Cantonese is the only useful language around here and I need it badly. Many lectures are given in it, and even at the football meeting most of the talk was in that language, and I could not tell whether they were saying that they had a good coach or a bad one. No word in this language has more than six letters, but there are ten tones, three of these can be spelled differently, but the other seven all approximate the same English spelling. Chui means Lord, pig, or pearl according to the tone of voice, and what it means in the other tones I have not found out as yet. But there is a system to it all and it is not at all hopeless.

Religious work has not amounted to much with me yet. You have to get to be friends with the students before you can definitely influence them. I am now swamped with names and faces, but as the months pass I hope to get over that. I had thirteen fellows in my Bible Class this morning, and we are taking up Romans, but with their imperfect English, it is hard to explain matters. I still have a great deal to learn about Chinese psychology before my efficiency can pick up much.

(To be concluded.)

He who believes in God is not careful for the morrow, but labors joyfully and with a great heart. "For he giveth His beloved, as in sleep." They must work and watch, yet never be careful or anxious, but commit all to Him, and live in serene tranquility; with a quiet heart, as one who sleeps safely and quietly.—MARTIN LUTHER.

THE YEARLY MEETING'S SESSIONS.

The reasonable request has come to the office of THE FRIEND more than once for a schedule of the meetings of the Yearly Meeting week.

It is an easy task to prepare this so far as the afternoon and evening sessions at Twelfth Street are concerned, for these are distinctly programmed occasions, where the speakers and topics are given and the time limit for each is known.

But with the Yearly Meeting sessions at Arch Street the case is different in this respect. The main outline of business is known, at least to the clerks, but it is pre-supposed that "concerns" may arise at any time which may take such "hold" upon the meeting as to merit considerable time and so very materially and very properly shift the pre-arranged plans.

With this thought in mind we can give the outline as requested and are glad to do so.

By adjournment from last year the meeting is due to assemble in joint session at 10 o'clock, Second-day morning, the 27th, in the west room.

It is understood that all doors will be closed at 10 o'clock and none admitted until announcement is made from the Clerk's table that the business session will now open. (This period last year was about fifteen minutes.) The plan has been in practice for years with the Women's Meeting and last year was used by the men as well. It seemed to add to the brief period for worship, and there are many who would be sorry to see it given up. The same plan will be observed at the opening of all the business sessions this year.

The business for Second-day should comprise the roll call, the appointment of numerous committees to report later in the week, followed by the reading of the minutes of the Representative Meeting. These minutes will introduce subjects calling for judgment on the part of the meeting at large.

Third-day morning, the Meeting of Ministers and Elders holds its second session in the east room at ten o'clock, the first session having been on the Seventh-day previous, the 25th, at the same hour and place.

The afternoon session on Third-day begins at two and continues usually to about 4.30. At this session we should hear from a Committee appointed to examine messages addressed to the Yearly Meeting and now in the possession of the Clerk. The number of these is in excess of previous years and considerable time may be required for their consideration.

The Committee in the interests of Christian labor in foreign lands may be called on for their report at this time, as it is known to contain a request for the appointment of a committee to report later in the week.

Two sessions are held on Fourth-day. From 10 to about 12.30 and from 2 to about 4.30. The afternoon meeting last year was a joint session and will presumably be the same this year. The morning session will naturally be devoted to the Query Answers and reports from the Quarterly Meetings, including, if there is time, a specific minute from one of the meetings on a proposed change in the Fifth Query.

The afternoon session, if last year's course is followed, will be given to the Social Order Committee's report and to the returns from the two Queries offered last year, also the Peace Committee's report, time also being given in this connection for a statement from the Friends' Service Committee.

On Fifth-day meetings for Divine Worship will be held as usual (see subjoined statement.) The afternoon session from two to four-thirty will be given to the reports of the West-town Committee and the Educational Committee, and if time permits the reading of the Memorial of a beloved Minister, forwarded by one of the Quarterly Meetings.

Sixth-day should see the business completed in a session not over-long and not tedious. The Tunesassa Committee's report, the report of the Committee on Race Relations, the report of the Extension Committee, report of Committee on Organic Church Union, reports of Committees appointed during the week and Report of Committee to examine the accounts of the Treasurer.

The week offers much that calls for seasoned thoughtful-ness and prayerful solitude that all may be under Right Ruling, and that our little part in it may reflect in full measure dependence on Him in whose name we gather.

Meetings for worship will be held on First-day morning at 10.30, Third Month 26th, at the five city meeting-houses—Fourth and Arch Streets; Twelfth Street below Market Street; Forty-second Street and Powelton Avenue; Coulter Street, Germantown, and Orthodox Street, Frankford; also at the usual hour in the evening, 7.30, at Twelfth Street.

At 3.30 the afternoon of the same day a Meeting for Worship will be held in the Twelfth Street house exclusively for Young Friends between the ages of fifteen and thirty-five years, inclusive.

On Fifth-day, the 30th, Meetings for Worship will be held at ten o'clock at Fourth and Arch Streets, west end, at Twelfth Street, below Market and in Germantown; also a Children's Meeting is planned for in the east room at Fourth and Arch Streets at 10.15; children from ten to fourteen, inclusive, are invited.

He has recently spent six or seven months in China as a member of a commission to study the situation and conditions there. His subject at the meeting will be "Christian Obligations to China and Japan." He is regarded as one of the best speakers in the Baptist denomination.

Fifth-day, the 30th—

7.30 p. m.—Meeting under the auspices of the Peace Committee. An address on "The Washington Conference and Peace," by Paul Jones of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and "The Work Before Us," by Frederick J. Libby.

VOLUNTEERS ARE WANTED TO MEND CLOTHES FOR EUROPE.

Volunteers are needed. The Service Committee is organizing a Mending Department to mend the garments which need repair before being sent to Europe. An all-day meeting will be held every Third-day, beginning at 9.30 a. m., and every woman who will volunteer for this day every week, or just for one day every once in a while, is asked to enroll in this Department. Jane Rhoads Morris will be the Director and the group will meet in Room No. 3 of the Meeting House at Fifteenth and Race Streets. The ladies are asked if possible to bring all kinds of lining which would do to mend coats and to replace the worn lining which is found in them, and also any buttons and spools of colored silk which would be of use. The reconstruction of these clothes so that they may be wearable, is of the greatest value to the world to-day. Anna B. Dudley, Secretary of Women's work, of the Service Committee, at 20 S. Twelfth Street, will gladly furnish information concerning this work.

LIFE OF A FAMINE RELIEF WORKER IN RUSSIA.

(Extracts from the Diary of Marjorie Rackstraw, a Member of the English Friends' Unit.)

"We started off about five o'clock this morning in two sleighs. All the trains have been held up a good deal because of snowdrifts, and we have seen squads of men all along the way shoveling it. First we came to a great forest and then a long stretch of flat steppe with a village here and there.

"People talk about the good old coaching days, but I do not know! Of course, perhaps I ought not to judge from the experience of this present time. We are many steps behind the coaching days of Old England even here, though you do occasionally see a telephone and electric light and a train. The worst is that there is no regular service in anything. You can never count on anything. The one word you have got to read, mark, learn and inwardly digest in Russia, is 'wait.'"

"The sleighs were drawn by camels. Late in the day when it began to grow dark the driver told us that he knew of a nice house where we could put up for the night. When we arrived there we found there was just one room, one-third of which was taken up by the high stove. Two very disheveled women in a tangle of dirty bed-clothes were lying upon the bed. An old man looking very ill was lying on a bench; and besides them there were a boy of about fifteen, another man, and a young woman, looking clean and healthy and very nice. I do not know how she managed it in such surroundings. The atmosphere was cruel. You cannot imagine anything as hot and as stifling as it was. I said to Nikolai, 'Must we stay here for the night?' He looked troubled and said, 'I am afraid we must.' Then he began to tell me all of the worst things he had done and still had come out of them alive, so I decided that I must do it.

"They were very kind people and at once offered me the only bed, which I declined as politely as I could, saying that I would very much prefer an empty bench and to sleep on my shuba. Our driver came in also, and so we were nine all told. It was five o'clock when we had arrived and we knew it would be seven o'clock in the morning before it was light enough to leave—fourteen hours!

"The fact that the entrance to this room was through a cow-shed with a cow in it is enough to describe the dirt of the place, and I felt my democratic heart beating very feebly. We could hardly bear to think of supper. However, we asked them to boil up the samovar, and we gave them tea enough to go round to all. We had promised to feed the driver and so we got out bread and tinned fish which we nibbled at and he devoured, and all the others looked on hungrily. We had a sack of rice with us so I got some out and asked them to boil enough for everybody for the next morning.

"Then we settled down to roost for the night. One woman had a sprained ankle and groaned miserably. She lay down on the floor in front of the stove and the driver slept on top of it. Another man lay on the floor by the side of the stove and the others huddled around the bed, Nikolai and I each lying on a bench. Snores and groans then prevailed. Although it was as hot as an oven I felt that I must keep my leather coat on. Even at that my face and my hands were well bitten by the lice. About midnight my head was ready to crack so I went out into the night. The storm was over and it was a still night and I saw that one of the sleighs had been left in the middle of the yard. I went in again, and steering my way with one match, got my great shuba and went out again and lay in the sleigh, even though it was all snowy and frosty, for the rest of the night.

"You will not believe it, but I had a lovely night. It seems madness to think of sleeping out in Russia in midwinter, but a shuba is a wonderful thing. It does not let in wet or cold and with coverings on my feet and legs I was altogether protected.

"The next morning we boiled rice and tea, and leaving a few handfuls of rice and a tin of fish, and receiving a warm invitation for another visit, we started off again.

"It was a lovely day and we made forty verses, arriving at Zovinka at five o'clock, it being Christmas eve. The camels had kept up an absolutely steady walk all day. We jumped off the sleighs two or three times during the day and walked a bit to stretch our limbs and warm up. There was no road at all, just a track over the steppe, and for a few miles there was not even a track. Nikolai had impressed the driver very strongly that we must have the very best house to sleep in that night, and he took us to the priest's. It was a very modest little house, but it had three rooms and was perfectly clean. We had a lovely welcome and spent a very happy evening talking to the priest and his wife and their one boy. They have three other children, but they are away at school at Samara. They gave us milk from their cow and their best beds and pillows.

"In the morning, which was Christmas day, we went on to the village of Gerasimovka, where there seems to be absolutely nothing to eat but grass. There is a little meat now and then when an animal is killed, but there are very few animals left. Already a hundred people have died in this small village this month. It was dreadful to see the people with their faces all drawn with misery and pain, hardly able to drag one foot after the other. One woman stopped us and said she had two children left, three had died of hunger. One of the remaining children was being fed in our kitchen and she wanted to know if we could feed the other one. Her husband had already died.

"The kitchens at Gerasimovka were very good. The manager was one of the best men we have met and he is so anxious for everything to be as good as it possibly can. His whole heart and soul is in it."

AUSTRIA APPEALS AGAIN FOR CLOTHING.

An urgent cable was received this week from Vienna, which reads:—

"Distress in Vienna increasing because of unemployment. There is need for a large consignment of clothing to be here by May and also for a consignment to be ready for October."

There is an urgency that Friends be made aware of the need for clothing in Vienna; as the Store-room reports that as most of the clothing which is now being received is marked for Russia, the consignments for Vienna are being greatly reduced. While the need for clothing in Russia does remain paramount, there is still the need for the underpaid and unemployed of Vienna. A consignment of clothes for Austria is now waiting in the Store-room to be completed, and this need should be met immediately. If you do want your clothes to go to Austria, be sure to mark it plainly on the package. But even in doing this, do not forget that the need in Russia remains constant.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

JAPAN NOTES.—Recent information from the mission in Tokio states that the addition to the Girls' School has been begun, and it is hoped that it will be completed by the end of Fourth Month. A good-sized entering class is expected.

The new meeting-house is under way also, and may be completed in time for a "June" wedding.

Japanese Yearly Meeting will be held in Tsuchiura early next month.

Thomas E. and Esther B. Jones will move from Mito to Tokio soon. The former has accepted an appointment beginning in the spring term, to teach economics in Keio University; an unusual opportunity for him to meet and influence students.

This term, Edith F. Sharpless is teaching English in a large government school for girls in Mito. She comes in contact with 350 girls each week. She is the first foreign English teacher ever employed in this school.

Herbert V. and Madeline W. Nicholson sailed from San Francisco on the China Third Month 18th, and will go to Mito where they will reside for a time.

Margaret James, for three years principal of the Lansdowne Friends' School, has been appointed teacher in the Friends' Girls' School at Tokio for a term of two years. She will sail in the Eighth Month.

HADDONFIELD AND SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING was held on the 16th. The fine day brought a large attendance to the Meeting-house at Haddonfield. Several Friends from a distance were present and the vocal expression in the first meeting came, with one exception, entirely from the visiting Ministers. Among these were Anna Livezey Hall, of Ohio, Mary Anna Wood, of Ithaca, N. Y., Susanna Kite, Jacob R. Elfreth, Edward M. Binns, and James M. Moon. In the business meeting, which lasted with unflagging interest until half-past four, the problem of our week-day meetings brought the Quarterly Meeting under deep exercise and much pertinent, helpful and intelligent comment followed. The concern of Wm. C. Allen and his wife to pay a third visit to Australasia was united with and a warmly encouraging minute to that effect was adopted.

EVERYONE claiming a real interest in the welfare of the Negro as a race can not lose the opportunity of procuring a copy of The World Tomorrow for the current month. The entire issue is devoted to the Negro question and radical as some of the sentiments may be, it all merits consideration, if one claims a right to think fairly and to speak with knowledge on this great topic.

The closing thoughts in the paper are in verse, which at the risk of repetition we will give:—

SOLUTION.

No longer now I strive to find
The paths to peace in outward things.
There is no refuge save the mind
From all our mortal sufferings.
Full well and deeply I abhor
The murderous clash of race with race,
But what of all the seeds of war
To my own bosom may I trace!
My neighbors' greed I soon detect,
And all the wrongs they have designed:
What if my neighbors but reflect
The dark disorders of my mind!
When bitterness and hate and strife
Obtrude where fellowship should be,
These grim perversities of life
May have their fountain springs in me.
O brother man, distraught, dismayed,
Peace buildeth not her home apart:
Her strong foundations must be laid
Deep in each private human heart.

The Ancient Friends' Meeting House in Newport, Rhode Island, and the Meeting House Grounds are to be Sold

The Meeting House property at Newport, Rhode Island, having been offered for sale by the Trustees, and Rhode Island Monthly Meeting having approved of their action, a movement has been started by about 20 men and women to buy the property, and allow it to be used for a much-needed community centre. An option was secured on the property, which option soon expires, to purchase it for $28,000. The Newport Trust Company has agreed to loan $14,000 on mortgage, to be paid when the other $14,000 have been raised by subscription. Of this $14,000, eight thousand have been promised. Friends have been communicated with, so far as possible, and they approve without a dissenting voice and are contributing. The Committee is forming itself into a corporation, and the plan would be to preserve in its ancient appearance the oldest part of the Meeting House (1705) and that the whole property shall serve a useful and dignified purpose. As many Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting have worshipped in this house, it is hoped they will feel interested to subscribe. For further information consult

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

I.

The beginning of Yearly Meeting week was marked as usual by the gathering on Seventh-day morning, the 25th, of the ministers and elders. Several, whom illness or the infirmity of age prevented from attending, were much missed, but only four of the regularly appointed representatives were absent. William Bacon Evans being still in Syria, John D. Carter acted as Clerk, with Martha H. Bishop assisting.

The deep silence of the opening period gave opportunity for two vocal prayers. The business of the meeting was then entered upon, and after the roll-call of the representatives, the credentials of six visiting Friends were read. These are William Littleboy, of Selly Oak, Birmingham, England; E. Maria Bishop, of Street, Somerset, England; Mary Anna Wood, Ithaca, New York; Mary C. Foster, a member of Nantucket Monthly Meeting, Mass.; Alice A. Waring, and her companion, Agnes H. Pollard, Norwich Monthly Meeting, Ontario, Canada.

There were several other visitors present without minutes: Anna Livezey Hall, Ohio; Mary E. Foster, accompanying Mary C. Foster; Thomas Battey, New England; Joseph Coppock, Iowa; and Albert Pollard, Canada.

The meeting welcomed warmly those who had felt a concern to pay us a visit, and there was expressed especial appreciation of the service of the two English Friends, one of whom has been with us well over a year and the other for about six months. These faithful laborers are shortly to return home, "carrying," it was hoped in the meeting, "many sheaves," and the clerk was directed to prepare "returning minutes" for them, to be presented for the meeting's consideration at its adjourned session on Third-day.

The prospect of William C. and Elizabeth C. B. Allen, to visit for a third time Australia and New Zealand, for the second time South Africa, and for the first time the islands of Java and Ceylon, returning by the British Isles, claimed the serious attention of the meeting. Sympathy was expressed for these Friends in thus undertaking once more so arduous a journey especially in view of William C. Allen's fragile constitution, but there was no thought of withholding the approval of the meeting and credentials warmly endorsing their concern will be furnished our Friends.

There was no further business brought to the meeting's attention at this session, the reading and answering of the special queries addressed to ministers and elders being postponed till Third-day. Much weighty expression was given to the concern that the longing for unity and fellowship with other bodies of Christians should not permit us to obscure or minimize the importance of the fundamental truths of Christ's gospel. But we were urged to be charitable, too, and if some centre their attention upon the white ray of the Sun of righteousness and others rather more upon the rainbow colors of that ray as it passed through the prism of humanity, during the earthly life of our Lord, we must recall that it is the same Divine light after all. Many will long remember Thomas Battey's parable, which the foregoing but imperfectly echoes.

On First-day, besides the regular morning meetings in the five city meeting-houses, there was a Young Friends' meeting at Twelfth Street in the afternoon. Well over three hundred were present. The meeting was largely in worshipful silence. William Littleboy, who has a special interest in young Friends, was present and spoke most earnestly on the rewards of the consecrated life and service.

In the evening a larger company than usual gathered at Twelfth Street. Seven ministers were in the gathering but only one of them had vocal service. His text was, "As many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God." We are not made magically children of God but are given "power to become" His sons and daughters.

A further account of the Yearly Meeting, commencing with the joint session on Second-day, will appear, we hope, in our issue next week.

[Eds.]

I FEEL more sensibly how religion is a thing to be aspired for. I do not view it as implying dejection of spirit or disquietude of soul, or self-distrust, or any low abasement and self-accusation. Those who try to harness on any such disposition before they can fancy themselves as properly and comfortably religious, had better be satisfied to remain outside of that [supposed religious] state, for thereby they remain outside of a state of spiritual affluence. Nay, rather, religion is something splendid and entertaining. It implies whatever is best and happiest. It implies manly self-respect, which is only another name for confidence in the ever-present Helper. It implies a hearty relish and appreciation of whatsoever is Good, True and Beautiful; for such things are the things of God. Let us cleave to those things as being the nearest representations of Him we have on earth. As the mind is on God who outweighs the most worshipful men and women, so we are self-possessed as being above them because we are in Him.—J. H. DILLINGHAM, in 1863.

TRUE meditation requires at least as much energy as eloquent speech and strenuous action.—G. CURRIE MARTIN.

FRIENDLY AMBASSADOR OR MISSIONARY.

In the next place, a factor of supreme importance in missionary approach is Friendship. This was most strongly impressed upon the delegates to the Conference of Federated Missions, this summer, by a representative of the Japanese Federation of Churches. He said the place of the missionary in Japan is primarily that of friendship. The government representative, the business man, the engineer, and the foreign educator in the public schools have come to Japan for a brief period to do a special piece of work. Their tasks have been defined before they come by an already existing organization. They come as foreigners to do a piece of work in a foreign way. It is taken for granted that they will live in a foreign way, think in a foreign way, act in a foreign way, and if they desire, be narrowly nationalistic. Such men make their little contribution of expert knowledge to the total of Japanese civilization, and return home without fundamentally changing anything. The place of the missionary, however, is different. He comes presumably to give his life for the Japanese people. He says he has forsaken his country and institutions, and perhaps some really have, but a great many never do. They live as foreigners, with foreign minds, loyalties and loves, to their dying day. Some missionaries seem simply to endure the Japanese. This is as apparent as to be one of the commonest topics of conversation when a group of foreign missionaries get together. The Japanese wish the missionaries for friends, they wish to be one and feel as one body in the community, but alas, in many cases the missionary makes this impossible by regarding his neighbors as spiritually lost or socially inferior. To give one's life for a people is a tremendous thing. It means entering into their lives, customs, and traditions. It means burning one's bridges, and becoming entirely "for" this adopted people. It means trying to appreciate their history, and their pride in an ancestral line unbroken since the dawn of history. It means loving their country and becoming a citizen of it in spirit. Such a man does not try to thrust his ideas or program upon the Japanese. He lives his message into them through friendship, love and good example. Without definite program, or the necessity of annually reporting to a foreign board the added number of converts, he simply spends his days in the community as a Christian citizen and an ambassador of friendship. Such a foreigner is no longer spiritually "hyphenated." He has entered into the very life of the Japanese and can see things from their standpoint. He can see the gold as well as the dross of the Japanese character, and he can discover ways of uplifting the entire community by means that appeal to the Japanese. Every day and every hour his life is to them an example of "A More Excellent Way." Such a life is not a passive influence, it radiates creative energy, which extends out and out until it has touched and changed the last and least man on the periphery of the community.

And again an attitude of Daring to Trust the Japanese is of great importance in missionary approach. This idea was voiced most strongly at a meeting of Y. M. C. A. and Public School English teachers by a representative of the "International Sunday School Movement." This young Japanese pointed out that the thing most needed among missionaries is a willingness to trust institutions to the management of the Japanese. It seems to be a characteristic of foreigners and of Americans especially to wish to administer something. They wish to form committees, create departments, and direct them all in a foreign way according to foreign standards. He said, "The attitude seems to be, Get an idea, create some enthusiasm, and then finish up with a Hup, Hup, Hurrah, boys, all together now, we're going to put something across. That may work in America, but it doesn't get the Japanese." If a thing is to succeed in Japan it must be planned and administered according to Japanese custom and methods. Very few foreigners are able to sense what these are. Or if they knew, they tend to regard the Japanese method as inferior, largely because it is different from what they are used to. Many institutions have failed to grow because foreigners insisted on managing them. The speaker at this meeting advised all foreign administrators to go back to their places of work and resign at once. Their administrative responsibilities should be placed upon the Japanese most able to carry them. But too much importance must not be attached to this condition. The Japanese and foreign conception of ability may differ, and the Japanese concept must be trusted for the sake of good feeling and development of future leaders. The Japanese will make mistakes, but he will profit by them. And when once he has gotten into trouble he will be much more amenable to advice and guidance than if he had never tried alone. Such a program may be difficult for a foreigner, but it will be appreciated by the Japanese. And it is pregnant with possibilities for the future. It is founding institutions where they really belong, on Japanese "soil," and it is placing the foreigner in the position of an adviser, helper and friend, where he can be of most real service in Japan.

And finally, provided such an adjustment of attitude and approach to Christian missions in Japan can be made, for what can the missionary and the world at large hope in the way of Christian advance? This is, of course, difficult to predict, but some things at least stand out as possible accomplishments. If the difficulties of our present program are removed, the line that generally separates the Japanese and foreign Christian workers in this country will be dimmed if not obliterated. Japanese institutions will be placed where they eventually should be, and must be, upon a Japanese foundation with Japanese backing. The pride of a very sensitive race will be uninjured, in not always having a group of foreigners assuming, by their work and position, that Japanese are inferior. Foreign capital invested in the Japanese churches will become a tie of international Friendship, rather than a goad to the acceptance of the foreigner's idea of progress. The workers who come here will understand that their attitude must be one of friendship and fellow-feeling with the Japanese, rather than that of a director or dictator. And the Japanese will doubtless seek, rather than merely assent to, the advice of the foreign Christians in their communities. And furthermore, with all of the Christian forces co-operating to establish the Kingdom of God in the Empire of Japan, on a fundamentally Christian basis, who can doubt that Christianity will spread more rapidly and with greater effect?

But there seem many drawbacks to the adoption of such a program. It appears on the surface to be at variance with the whole idea of the Church Militant going forth to conquer the world, and as such destroys the glamor and mass appeal of the whole missionary enterprise. It minimizes the need of specific programs and statistical reports, upon which much financial appeal is made. And it holds before the candidate for the mission field no dazzling hope, that he can start anything, organize anything, or administer anything, which he may call his own. Indeed, who can conceive of a mission program founded on a sort of "Watchful Waiting" policy? What American will give money to an institution run by Japanese, about whom little is really known? And who is willing to give his life to go six or eight thousand miles away from home to sit around and wait for something to turn up, or to work under a people whom one has come to save? Yet this is what young Japan is asking! And with the asking, they are putting before the Christians of the West, I believe, the most magnificent challenge in a generation. Think of it! They are virtually saying, we have reached a stage where we want to talk with you, not to listen to you. We have reached a stage where we can dare to ask you who have been so far above and beyond us to be one with us. We want to take you into our family. We are willing to stretch the bounds of our closed community, closed from the beginning of the race, to include the foreigner also. We want you to live with us, to be friends with us, and love us, and trust us. This change of attitude is a big step for Japan. She has not made such a request before. She opened her doors to foreign commerce under compulsion; and she accepted our civilization, because she wanted to surpass us, or if necessary, to conquer us. But now she is asking the biggest and best men that the West can produce, to come and be Japanese at heart, with the millions of her subjects. She is asking for friends, not merely teachers. She is asking for a real sacrifice of lives for the Japanese nation, that it may be a whole-hearted, Christian society, natural to itself. By such a request the appeal of foreign missions is not lost. It is re-stated in a call for Ambassadors of Friendship. It is tremendous in its daring boldness; in its assumption that the Japanese are worthy to unite in spirit with the foreign Christians on equal footing. It means that the Christian forces are confronting an adult nation, many of whose coming leaders want her to be Christian. And it means that the worker, who comes willing to lose his life, will find it regained a thousandfold. And this program is working wherever tried. Various individuals, who have adopted this attitude, have found hours insufficient to meet the demands upon them; their opinions sought by private and public citizens, and their influence as Christian citizens continually expanding. One mission has dared to trust its destiny to the Japanese church, instead of working in co-operation with it, as heretofore. This has resulted in a wider opportunity for all its missionaries, and an increased effectiveness in Christian work. It is not too much to hope therefore, that a program of missions adjusted to the Friendly Ambassador idea, may lead to a fuller realization of an independent Japanese church, and a Christian Japanese nation.

HADDONFIELD AND SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING.

Our last issue contained a very brief review of Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting. Just as the paper came from the press the following was received, which we are glad to publish as a more extended account of what was in many ways a remarkable meeting.—Eds.]

"Say not thou, What is the cause that the former days were better than these? for thou dost not inquire wisely concerning this." (Eccles. vii: 10)

"Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children, whom thou mayest make princes in all the earth." (Psalm xlv: 16)

Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting, the last of the seven constituting Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to hold its sessions, convened at Haddonfield, N. J., Third Month 16th inst.

It may have been the pleasant weather, or, shall we not rather conclude, because of its being, in view of the approaching Yearly Meeting, the most important session of the year, that the attendance was above the average of similar occasions. An unusual number of visitors, too, especially of those formerly styled "public Friends," made the occasion one of hopeful promise for spiritual uplift. Of this class there were present five individuals, two of whom were members of other Yearly Meetings.

When the meeting became settled, the two large rooms presented that compact appearance, especially on the women's side, which is of itself an uplifting influence, to those especially who at home are members of small congregations, and for whom the assembling for worship in so large a group gives that sense of enlarged fellowship which oft-times cheers the laborer in the Master's vineyard.

Nor was that other and, above all, most-to-be desired factor in the promise of a good meeting, lacking; for there was the comforting evidence soon revealed to many hearts, that He who has promised to draw near when the believer signals in sincerity his purpose to approach the heavenly sanctuary, was present in His spiritual manifestation to quicken souls in the way of righteousness.

The meeting for worship was thus enlivened and edified by six communications, two of which were in prayer. The beginning was that inspiring Bible narrative, briefly told, of how David, the greatest of all Israel's kings, was when a lad drawn from his father's sheepfold, and by the assurance given that He who had so marvelously given strength to defend the flock with naked hand from the ravages of the lion and bear, would in like manner enable him to deliver the armies of Israel from him who could but vaunt his physical weapons and power.

Next came an earnest, stirring appeal borrowing its references from that endowment which Christ conferred upon His disciples, and which was passed from them to this age, whereby the Christian believer is armed to meet every need of the hour in loving service for the uplift of humanity and the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom. The present-day opportunity for the enlistment of the Society of Friends in a more potent and extended form was most earnestly dwelt upon.

The other communications likewise dwelt upon the theme thus set before us; being lively appeals for a higher plane of Quaker living, in a day of so great need of the very things which have been delivered to us as an inheritance, and which the present hour is demanding that we should transform from a passive profession to a dominant factor serving the Master's use.

Finally, as a warning of Scripture record to those who may doubt the power of the Lord to perform the seemingly impossible, was given in brief detail (see Kings, chapter 7) the account of the relief of the city of Samaria, in the days of the prophet Elisha; when one who had declared impossible the prophetic utterance, that the terrible famine would suddenly cease, lived to see it literally fulfilled, but died as he was told he should do, at the moment of its accomplishment.

Under the cementing influence of vocal prayer the meeting adjourned for lunch and social intermingling in the capacious dining-room. After an hour-and-a-half thus spent, and with bodies refreshed for the remaining three-and-a-half hours' session the meeting again assembled. A brief devotional period seemed a fitting way to renew the covering under which the meeting had separated. After this the efficient clerk presented the first item of business, which was the reading of a letter from a distant member, William C. Allen, asking that a minute be granted himself and wife, Elizabeth C. B. Allen for a repetition of the Gospel visit which they a few years since had made to Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and possibly, in addition to the former visit, the islands of Java and Ceylon. Our dear Friends were released for this religious engagement, with the blessing of the meeting upon its fulfillment. The next most important item of business was the reading and answering of the Queries, which was largely done in the manner suggested by their prefatory paragraph. The consideration of the First Query led to an exceedingly lively and informing discussion with regard to the maintenance of mid-week meetings; for in this Quarter as elsewhere there is an apparent increase of lack of faithfulness in this particular. But, as was shown, there are many upon whom this charge might seem to rest, who in reality are debared from what would be to them a joyful privilege, were they not obligated to a service which is the result of the highly organized business relationships of the age in which we live, and from which they cannot be conscientiously liberated without a form of injustice to others. The Fifth Query summary answer also brought the meeting under a wholesome exercise that the lives of some of its members might be more closely dedicated to "the mind of Jesus," whereby the strong tendencies of the day, especially in the matter of amusements, might be rebuked, and the individual both for himself and as an example to others, be raised to a higher plane of Christian living.

Many other subjects of a routine nature claimed the attention of the meeting, in the handling of which there was evidenced that the body as an organization was functioning upon lines which, it is reverently believed, are resulting in a more than perfunctory accomplishment of the purpose for which it assembles. In order that this large gathering representing a membership of approaching six hundred and fifty, might have at its sessions more of those who are in the strength of their years, and undoubtedly deeply interested in the welfare of the Society, and among its most highly valued and gifted members, the subject was introduced near the close of the meeting of the possibility in measure reaching the situation by a change in the time of holding its sessions. Further consideration of the subject was left to a large committee appointed under a loving and sincere expression that what is for the highest good of the body as a whole may be the outcome.

PRAYER.

When prayer delights thee least, then learn to say,
 "Soul, now is thy greatest need that thou shouldst pray."
 Crooked and warped I am, and I would fain
 Straighten myself by thy right line again.
 Say! What is prayer—when it is prayer indeed?
 The mighty utterance of a mighty need.
 The man is praying who doth press with might
 Out of his darkness into God's own light.
 The greenest leaf, divided from its stem,
 To speedily withering doth itself condemn.
 The largest river, from its fountain head
 Cut off, leaves soon a parched and dusty bed.
 All things that live from God their sustenance wait,
 The sun and moon are beggars at His gate.
 All skirts extended of Thy mantle hold,
 When angel hands from heaven are sentening gold.

GANDHI—THE REFORMER.

IN THE FRIEND for Third Month 16th appeared a very interesting paper under the striking title, "The Greatest Man on Earth To-day." An individual who justly passes as one well-read, remarked a few days since that this was his introduction to a most interesting character. Lest there should be some misapprehension that we fully endorse all that Gandhi seems to represent, we need to state some facts in regard to him that may have escaped notice.

That he has been sentenced to a long term of imprisonment under the British Government need not argue anything to his discredit. The liberty which English citizens now enjoy knew its birth in the noisome goals of England during the seventeenth century. George Fox and his associates made many contributions to the race, one of them, and that not the least, was won through the steadfastness of Friends to principle at the cost of many years in prison.

The following is a fair sample of what the daily press has for us on the Gandhi revolt. How much or how little it suffers from exaggeration we can little more than guess.

"The situation in India gets worse instead of better. It was reported that 10,000 Bhil tribesmen, notorious for their lawlessness, revolted and joined the Gandhi forces near Godhra. The Assam government informed the Indian office that rioting had broken out at Jamunamukh, that prisoners were released from jails and a train held up and stoned. The East India railroad strike was reported spreading and many attempts were made to quell the disturbance. At Madras the situation was so threatening that all Europeans were enrolled as special constables to help the government keep order and protect property. Word was received from the Indian national congress at Bombay that the date for beginning civil disobedience would be decided by a committee appointed for the purpose. General Rawlinson, commander-in-chief of the British troops in India, asked for stronger forces to cope with the situation, saying that the Indian tribes would raise an army reduced from 40 to 21 regiments. About 10,000 arrests of armed force of 130,000 men. He said the British forces had been made."

We believe our readers will be interested in the following which appeared a few weeks ago in The Friend (London).—EDS.

THE NEW MOVEMENT IN INDIA.

Although there have been several prominent leaders to the new movement in India, the outstanding place must be given to Gandhi, or "Mahatma Gandhi" as he is usually styled in India. His experiences as a lawyer in South Africa and indignation at the unfair discrimination made between colonists and Indian residents in the self-governing British colonies, led him to adopt a life dedicated to raising the status of his countrymen in all lands. His deep religious character earns for himself personally a uniform respect from friend and foe. At the present time he is regarded by great masses of the ignorant people as an incarnation of God, and anything said or done as by him receives their reverential obedience.

But under his banner are grouped a great variety of men of quite different temperament who themselves only use his reputation as a cover to their own quite different actions. Gandhi has carefully studied the history of reforms and revolutions in the past. His attitude in theory is distinctly Christian, of the school of Tolstoy, but also Hindu, as in its teaching with regard to the use of cattle for food. He calls himself a "Primitive Hindu," and I had better quote his own words in explanation of his position. "I call myself a Santani Hindu, because (1) I believe in the Vedas, the Upanishads, the Puranas and all that goes by the name of Hindu scriptures and therefore in avatars (incarnations of God) and rebirth. (2) I believe in the Varnashram Dharma (religion of caste) in a sense, in my opinion, strictly Vedic, but not in its present popular and crude sense. (3) I believe in the protection of the cow in its much larger sense than the popular. (4) I do not disbelieve in idol-worship. I do not believe in the exclusive divinity of the Vedas. I believe the Bible, the Quran and the Zend Avesta to be as much divinely inspired as the Vedas.

I believe implicitly in the Hindu aphorism that no one truly knows the Shastras (inspired books) who has not attained perfection in innocence (Ahimsa), truth (Satya) and self-control (Brahmacharya), and who has not renounced all acquisition or possession of wealth. . . . Cow protection is the gift of Hinduism to the world. And Hinduism will live so long as there are Hindus to protect the cow. The way to protect is to die for her. . . . Hindus will be judged by their ability to protect the cow. It will be now understood why I consider myself a Santani Hindu. . . . I have made the Khilafat cause my own, because I see that through its preservation full protection can be secured for the cow. . . . My prayer ascends daily to God Almighty, that my service of a cause I hold to be just may appear so pleasing to Him, that He may change the hearts of the Musalmans, and fill them with pity for their Hindu neighbors and make them save the animal the latter hold dear as life itself. . . . Unfortunately today Hinduism consists merely in eating and not eating."

Mr. Gandhi, in the article from which the foregoing statements are taken, strongly reprobates the present cruelty to cattle common all over India on the part of Hindus, the action of the caste people to "the untouchables," the sacrifice of goats to Kali, and prostitution as practised in the service of the Hindu gods and goddesses. But as a matter of fact little has been done by the Indian community to remedy the defects Gandhi most eloquently points out, especially in regard to the fifty million "untouchables;" and the bulk of his influence has been used of late years to discredit and make unworkable the present system of Government as existing under British control.

It is deeply to be regretted that war-time official statements have for this generation completely undermined the popular belief in the truthfulness of a Government announcement. The unprejudiced reader of newspaper reports no longer feels assured that he is being honestly told the facts; whilst he knows that the wild rumors that fly about the bazaar are certainly exaggerated and probably lies, he has not the same confidence in official denials that at one time would have sufficed to have discredited these.

BOOK REVIEWS.

"DENMARK, A CO-OPERATIVE COMMONWEALTH.*"

Strolling with a friend through a village street a few days since, a mammoth touring car passed us; the machine was suggestive of a good bank account on the part of the owner, and my companion remarked, "Not many years ago that man was an errand boy in a grocery store here, without anything on which to build his future success as a store-keeper except a willingness to work, a good constitution and a desire to please people."

I learned later that but a few years of apprentice work were required to place him at the head of the business and now, through native grit and hard work, he is what people in that village call "well off," and quite able, if he cared to do so, to buy out some of his farmer friends with whom he has been doing business, some of whom have hardly held their own, while our townsman has been gathering in the shekels.

My friend made the significant remark, half under his breath, that "here was a good illustration in a small way of what people call profiteering," my companion being of the class of "small farmers."

It was a coincidence that there was handed me the very next day a copy of Frederic C. Howe's "Denmark—a Co-operative Commonwealth."

The book should fascinate every American farmer, most of all the chapters that treat of co-operative farming in Denmark.

If you know as much about Denmark as I did, you know very little, and as the result of a hasty reading of chapter iv. I am satisfied that you will want to read all that is before and after it, and that you will be set to wondering if what has been accomplished in so very short a time in little Denmark can not be accomplished in a larger time in great America.

I presume that many of my farmer friends have read the book already, but I know of some who have not; I have friends, too, who claim to know little about farming and whose claim I would be unwise to dispute, who would enjoy this book, who would be helped by it and who would pass it on to a friend to read, just as in my case.

Denmark to be sure covers very little space on the map, but it has made a very large record in the last forty years. It is about one-quarter the size of Iowa, and has far less than one-quarter of the native fertility of Iowa. The population is about the same as New Jersey's, but outside the cities it is much more dense. It is distinctively rural and not urban. There are only four good-sized cities, the smallest of these has a population of 35,000. Copenhagen is the only real city, with a little over half a million of people.

You read of this in the first few pages of the book, not enough to vex or tire you, and soon you will be into the real story of how some forty years ago the Danish farmer had to sell his eggs and his butter and everything he had to sell to the village store-keeper, as the middle-man, and buy in return his sugar and coffee from him, giving the store-keeper the double profit, and helping on at a good pace the buying of the beautiful car. Now all is absolutely changed. The middle-man is submerged.

Forty per cent. of our population here in America are said to be nailed to the soil, so in Denmark 250,000 farmers, representing forty per cent. of Denmark's population are organized into four thousand co-operative agencies, and the farmer has in very large measure ceased to contribute to the purchase of the store-keeper's automobile.

Neither is this new life manifest in agriculture alone. The sub-topics in some of chapters indicate that others than farmers will find matter here to consider. Education, banking, Government by the Peasants, Taxation, Insurance and Pensions, Railways and Freight Carriers, The Packers, are some of these sub-topics, treated to be sure very briefly, for in each case the author brings up with a sharp turn in the all-absorbing subjects of farming, dairying, stock breeding, farm ownership, state aid for farmers, etc., etc.

The following is the task the writer sets himself. He accomplishes his task and leaves us wondering how far such a scheme can be worked out here. Remember, too, all this and more has been accomplished since many of us were school boys.

"The co-operative movement is the thing for which Denmark is most widely known. It is the most pervasive thing in the country. The Danish farmer performs for himself almost all the functions that in other countries are performed by capitalistic agencies. He makes his own butter and cheese. He kills and sells his own cattle and hogs. He collects his own eggs. He buys food for his cattle in distant markets, as well as agricultural machinery and the supplies of his household. He does his own banking and establishes his own credit. He insures his house and his live stock. He maintains breeding societies of pedigreed cattle and horses. He buys at wholesale and sells to himself at retail. There are two thousand co-operative retail stores in the country. And then co-operative stores in turn own factories, warehouses, big distributing agencies in Copenhagen and elsewhere. The Danish farmer is almost as self-contained as was his ancestor of two centuries ago.

"Through co-operation the Danish farmer has become his own capitalist. He performs the functions of entrepreneur. He does this not through state socialism but through more than 4,000 co-operative societies, which he himself owns."

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

CROOKED JOE.—(Retold from a little manuscript book of "Reminiscences," by the late James Kite).—A railway station is a rather poor home for a boy, but crooked Joe had scarcely known any other. He was less than one year old when the dreadful accident occurred which not only made him an orphan, but changed him from a strong, healthy child into a poor, helpless wreck. "What a pity he was not killed outright," said everyone except his mother. She said it was only her need to care for his poor, flickering little life, that kept her from being crushed by her grief for her husband.

The railway officials were kind to poor Mary Ryan, and gave her employment at the station, and there Joe was brought up, at least in the daytime. Every one liked the patient little fellow, going on errands so willingly, and tugging manfully at his mother's heavy water-buckets.

When Joe was eight years old he was sent to school, and that night he awakened his mother by his crying, and told her, when she begged to know the trouble, that some boy,—more thoughtless than cruel, let us hope,—had called him "Humpy," and asked if he carried a bag of meal on his back.

Mary Ryan flamed with the fierce anger of a mother: "You shan't go to school another day!" she cried, "I won't have my darlint put upon by the likes of them!" And so Joe's schooling came to an untimely end. And yet he learned many things at the station. He knew all about the side-tracks and switches, and could tell when trains were due as correctly as the time-table. How he envied the active lads that he saw every day on the platforms—the brakemen and firemen; and the engineers most of all! For one week of such life he would have given all he ever hoped for. He could never be anything but a poor cripple.

He was a special favorite with the telegraph operator, and the wonderful clicking instrument had a fascination for him.

One day there came a message which sent the operator out in a hurry. An engine had broken loose, and was coming without a driver, at the rate of forty miles an hour. "Clear the track," was the word. Now a little beyond the station was a steep up-grade, and then a high trestle across a valley. "She will go over at the trestle," every one said, and, all ran to see the accident.

The engine ran nearly up the steep grade, and then she stopped. What could it mean? The driving-wheels were revolving, but she was motionless. The foremost runners saw a crippled boy crouching down with a big empty oil-can at his feet. "He has oiled the track! Hurrah for Crooked Joe!" Joe was carried back on the men's shoulders, in a kind of triumphal procession. "Pass around the hat!" cried some one, and everybody seemed to have something to put in it. "Hold your cap, Joe," cried the man with the hat, "Your hands won't hold all this!" But Joe's hands were clasped behind him, and he cried out, "No, you shan't do it! You shan't pay me! Don't you see what it means to a fellow like me to be of some use, just for once? I don't want anything you can give me! I can never be anything but 'Crooked Joe.'" His voice rose almost to a scream, and seemed to hold the suffering of years in its sharp tone.

But the Superintendent took him in his arms, and said, gently, "No, Joe, we can't do anything for your poor back. But it was your brave heart, and the quick intelligence God gave you, that showed you how to save the engine, and you must let us at least give you the chance to learn, and to work, and then, twenty years from now, it will depend upon yourself whether you are 'Crooked Joe,' or Joseph Ryan."

Lodging in the town of C——, my host said, "Court is in session, I want you to attend it with me." We found the room crowded, and when the brilliant young lawyer rose to make his plea, I noticed with pain, that his fine head surmounted a small, misshapen body. But I soon lost all thought of this as I listened to his wonderful eloquence, which held the whole room full of people spell-bound, and which I was told was taking him to the head of his profession.

"A wonderful man!" said my friend, as we walked slowly homeward. And then he told me the story of "Crooked Joe."

"WHAT HATH GOD WROUGHT?"

When we pause to reflect upon the occurrences of the past few months and recognize that Good and Merciful Hand that has so marvelously intervened in the time of our exceeding need, we are reminded of those never-to-be-forgotten words which came so opportunely to the waiting assembly of our Yearly Meeting some years ago—"Let God Work." When adequately brought to a sense of our overwhelming need and baptised into a feeling of the Majesty and Mercy and Power of the Infinite and Holy One, we are then in some measure prepared to ask that He in His Goodness and condescension would look upon our feebleness and frailty and arise for our help, and thus out of "Man's extremity comes God's opportunity" to do His own Glorious Work. And so the call came for that most remarkable gathering which in its finished work called forth those most devout words, "The best part of the Conference was its Spirit." So in humility and gladness may we not thankfully acknowledge that the Divine Spirit—the Divine Wisdom has not been implored in vain. The words have been heeded, "Let God Work," and the spirit which was so thankfully acknowledged has brooded over the waiting nations with its benediction of Peace and Good Will, until the dawn of the new day draws nearer as the Divine Finger so clearly points the way, and so manifestly owns us in our part in the great and good work which is yet to be crowned with the "New Heavens and the new earth wherein dwelleth Righteousness."

Can we not learn a lesson from the "Signs of the times" and recognizing our own inadequacy in the work that lies nearest our own doors, and the All-availing help which is laid upon our Holy Head as He is recognized as over all His works, and crowning Him Lord of all. Let Him work. Let Him rule and overrule. Then will be brought to pass whatever is for the glory of His great Name and our own peace in Him.

I have been here over a week now and can look back on the two months spent in travel with a great deal of pleasure. It was certainly great, and at first I hated to come down from the lofty position of tourist to that of simple and hard-working missionary. Our hardships are all of the most trifling sort compared with those that used to have to be faced. The things I dislike most, I think, are the bugs. The cockroaches are impossible to eliminate, and when one about two inches long ran out of one of the drawers of my bureau, the first day I was here, I had a dozen cold chills and an attack of fever all at once. I finally squashed him, after considerable chasing, and my next adventure was not until last evening, when I chased a huge and most intelligent spider about the room; every time I hit at him with a board he saw it coming and dodged it. At last I got him behind the box that holds my kerosene tins, and his mangled corpse still is there to remind me of the battle.

Recently I paid a visit to the best dentist in Canton. He is Dr. Lau, a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania. He was with our delegation at Northfield in 1910, and recalled my whole family. Afterward I wandered about the old city, and it is one of the strangest.

It has one wide street built where the old wall used to be, and except for one or two others, all the streets of this huge city are about eight or ten feet wide. Most of them I can touch houses on each side as I walk. Sedan chairs and rickshaws try to get through these. All the stores have little banners hanging out, overlapping in a most picturesque way, and the houses are so high that it is perpetual twilight in the streets. As you know, Canton is built on a river and in the back channel there are thousands of boats of all kinds anchored to a veritable forest of bamboo poles that are stuck into the mud.

It is a wonderful life, being where you can feel you are really useful, and at the same time having all these unusual experiences.

Letter of Eleventh Month 15th.—I am lying on my blankets which cover a rice-straw bed on the slope of a mountain near Hong Kong. It is one of the most beautiful places I have ever seen. This morning we climbed to the top, from which point we seemed to see half the world. The nearest part of the horizon was miles away across clear blue water studded with islands.

We have been on this camping trip nearly a week, and almost every night a breeze springs up that is so strong that it wrecks our mosquito-net tents regularly.

The mountains and arms of the sea are exquisite. The moon is almost full now. We get up both here and at college about sunrise and that is just when the sun is setting with you. On this trip are five foreign and one native teacher and about 70 third year boys. By this time I am quite a chopstick expert and can put away two bowls of rice with them at each meal. The students cook all the food; we eat together; they have no idea of manners and all talk Chinese, so I am picking up the language very fast.

We are getting to know the boys much better and we try to teach them something of Christianity two or three times every day. Less than one-quarter of them are Christians, so we have a wonderful chance right now to do the work for which we are here. But these fellows have a way of thinking that is so different from ours that it is very hard to know whether anything is being accomplished. It has not been so very long since I came here, but the three months have been very instructive.

We have no camp fires, as all these mountains have been deforested and fire-wood is very scarce indeed, but every night the grass on some of the mountains is burning, and last night across the water was a red line, the reflection of one of these fires; on the right was a glorious sunset; at our left a perfect moon-rise, and behind us the towering mountains that we climbed to-day. How I wish you could see it all.

Then imagine a morning plunge in the sea, as cold as we want and colder, and then later a real hot swim. We go back to college to-morrow and to the regular class work, but it has not grown monotonous at all. You certainly made no mistake in encouraging me to try this work. I surely love it. Think of the world viewpoint we get even on a camping trip like this. Yesterday, two big Indians with turbans and long black beards, strolled into camp. They spoke both English and Chinese. We talked about the conditions of unrest in India. To-day, two Britishers climbed the mountain with us. The Howards, with whom I have supper nearly every First-day evening, have been in Africa for years, and Refo, with whom I am sharing a mosquito-net tent, was in the Rainbow division in the war.

I have no lantern and am finishing this letter by moonlight. Taps have just been blown and I must shortly go to my tent, but I want to end with a little of what work we have tried to do on this trip. Each evening I have fifteen boys for the evening devotions and I had morning chapel once. To-day, chapel was led by Refo and he told about the wise and foolish virgins and the danger of missing the opportunity. He also used the last baseball game as an illustration; when a good ball goes past the batter, a strike, he never has another chance to hit that particular ball. Buswell led the afternoon service with Isaiah liii, and to my small group this evening I read Luke xvi, last part.

MORRIS WISTAR WOOD.

THE STORY OF THE OLD FRIENDS' MEETING HOUSE AT NEWPORT, R. I.

In 1700, half the white population of Newport were Quakers, and the Yearly Meeting which occurred annually in the spring grew each year in size and importance, until in 1743 it was attended by five thousand Friends, and was the event of the year in Newport.

Before the oldest part of the present Meeting House was built, however, the earliest of the grand, old Newport Quakers had aged, and some passed away—William Coddington and Henry Bull, Caleb Carr, Edward Thurston and the Eastons. In their day, the Friends held their meetings mostly in private houses, either in Coddington's spacious home on Marlborough Street or Bull's, so recently burned, on Spring Street.

Before 1672, however, it seems certain that the Friends had a Meeting House, for it was in a Meeting House that the famous debate between Roger Williams and the Friends took place. This was a previous building to what we see standing now, and probably stood a little farther north on Farewell Street. But even yet, many of the meetings were held at Coddington's, for we read in the Friends' records:—"In 1678, a mans' meeting at the Widow Coddington's." Evidently, there were strong attractions that hung about this mansion, whose Great Room had been the meeting place when George Fox was in Newport, and where Governor Bellingham of Massachusetts and his company had been so royally entertained for ten days.

In 1680, however, we find the Friends breaking away from the Coddington House, never to return; for we read:—"It is agreed that the Yearly Men and Women's Meeting which useth to be at William Coddington's shall be ye first part at ye Meeting House and later part for ye affayers of ye Church to be at Walter Newberry's."

About this time Philadelphia began to appeal more to some of the Friends in Newport than did their island home; and we find Edward Shippen leaving for the City of Brotherly Love. Later, Anthony Morris comes from Philadelphia, and marries Thomas Coddington's widow for his third wife. She was a sister of Edward Shippen's wife, their maiden name being Howard. These men, Shippen and Morris, were both Colonial Mayors of Philadelphia, one after the other; so the two Howard sisters did well.

And here comes the first mention of the little Meeting House as we now see it, at the northwest end of the present line of buildings. At a meeting in 1706 the Friends "proposed that the old Meeting House may be better put in order for a stable toward the winter, and also proposed that money may be procured toward finishing the new Meeting House of Newport." So the new Meeting House of that shadowy, faraway time is the old Meeting House of to-day. Shall we not prize and reverence this building where our forefathers worshipped over two hundred years ago?

The lot, generous in size, upon which the new little Meeting House was erected, was left to the Friends, with much other land, by Anne, widow of the first Nicholas Easton. At his death he had given to the maintenance of the burial yard where his body should lie, one barrel of Pork to be managed by Christopher Houlder. The site of his house, the first house built in Newport, came to the Friends with the land. This before it was burned stood on the left of the Farewell Street gate as one enters the yard. Just at this point must be mentioned a few lines to show the tender care the Meeting extended toward its members. It seems that Ann Bull and Peter Easton were at odds in 1681; about what is not mentioned, but as Ann Bull, who had the distinction of marrying two Governors in succession, first Nicholas Easton and afterward Henry Bull, was the step-mother of Peter Easton, we can readily surmise that it was over some family matter, and quite likely about the disposition of Nicholas Easton's landed estates. The Meeting does not neglect the opportunity to put in a word of reproof, and records the minute:—"Which act is for judgment and condemnation and is ye unanimous sense and judgment of this Meeting that her spirit was very hard and wrong, and gave Friends noe satisfaction."

Among the Quaker ministers who spoke in this ancient Meeting House, we find Governor John Wanton, a dashing Privateer in his youth, but who swung back to his father's faith later in life and was a powerful preacher. He was considered the wealthiest man in the colony, and his Friends' principles did not prevent his wearing a bright scarlet cloak lined with blue.

Among the amusing incidents told us as children, of the worships who worshipped in this building is that of the dear old Quaker, who while preaching, took his capacious bandanna from his pocket and with it came a pack of cards, carefully inserted by his mischievous son. These fluttered down on the heads of his audience beneath him. It was a trying moment but the old Quaker was equal to it. "Friends," he said, "an enemy hath done this" and calmly went on with his sermon.

Another Friend of the Ministers' gallery who lived fifty years ago in "the Mrs. Janies' little house" on Cottage Street, upon becoming engaged to be married, described his future wife, "as a Godly woman with a large circle of acquaintances."

We, who do not call ourselves very old, can remember the quiet restful meetings on First-day mornings in summer, held in the middle and largest Meeting House. This was built a hundred years later, in 1807, with a spacious gallery above for the Blacks, but long unused except during the Annual Yearly Meeting week, when it was filled with young people.

The Ministers' Gallery faced Farewell Street. On the "rising seat," as it was called, sat David Buffum, with his white beaver hat. Next to him often was Levi Almy of Portsmouth, whose sermons consisted of texts strung together with almost no language of his own. George Bowen and Stephen Chase were beside them and Marmaduke C. Cope of Philadelphia.

On the other side of the aisle and facing the women below was Annabella Winn. Before speaking she would take off her bonnet with its snowy lining and strings and put it in the lap of the woman Friend next to her. After sitting a few moments to compose her thoughts she would arise and looking over our heads would give her sweet little message. She would begin sometimes, "As face answereth face in water," this being a favorite thought of hers. I cannot remember the rest of it.

In the seats in the body of the house were many to interest. Henry Morris who lived on Washington Street was always there. He wore white gloves, and during a prayer would pull the end of the seat-cushion to the floor and kneel himself. He drove to meeting with a two-horse vehicle whose body hung between the wheels and which went by the name of "The Octopus." Old George Carr was there, who unfailingly arrived at meeting with a rose in his mouth.

On the women's side, one that made an impression was dear old Deborah Wharton, for in Newport Orthodox and Hicksite Friends worshipped together. At the end of a seat, sat the sisters Anna and Eliza Hazard, one so dark and the other so fair and grey. John Farnum and his wife, the aged Longstreth sisters, who kept the school of renown, and others from Philadelphia staying at Mary Williams' delightful house on Washington Street were always to be seen at meeting when in Newport.

The Friends from the cities wore black clothes—the men, broadcloth, and the women taffeta silk with white shawls. The country Friends still clung to the more ancient form of grey for both men and women. To our childish minds the rustling of silk was always connected with a Friends' Meeting—it used to seem unusually hot on a summer meeting morning in Newport, and palm leaf fans were freely used by the elderly Friends, both men and women, as they listened to the long sermons.

AIMWELL SCHOOL.

Many times the following questions are asked about Aimwell:—

Is Aimwell worth while?

Has its day of usefulness passed?

Is there any need of Special Schools?

Why not send these children to Public School?

As a Board of Managers, we can answer these questions to our satisfaction, and are strengthened in our opinions by the many testimonials from old pupils and parents telling us what the School has been to them, begging us to continue our work and longing for just such a school for boys. We can but believe we have a mission yet—although the one hundred and twenty-fifth milestone is passed—having been founded by Ann Parish in 1796.

The following official letter comes to us from Dr. Lyons after several visits to the School to examine each child from a health stand-point and also to give health talks.

"AIMWELL SCHOOL—

To whom it may concern."

"It was with much interest that I made my first visit to Aimwell School, 860 N. Randolph Street. Knowing rather intimately the work of Public Schools, I was anxious to see the place a Special might have. Because of the Nutrition Class established by the "Philadelphia Dairy Council" I have had an opportunity to know rather intimately the kind of work being done here, and I am convinced that the training these girls receive is fitting them for life as the Public Schools cannot. We make a great effort to get book knowledge to our children, forgetting the fact that very soon they will be in homes of their own with no training for the duties of homemaking. But this School is supplying a knowledge for making good homes as well as giving them the book knowledge. The home atmosphere of the School and the interested faces are proof of the lessons taught. While the substantial interest of the alumnae of the School testifies of the lasting lessons learned."

This letter from a stranger seems to answer all the questions referred to. If more Friends were interested to investigate our work, more would help us. It is a busy world, a day of interest in "big things." People are thinking and working on generous lines for "Charities Abroad," but are we sufficiently mindful of home conditions?

The hope of our country is in the betterment of children—both white and colored, they must be taught right living. There lies our hope.

Herbert Hoover recently said, "Give and give generously for work 'Abroad,' but first know that 'Home Charities' are not neglected."

AN APPEAL FROM THE MOTHERS OF RUSSIA.

A group of the mothers of Russia recently issued an appeal to the civilized world. It appeared in Ogin, a Russian newspaper published in Prague. It reads:

"We Russian mothers who are destined to die from starvation and disease implore the people of the whole world to take our children from us, that those who are innocent may not share our horrible fate. We implore the world to do this because, even at the cost of a voluntary and eternal separation, we long to repair the wrong we have committed in giving them a life which is worse than death. All of you who have children, or who have lost children, all of you who have children and fear to lose them, in remembrance of the children who are dead and in the name of those who are still living we beseech you. Have pity upon our children. Do not think of us, we cannot be helped. We have lost all hope, but we shall yet be happy with the only happiness a mother knows—that of the knowledge that her child is safe."

YES, clothes are needed.

It is not as you may have begun to think, that surely by this time Europe has ceased to need clothes. Instead of that, the real condition is that those brothers and sisters of ours across the seas will need more clothes the coming winter than they have for any winter in the past five years.

In Austria, Poland and Russia the middle and lower classes are really destitute of clothing. Stocks and reserves were exhausted long ago, and there has been no money to buy clothing even if there had been raw material in Europe out of which clothes might be made.

In Vienna the value of the crown has dwindled so that it practically has no power at all for purchasing. It is now quoted at the rate of 6.182 to the dollar. The people whom this most greatly affects are the middle-class people. They are the office workers, the students, the teachers, the professors in the universities, the doctors and all of those who once held civil positions under the old government. These people are helpless. They cannot leave Vienna, for they are not trained for any other kind of work than their own and there is no place to go which would benefit them. To continue living in Vienna means an existence on a salary which, in the majority of cases, does not exceed the value of Twenty-five Dollars in purchasing power a year. These are people who are men like ourselves, doing the same kind of work and understanding the same spirit of life and hemmed in by that terrible wall of no resource and the futility of leaving the city. It is just what our condition would be if our money lost its power. These people cannot buy clothes. When they cannot buy food, the purchasing of clothing becomes totally remote. Whatever they wear of clothing must be given to them. Have you something?

In Poland, 30,000 refugees a week, most of whom have been exiled from their native land for five years, are returning to Poland. They are coming without money, without household goods, and return to their old homes which they find devastated. Can you understand that their only clothing will be that which is given to them?

In Russia typhus and cholera can only be stopped by cleanliness. They are dirty diseases. Without soap, without fuel or hot water, and starved into such weakness that exertion is impossible, the Russian people cannot hope to prevent their little stock of clothing becoming too dirty for human beings to wear. They need clean clothing, but can neither make nor buy.

The people of Europe need clothes. If you have any that are strong and wearable, will you not send at once to the Friends' Store-room at Fiftenth and Cherry Streets, Philadelphia?

DON'T FORGET THE SEWING MEETING ON THIRD-DAY.

The Women's Work Committee of the Service Committee asks that every woman who possibly can, will volunteer for work in the Third-day sewing group which meets all day Third-days in Room No. 3 of the Fifteenth and Race Streets Meeting House. The garments which will be sent to Europe will be repaired and put into shape for wearing. Every one who can, is asked to bring old lining material which is fit to be used to reline the garments.

TYPHUS GRIPS EAST POLAND.

Day after day increases the list of typhus sufferers throughout Poland, but especially along the railroads by which the Polish refugees of the great war are now crowding back from the Volga famine area in Russia. This is the substance of a report which Anna Louise Strong, one of the Friends' workers in Poland, sent to the Service Committee this week. East Poland, that wide section of territory inhabited by White Russians and Ukrainians and only last year annexed to Poland as a result of this war with Russia, is especially afflicted with the scourge, since here live the greatest number of the destitute peasants now returning.

Three members of the Friends' Mission in Poland have been ill, but are recovering, although reports from the Friends' Mission across the border in Russia indicate that ten of the thirty members, both English and American, have been ill with typhus and two have died.

There seems no possibility of permanently stemming this disease for two or three years, without a greater expenditure than either Russia or Poland will be able to undertake. Summer will, of course, greatly decrease its prevalence, but next winter it will begin again and continue as long as the movement of refugees from Russia back to Poland continues. For these refugees are destitute peasants, who lost their homes in the great war, and who have suffered seven years of exile. They have no change of clothing or underwear. They return in the same sheepskins in which they set out years ago. Under these conditions the stamping out of a louse-carried disease is impossible without spending more money. There are still more than 600,000 refugees to return from Russia; and as long as they are moving along the railroads they will cause serious trouble both in Poland and Russia.

Efficient quarantine would in part stop the spread of the disease. The Friends' Mission is presenting fifty typhus-proof suits for the use of the personnel in the new repatriation camp just opened at Dorohusk.

A CHANCE FOR OLD AGE.

Recent disclosures from the reputed diary of Tolstoy show how intolerable super-supervision may become to its victim, even at the age of eighty-two. Whatever may have been the motives peculiar to this instance, life furnishes many obvious examples of old age made uncomfortable by over attention to its welfare.

John Muir clearly felt that he and Emerson together suffered less through the interference of kindred, unduly anxious and "full of indoor philosophy." These two congenial spirits had met for the first time in—of all places in the world—Yosemite Park, and John had eagerly enticed Emerson into agreeing to spend a night by a campfire of fragrant sequoia. "Come on and make an immortal Emerson-night of it," pleaded Muir. But it could not be. There was a possibility he might take cold, and so the boyish plan was thrust aside by the hand of conventional prudence.

It is probably better to let our aging friends, even though they are very precious to us, run an occasional risk than to deny them opportunity for carrying out their own rightful temperamental impulses. It is exceedingly profitless to force old age to be always seeing itself as old age, to hover over it with solicitude, to thrust upon it advice, and increase its weakness and its easy tendency to lean on the judgment of others. A thing without savor is an existence robbed of initiative and expectation. Joseph Jefferson said truly, "The saddest thing in old age is the absence of expectation." This potent enchantment is destroyed when care after care is taken away until the hands are enfeebled and the heart is empty.

Jefferson adds: "When you are over seventy don't forget to cultivate a garden. It is all expectation." I have often seen a man of over eighty, bent with an endless couch, sitting on a little box in the heart of his fat garden, hoeing and weeding, busy, useful, happy. When one's heritage has shrunk from acres of corn and cattle to a checkered garden plot, the problem is how to find God as truly and as greatly among the cabbage plants as He was once to be found in the sumptuous, boundless days of youth and prime. This is what a woman found in her garden one day last summer.

THE LEEK.

A year ago here grew
Out of this lone dark soil
A glittering tuft of leek;
The grubbing hand of toil
Left it alone the summer through,
And winter came and blew
Its white sands over spindles
Golden-tipped and sleek.
This July day I made Discovery. Behold!
Tall, reed-like, robin-blue,
Here thrives the leek;
On every sturdy cane a ball of white
Holding in lucid cluster
That crimson-copper light,
That strange wild lustre
That plays within the thunder-storm at night.
And this is what a wisp of leek becomes
When it is old!

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

THREE Friends who are attending Wellesley College recently wrote the following letter to their home Monthly Meeting:

DEAR FRIENDS:—

After an inspiring week-end in which the secretaries of nearly every denomination have visited us, we feel, more than ever, gratitude for the interest of our home meeting. Although we had no secretary to meet with at this time, we felt unusually close to you. It was the privilege of one of us to be present at a meeting of the denominational secretaries, a few faculty members, and a very few girls, called together to see what the college and what the churches could do to improve the relation between the college girl and the church and to fit the girl for active work in her home church.

It was interesting to discover that all the suggestions made to the churches were the very things that you have been doing for us. After almost every Monthly Meeting you have sent us personal letters telling of the spirit as well as of the business of the meeting. You have sent us secretaries, or, at least, representatives, who have helped us solve our problems, answered our questions, and encouraged us when our efforts seemed in vain; and at all times you have shown an undying interest in us. We have always appreciated this, but never as now when we realize how much more we have than other denominations.

For this reason we wish to express our gratitude for your care and oversight.

Your friends.

This Monthly Meeting, through committees, has several times, sent letters of a personal character to its absent members describing the sessions of the meeting and giving other information of interest. A number of its members have from time to time visited in the neighborhood of Wellesley, and several of these have taken pains to get in touch with the Friends at the college.

THE Macmillan Company, 64-66 Fifth Avenue, New York, is issuing a neat eight-page catalogue of its publications written by Friends. The booklet bears the title, "A Selected List of Quaker Books," and lists a score of works by well-known Friendly authors.

S. EDGAR NICHOLSON, for twenty-seven years an officer of the Anti-Saloon League, has given up his active work with the League to join the headquarters staff of the National Council for the Reduction of Armaments. He will assist Frederick J. Libby in carrying out the immediate program of the National Council, giving special attention to the development of a legislative committee, which will study all measures before Congress from the point of view of their influence for and against war.

The 1921 Annual Report of the Christiansburg Institute has recently been received. This is one of the colored schools in the south that Philadelphia Friends feel especially responsible for. The report states the school's position fairly and the management is to be congratulated. One need but spend a few hours driving through the country, adjacent to the school, to be satisfied with the leavening work it has done and is still doing for the community. Christiansburg can be reached in time for an early breakfast, after having taken an early supper at the Broad Street Station restaurant the evening before. You can spend a full day there and reversing the schedule can be in Philadelphia the morning of the following day.

While Cheyney asks for and must receive the sympathy of Philadelphia Friends, there are reasons for supposing that the annual donations that have gone into her treasury will not be asked for. Where can a better field for these be found than at Christiansburg, Virginia?

The Principal's report of the Christiansburg Institute closes thus:—

Again and again do we hear the query: What promise does the Negro give of his usefulness in the future of this country? Lavish treasure and abundant sacrifice have been poured out in his behalf, and it is naturally expected that some results will show for all this effort. Christiansburg attempts to answer this reasonable question for those entitled to know, by pointing to the thousands of children trained here and to its hundreds of graduates at work, leading useful lives in the various communities where they have located. Not many of them can claim much prominence, and none of them greatness, measured by the world's standards, but they stand as examples of excellence in the lower levels—a little higher than the generation which preceded them, and with aspiration to lift the one to follow them a little higher than they.

I count it a great privilege to have been associated with Friends in the good work they have done at Christiansburg, and I trust it may not be thought presumptuous of me to express the feeling and hope that the ideals for which they stand may find their way into the hearts of my people that we may contribute our share in bringing about that "peace on earth, good will to men" which the Son of Righteousness came to establish.

A JOINT Committee of the two branches of Friends in Baltimore are arranging for the celebration of the 250th anniversary of the establishment of the meeting, to be held Fifth Month 4th to 7th. The Yearly Meeting was founded by George Fox at West River 1672. Friends built the first religious house in Baltimore in 1734, the oldest place of worship in Maryland still standing, in the outskirts of Easton, on the Third Haven River, is in a fair state of preservation, but not in regular use. William Penn attended meeting in it, but not George Fox, whose visit antedated its erection by a few years.

A JAPANESE EXPONENT OF QUAKERISM.—A most interesting piece of "Quaker outpost" work recently done in our very midst, was the outline of Quaker principles given to a little gathering in a London hotel, the hearers being members of a Japanese educational mission in this country, including an official likely to become the Japanese Education Ministry. The speaker was Dr. Tatunosuke Ueda, who, while he is studying economics in London, is living at the Penn Club. Dr. Ueda first came into touch with Friends in his own country, through the fine work of Gilbert Bowles. He hopes to be able to throw himself into the same work when he returns home. Meanwhile, through his three years in Philadelphia and his contact with Friends in England, he is learning all he can concerning the meaning and application of Quakerism. And as the above gathering proves, he is not content only to take in but is anxious to pass on from the mint of his own experience the message of the Quaker way of life.—GERRARD ROBERTS, in The Friend (London).

FOURTH MONTH 2ND being the first "First day in the month" the Merchantville Meeting will be held at 3 o'clock p. m. Trolley cars leaving Camden Ferry (Market St.) stop at Maple Terrace which is in front of Meeting house.

The Ancient Friends' Meeting House in Newport, Rhode Island, and the Meeting House Grounds are to be Sold

The Meeting House property at Newport, Rhode Island, having been offered for sale by the Trustees, and Rhode Island Monthly Meeting having approved of their action, a movement has been started by about 20 men and women to buy the property, and allow it to be used for a much-needed community centre. An option was secured on the property, which option soon expires, to purchase it for $28,000. The Newport Trust Company has agreed to loan $14,000 on mortgage, to be paid when the other $14,000 have been raised by subscription. Of this $14,000, ten thousand have been promised. Friends have been communicated with, so far as possible, and they approve without a dissenting voice and are contributing. The Committee is forming itself into a corporation, and the plan would be to preserve in its ancient appearance the oldest part of the Meeting House (1705) and that the whole property shall serve a useful and dignified purpose. As many Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting have worshipped in this house, it is hoped they will feel interested to subscribe. For further information consult

"I have been through five depressions during my business life. They all act alike. This latest one acts exactly like the rest. The men, who if business fell off 66 per cent, increase their selling efforts 75 per cent, would pull through as if there was no depression; and the efforts of such men tend to shorten the periods of depression."

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

II.

Three joint sessions were held this year: on Second-day morning, Third-day afternoon and Fourth-day afternoon. There seemed, for the most part, a greater dignity about them than was the case a year ago. But the increasing volume of business which claims our attention during the five days' session seems almost to preclude that deliberation, that waiting upon God to know His will for the Meeting, which formerly differentiated Yearly Meeting sessions from those of the ordinary conference or convention, and which many greatly miss.

Second-day morning, Third Month 27th.—Of the 129 representatives appointed by the different Quarterly Meetings only ten failed to answer to their names, and for six of these reasons for their absence were assigned. A joint committee of six was set apart to draw up a "Minute of Exercises," to be read at the concluding session. Twenty-one communications, addressed to the Yearly Meeting, had been received, and another small committee was appointed to examine and report on these. The Committee appointed last year to nominate ten Friends to the Representative Meeting, and who at that time presented only four names, now reported on the remaining six, which appeared to be satisfactory to the meeting. The new members are: Henry W. Comfort, J. Edgar Rhoads, Charles D. Barton, Sarah W. Elkinton, George Vaux, Jr., and Henry T. Brown. It was decided that the term of service be six years, and that one-half of the Representative Meeting be retired every three years. The minutes of this meeting were read, and followed with interest by the Yearly Meeting.

A gain of thirty-two members for the year was noted, our membership being now 4,493. Three Quarterly Meetings (Abington, Western and Haddonfield and Salem) reported on the subject of Birthright Membership. They felt no change was desirable. The other Quarterly Meetings were advised to report on the question another year.

Third-day morning, the 28th.—Adjourned session of the meeting of Ministers and Elders. The Queries were read and answered. In addition to the visitors noted last week, Elizabeth Braithwaite Emmott, of Reigate, England, and her sister, Anna Braithwaite Thomas, of Baltimore, were present. "Returning minutes" for E. Maria Bishop and William Littleboy were read. It was stated by one of those whose memory goes back the farthest that this was the first time in sixty years that such a minute had been granted to a minister of London Yearly Meeting.

Third-day afternoon.—The Representatives reported the following for Clerks: Davis H. Forsythe and Mary R. Williams, and to assist them, John D. Carter, Francis R. Taylor, Sarah Emlen Moore and Elizabeth B. Jones.

The Committee on Christian Labor in Foreign Lands presented their report. In accordance with its suggestions, they were released and a new, temporary committee appointed, to study the problem of the work of the Friends' Foreign Missionary Association being taken over by the Yearly Meeting.

Of the twenty-one letters addressed to the Yearly Meeting, seven were read. These were from Friends in Ireland, Australia, New Zealand, Germany (three letters), and West China. A Committee was appointed to draft replies to these and to write a letter to Friends in Japan. Six delegates were appointed to represent Philadelphia at the 250th anniversary of Baltimore Yearly Meeting, in the Fifth Month. These were Davis H. Forsythe, William B. Harvey, John Way, Annette G. Way, Amelia M. Gummere and Mary Vaux Walcott.

An invitation to send fraternal delegates to the Five Years' Meeting in the Ninth Month brought the meeting to a high tension for a time. It seemed finally to be the sense of the meeting that we could show our love and desire for fellowship by accepting such an invitation, without compromising our clearly recognized position on the matter of worship and the ministry. This session held for more than four hours.

Fourth-day morning (separate sessions).—The reading and answering of the Queries occupied this session. Concord Quarterly Meeting's proposal that a positively worded Query, relating to the right use of our leisure time, be substituted for the present Fifth Query with its enumeration of certain (among many) forms of diversions deemed undesirable, was referred to the Representative Meeting for its judgment another year.

Fourth-day afternoon (Joint) was the time when, in the view of many of us, the high-water mark of the Yearly Meeting was reached. The Social Order Committee's report was read, together with the Quarterly Meeting's answers to the two special Social Order Queries. Rufus M. Jones and Wilbur K. Thomas, Chairman and Executive Secretary respectively of the American Friends' Service Committee, were in attendance and spoke to us impressively of the situation in Austria, Poland and Russia and of the work of their Committee. The report of the Peace Committee naturally accompanied this. It was stated that over $81,000 had been transmitted by the Peace Committee to the A. F. S. C. the past year. But we were forcibly reminded that we had done only that which it was our duty to do in the face of the appalling need, and were still "unprofitable servants."

Fifth-day morning.—Meetings for worship were held as usual at Twelfth Street and Arch Street, and a Children's Meeting was held in the East Room at Arch Street. This last was arranged by the Young Friends' Committee for those between the ages of ten and fourteen.

Fifth-day afternoon.—Report was made by the Extension Committee, appointed one year ago. Their work has consisted largely in the holding of conferences and the distribution of the so-called "Pennsbury Leaflets" among clergymen, the Y. M. C. A., and the religious press. A Committee to visit the subordinate meetings, especially the smaller, struggling ones, was felt to be advisable at this time. It seemed late in the week for this to be appointed in the usual way (by the suggestion of a nominating committee), so the expedient was resorted to of having the Extension Committee authorized to nominate such a group at its leisure and the Representative Meeting authorized to confirm such nominations. It is to be hoped that this does not become a usual method of procedure in the future, as it is not a desirable or dignified manner of setting apart our Yearly Meeting Committees. We need to guard against the tendency to increase the mechanical element in carrying out our meeting matters, and to pre-arranged nominations and speaking to business. "Business methods" have, after all, but a limited usefulness in rightly conducted Friends' meetings, and we need to beware of the stifling effects of too much "efficiency."

The Westtown report showed a slightly decreased attendance helping to account for a deficit of a little over $9,000. But the farm, in spite of adverse crop and market conditions, showed a profit of $2,000. The School would appear to be in a flourishing, healthful state, from every point of view.

An impressive memorial concerning our dearly loved Friend Samuel Emlen, prepared by Germantown Monthly Meeting, was read, reminding us once more of our loss in the departure of this faithful minister of Jesus Christ. Instead of the usual tea-meeting at Twelfth Street, supper was served in the East Room, and afterwards about 1200 people gathered to hear Paul Jones, formerly bishop of Utah and now Secretary of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, speak on the results of the Washington Conference. He emphasized the fact that the general spirit of those in authority has not yet changed much. Frederick J. Libby followed, challenging us to do our part in abolishing war in this decade.

Sixth-day, the 31st.—A proposed letter to President Harding was read, urging the release of the one hundred or more "political" prisoners now serving long sentences in Leavenworth and elsewhere, for offences which, before the war, would not have caused their arrest. It was hoped that this letter could be delivered in person by a deputation. An "Epistle Committee" was named, who should be charged with the examining of all letters, etc., addressed to the Yearly Meeting during the year. Five delegates were appointed to a Conference of Christian Churches opposed to war, and nine "fraternal delegates" to the Five Years' Meeting were approved. Reports were made by the Friends' Fiduciary Corporation, and by the Committee appointed to draft letters to Dublin, Australia, Germany, Japan, New Zealand, West China and to the seven Conservative Yearly Meetings (also to Friends in Fritchley, Derbyshire, England). Unusually live letters were produced. The Committees on Inter-racial Relations, Organic Church Union and Education reported at this time. A letter, forwarded by the Peace Committee to the Christian Churches throughout the world, was finally authorized to be sent out under our name. The impressive "Minute of Exercises" and the Clerk's concluding minute brought this full and interesting Yearly Meeting to a close.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION TO THE YEARLY MEETING.

Since our last report to the Yearly Meeting, many interesting and significant things have been taking place in our eight schools. The school year may be characterized as a year of spiritual power: our ideals have been enlarged, our courage renewed, our purposes strengthened as together we have worked at our common problem. Our sense of obligation to our children is more than ever awake, as the world situation, with its vast opportunities and demands, presses upon us. In this sense of obligation we would have you share. These are your eight schools, with their 356 children, eighty per cent. of whom are non-Friends, and whom you have a unique opportunity to reach in their formative years, by your Christian message. It is your privilege with us so to extend the ideals for which we stand, through the schools, that the door to an abundant life may be opened for our children, and that working through our schools more and more the things of the spirit may come to be the common and abiding possessions of mankind.

Our aim in educating the children in our schools may be put, broadly speaking, in the words of a recent writer, "to bring the child out and into something. Into the real world, out of half-worlds and barren-regions, into the best and the eternal." Believing that whatever we wish to get into the life of a nation, we must first get into our schools, with the world needs before us, the work of our little schools becomes both a challenge and an opportunity. The most important years of a child's life are in our hands in these schools. If we can fill these early years with right activities, full of purpose, if we can provide for them experiences of great richness, where action is dynamic; if we can give them freedom to work out creative impulses, believing that we learn by doing and, by cultivating right attitudes towards work, start them on the road to good citizenship; if we can give them a chance to develop initiative, to acquire ability for independent thinking, develop leadership, we believe in all these opportunities we are starting them on the right way of living. In the words of our late Superintendent: "We aim to make self-control a more potent factor than teacher-control, and believe it to be of permanent value, and so we give much freedom which the child learns to respect, to guard zealously by using wisely. Without exception, the schools in which there is granted the greatest freedom for choice, for judgment, there is the finest self-control, the most courteous consideration of others."

As again and again we find in our experience that the thing lacking to make our Monthly Meetings function to their full power is a sense of responsibility in our membership, we are, in our little schools, trying to encourage our children in developing this fundamental lack, by sharing the every-day responsibilities of school life with them. They are learning to enjoy and delight in true, honest work, they are finding that real and satisfying pleasures come from work in which hand and soul share alike, and thus they learn through their own experience the worthy use of leisure time. If we once establish this eager attitude towards creative work in our children, we shall have little occasion to be concerned over any interest in popular amusements.

If we conceive of Peace as an energy, as something creative, as "a deliberate and planned co-operation of peoples in the service of life," shall we not feel that children must begin to make this energy function in their lives at a very early age? With this conception of Peace, we have been endeavoring to establish in our schools certain attitudes of mind and spirit, such as consideration for the rights of others, appreciation of both near-at-hand and distant peoples, the cultivation of kindness, and all that makes for friendliness of thought. We give them a study of other lands and peoples, contact with returned missionaries, lectures from those who have been in service in foreign fields, bringing home the stories of German and French children, of Japanese and Chinese and Dutch boys and girls, and starving little Russians. Letters are exchanged with some of these, sympathies are enlarged, children begin to think in terms of internationalism, and voluntarily the lesson of brotherhood and world suffering is translated into joyous self-sacrificing service. During the recent Conference at Washington, many of our children followed the proceedings with interest and concern. Letters were dispatched to President Harding and the Secretary of State, signed by "loyal citizens" and stating that their motto was "Blessed are the Peace Makers." Truly out of the mouths of babes in our little schools may we not feel that praise has been perfected?

We might tell of many more activities and plans which are being worked out in a quiet way in these schools. If you have read the reports of our Superintendent that have appeared in the issues of THE FRIEND for the past two years, you are not unmindful of our aims and some of our actual accomplishments. For any who may feel that they have not kept pace in their thought with the newer education in our schools, it may be well to say that the solid vigorous work is by no means neglected. As witness to this fact careful inquiry shows that our children not only pass easily into higher schools, whether public or private, but that in those schools almost without exception they make records of scholarship which bring credit to the foundation laid in the Yearly Meeting Schools.

As teachers and Committee Friends we have this past year had our ideas enlarged and stimulated by group experiences, when we have held conferences and meetings with noted educators outside of our state who have come to tell us of the work of their progressive schools, and to encourage us in the work we are doing. Again and again we hear from such educators that the opportunity of the Friends' School is unique. With a body of earnest seekers of the Truth behind us in our schools, it is ours to carry the torch forward. And the light that never was on sea or land may come to others through our continued faithfulness and effort.

Five years ago, our Committee on Education was the recipient of a gift of $10,000, by an unknown donor, with the request that the principal and interest both be spent in raising the standard of our schools. Most jealously have the custodians of this gift watched over it, that not a penny should go where it would not be used to the best advantage. We ask you to-day to look at some of the results. Communities have been helped in their efforts to increase the efficiency of their schools, as in enlarging and dignifying the old Haddonfield School House, where the sixth generation of one family is now being educated, to help convert the one-room dingy building at Media into a worthy school-house, to aid the small community of Friends at Downingtown in starting a school by contributing towards the cost of the finest and most modern school building in our Yearly Meeting, to work with the Atlantic City School to meet a few of its crying needs, to give Lansdowne a lift over some difficult places, to help it become the splendid school that it is, to help the joint school at London Grove have a larger life, and to assist in smaller degree Frankford and Fallsington.

In addition to this help we have used this gift money to provide for all the schools special teachers in drawing and physical culture, to grant bonuses to our teachers during the early war period when salaries were far from commensurate with increased cost of living, and to help furnish books and some special equipment for our schools. Each grant to a community has been most carefully considered.

This wonderful, magical fund, which has wrought such changes in our schools, and which has been a source of encouragement to all who have labored for their advancement, will soon be exhausted. But our vision for the further enlargement and betterment of our schools is a growing vision. We plead that you may see our opportunities as little schools, that the vision may be yours, of the possibilities that lie at our very door. The realization of our concern for better, saner world, of our longings for a new social order, of our work for international peace and brotherhood, of our urgent need for leaders in our Society, for missionaries, for teachers and preachers, for outreaching service of every kind as limitless as love itself, has its most natural beginning, we truly believe, within the walls of our little schools. And we would suggest that if we would make our Yearly Meeting School at Westtown worthy of the best tradition of Friends, we must begin the work in our elementary schools, with the children and the communities in which they live.

At the beginning of the school year, our Committee was greatly saddened by the news that our Superintendent, Gertrude R. Sherer, was ill with a fatal disease and would be unable to return to us. So vital was her interest and so devoted her love for our schools, that at our request she gladly undertook to continue her work from her home in Massachusetts, and has kept closely in touch with each school through a voluminous correspondence with children, teachers and Committee Friends. We believe it is impossible to estimate the far-reaching effects of her work for this year. Our schools and teachers, stimulated by her heroic example of unselfish living, are bound together as with a golden chain of love. Little children who have confided in her all their joys, teachers who have felt "her warm hand over the hard places," Committee Friends who have found in her an inspiring leader, all mourn her departure. But the work of Gertrude Roberts Sherer for our schools will go on. Her spirit will be with us as we work, and still hearten our every effort for the higher, larger life of the boys and girls who will soon be the men and women of this Yearly Meeting. We believe that it is not too much to say that she has in her large work in our schools helped little children to find God.

For the Committee,

CLEMENT B. WEBSTER,
Chairman.

THE HAPPY LIFE.

How happy is he born and taught
That serveth not another's will;
Whose armor is his honest thought,
And simple truth his utmost skill!

Whose passions not his masters are;
Whose soul is still prepared for death,
Not hid unto the world with care,
Of public fame, or private breath;

Who envies none that chance doth raise,
Or vice; who never understood
How deepest wounds are given by praise;
Nor rules of state, but rules of good;

Who hath his life from rumors freed,
Whose conscience is his strong retreat;
Whose state can neither flatterers feed,
Nor ruin make oppressors great;

Who God doth love and early pray
More of his grace than gifts to lend;
And entertains the harmless day
With a religious book or friend;

This man is freed from servile bands
Of hope to rise, or fear to fall;
Lord of himself, though not of lands;
And having nothing, yet hath all.

—H. WOTTON.

CHRIST IN US.

It is the language of Scripture that Christ in us is our hope of glory; that Christ formed in us—living, growing, and raising. His own Life and Spirit in us is our only Salvation. And indeed all this is plain from the nature of the thing, for since the serpent, sin, death, and hell, are all essentially within us, the very growth of our nature,—must not our redemption be equally inward, an inward essential death to this state of our souls, and an inward growth of a contrary life within us? If Adam was only an outward person, if his whole nature was not our nature, born in us, and derived from him into us, it would be nonsense to say that his fall is our fall. So in like manner, if Christ our second Adam was only an outward person, if he entered not as deeply into our nature as the first Adam does; if we have not as really from Him a new inward, spiritual man, as we have outward flesh and blood from Adam, what ground could there be to say that our righteousness is from Him as our sin is from Adam?

Let no one here think to charge me with disregard to the holy Jesus, who was born of the Virgin Mary, or of setting up an inward Savior in opposition to that outward Christ whose history is recorded in the Gospel. No; it is with the utmost fullness of faith and assurance, that I ascribe all our redemption to that blessed and mysterious Person that was then born of the Virgin Mary; and will assert no inward redemption but what wholly proceeds from, and is effected by, that life-giving Redeemer who died on the Cross for our redemption.

Were I to say that a plant, or vegetable, must have the sun within it, must have the life, light, and virtues of the sun incorporated in it, that it has no benefit from the sun till the sun is thus inwardly forming, generating, quickening, and raising in it, would this be setting up an inward sun in opposition to the outward one? Could anything be more ridiculous than such a charge? For is not all that is here said of an inward sun in the vegetable, so much said of a power and virtue derived from the sun in the firmament? So, in like manner, all that is said of an inward Christ, inwardly formed and generated in the root of the soul, is only so much said of an inward life, brought forth by the power and efficacy of that blessed Christ who was born of the Virgin Mary.

THE EFFECT OF THE WAR ON FRIENDS IN AMERICA.

ELBERT RUSSELL.

[This article was prepared as one of the series on "Present Tendencies in the Society of Friends in America," for The Quaker, but not published with the rest of the series.—Eds.]

The Great War found Friends divided in their attitude toward it and the issues which it raised. The differences were greater with us than with most other denominations. With them there was no tradition against a "righteous" war; only a few exceptional pacifists among them were ready to take the Quaker position. Our traditional position held the members with varying degrees of power. In the main the war served to accentuate the differences already latent and to confirm each member in his previous attitude.

With regard to the war, three distinct groups emerged. Some kept from conviction to the traditional pacifists opposition to all war as incompatible with Christianity. From this group there were many young men in America who went to the camps as conscientious objectors and who would not accept any alternative service. Some few suffered mistreatment in the cantonments, although there was little persecution of Quaker conscientious objectors here compared to what the English Friends suffered. Only thirteen Friends were sentenced to military prisons. It was this group of convinced pacifists who took the lead in the financing and management of the work of the American Friends' Service Committee and supplied most of the personnel of its workers. The fact that they continued to volunteer for this service after the war closed removed to a large extent from the public mind the suspicion that young men Friends took the C. O. attitude because they were slackers or draft-dodgers.

Another large group of Friends retained their opposition to war generally, but felt that an exception should be made of this war, because of the moral issues involved and the "righteous" aims of the Allied forces. Both these groups were agreed that the Society should not change its official attitude toward war; and thanks to the intense conviction of the first group, and the acquiescence of the second, all the official pronouncements were kept in line with Friends' traditional principles. Since the close of the war, the second group has presented no practical problem of serious importance. Those who composed it are ready to work for peace and to support efforts to prevent future wars. They regarded the last war as exceptional. The delegates to the London Conference included some of them, but they made little protest against the strong position which the Conference took. Many of them were led to support the war under the belief that it was "a war to end war" and that it was the only practicable way to make sure of the triumph of democracy and justice and of the reign of peace. The years following the armistice have shown them how they were misled by irresponsible spokesmen and governmental propaganda. Disillusioned by the character of the peace settlement, the treatment of Russia, the spirit of France, and the continued wars and social unrest, they will not soon again put their trust "in horses and chariots because they are many and strong."

The third group frankly denounced the pacifist tradition, went along with the tide of patriotic opinion, and actively supported the war. This group was strongest among Liberal Friends because of their greater individualism and their attitude after the Civil War, and among some of the Five Years' Meeting Friends where new elements brought in during the Great Revival had not been thoroughly indoctrinated with our peace principles, and where the habit of going with the general sentiments and activities of the community had made public sentiment stronger than the hold of the Quaker peace tradition.

The third group has created no serious disciplinary problem, such as arose at the close of the Civil war. We have outgrown the custom of disowning and have grown in tolerance. In most places, there is a disposition to respect the patriotism and sincerity of the young men who took active military service; and to allow them to remain in membership with Friends unless they voluntarily resign. If they are conscious of the exceptional attitude they took, and do not resent vigorous peace propaganda by the Society as if it were a reflection upon their conduct, nor put obstacles in the way of a positive peace testimony by the Society, their continued membership will create no serious problem for the future. The Society must share in a measure the responsibility for their defection, because in most cases it did not properly train them in our peace principles. On the whole, our ministry had not emphasized our testimony as to the essential connection between Christianity and peace. Our membership had been taught to accept doctrines which left room for some kinds of war, or converted to an experience which did not take away the passions from which wars and fightings come; or to a repentance that did not involve renunciation of all selfishness, individual or national, which seeks its own advantage to another's hurt. If they remain in membership, there is the best chance of having them come under influences that may ultimately lead them to share the fundamental attitude of Friends from conviction.

It is impossible to secure full or accurate statistics to show in what proportions Friends of the various groups assumed the attitudes given above. The best information obtainable for the Five Years' Meeting and Ohio Yearly Meeting (P) indicates that here we saved our Quaker soul "so as by fire." A large number of our ministers sanctioned and supported the war, as did a large proportion of the membership. In some cases meetings purchased Liberty Bonds. The volume of money contributed by Progressive Friends to the Red Cross, Y. M. C. A., and similar "drives" was apparently—no statistics are available—much in excess of that contributed to the American Friends' Service Committee. The Yearly Meetings belonging to the Five Years' Meeting comprise in their membership about three-fourths of the Friends in America. Up to the beginning of 1919, there was contributed to the work of the American Friends' Service Committee from all sources $909,731.33. Most of this came from Friends, the membership of the Five Years' Meeting furnishing $8130,326.78, or a little less than 15 per cent. of the total.

Full statistics are lacking as to the attitude of the young Friends of the Five Years' Meeting and Ohio (P) toward military service. An attempt to secure statistics from the monthly meetings brought replies from meetings representing only about 27 per cent. of the membership. Conclusions drawn from them must be taken with reserve. Nevertheless, the general showing cannot be ignored. These reports would indicate (if the proportions hold for the meetings not reporting, which is not at all certain) that of the young men drafted or liable to the draft possibly 350 stood against any service under military direction as straight out C. O.'s; about 600 accepted some form of non-combatant service, and about 2300 went into combatant service. The total number of men and women in Reconstruction service (to First Month 1, 1919) was 251. To these should be added probably 50 furloughed for farm work. There is no means of knowing how many served in the army, Y. M. C. A. or Red Cross. In many cases young Friends known to have conscientious scruples against war were given deferred classification or exempted for farm work by their draft boards. For these reasons it is difficult to estimate the number of young Friends who took the full C. O. position.

SOME QUAKER CHARACTERISTICS OF SEVENTY YEARS AGO.

[The current number of the Friends' Quarterly Examiner contains a reminiscent paper on Quaker Characteristics in England seventy years ago. It could easily be matched by experiences on this side the Atlantic if one searched a few family diaries of those days. The author, then a lad, engaged in a city office, recounts some of his own experiences.—Eds.]

Our business premises were closed for two hours on the mid-week meeting day that all assistants might share in the privilege of our solemn and often living times of worship. I confess I was often glad when my father and grandmother finally shook hands and "broke up"; but I think the training was useful, though frequently our thoughts wandered to picturing what the damp stains on the walls and the knots in the unvarnished wood of the dado might be made to represent. A dear aunt of mine was our only recorded Minister, and though occasionally a man Friend spoke he was not generally approved. My aunt was very often away paying religious visits to distant parts of England or Ireland, so that it was no unusual event to meet for many weeks in solemn silence.

The ministry in Friends' meeting was generally of a very different order from that which prevails to-day. Much of it was to impress on us the necessity of being faithful to our testimonies, and almost all our preachers intoned their sermons—much as our late Friend Anna Fox used to do—indeed it came to be looked on as a mark of Divine unction, and to be cultivated rather than avoided. I well remember an American Minister telling us that when he first began to speak in meetings, some good Elders called on him to encourage him and one of them added, "If thou art faithful, dear young man, thou wilt learn the tune in time." This was ———, and he had certainly learnt his lesson well!

Yet some of the Ministers I knew as a boy were most excellent and mighty. I never forgot such men as Benjamin Seeborn, John Pease, John Hodgkin and others. John Pease was called "The Silver Trumpet of the North." Some were very wordy, one, a connection of my own, would ring out a succession of words "in, by, through, toward and concerning us," but he avowed it was from an earnest concern to speak exact truth. I remember his beginning his prayer in meeting with the words "really, truly and surely; surely, truly and really."

Our meetings for discipline were often taken up a good deal with disownments, chiefly for "marrying out"—or for marrying first cousins, and many a good Christian family has been lost to us by that most un-Christian rule. I knew of one case when a young man informed the overseers of his engagement to a girl not a Friend. They told him he must be disowned if he married her, and he so much valued his membership that he gave the girl up. Then the overseers told him that he must be disowned for breaking his engagement, so finding he was on the horns of a dilemma he married the girl and was disowned accordingly.

Weddings were difficult in those days, as the engaged couples had to "pass the meeting" as it was called, that is, they had to come together into the Men's and then the Women's Monthly Meeting (always then held separately) and say, "Friends, I intend to take my friend to be my wife, if the Lord permit." This was done in the Monthly Meeting to which the young woman belonged, but the young man alone had to make the announcement in his own Monthly Meeting.

In reviewing the past I feel sure that the extreme care to find the right words in which to answer the Queries arose from the earnest desire to have a conscience void of offence, and the same thing is very noticeable in the caution exercised and embodied in the advices to meetings to be careful in too often using the name of "God." Thus, Friends of sixty years ago avoided that solemn word and spoke and wrote of "Best Wisdom," "Good Providence," "The Most High," "Infinite Goodness," and other like phrases.

Speaking of phrases, Friends were very fond of them. They rarely spoke of America, it was "The other side of the Atlantic," and in preaching, Isaiah was the "Evangelical Prophet," David "The Royal Psalmist," and Paul "The Great Apostle to the Gentiles." Death was "the undeniable messenger." We used many expressions peculiar to our own body, but not easily understood by others. Thus the "family sitting" or "religious opportunity" were terms in constant use and implied what others might describe as a prayer meeting, a devotional meeting, and yet possessing a meaning of their own, as such meeting might be or often was throughout in silence.

My late cousin, Edward Backhouse, told of a day school kept by a worthy Presbyterian to which some young Friend boys were sent, and on one occasion John Mounsey arrived late and the following ensued.

Master: "Morning lad, why art thou so late?"

Mounsey: "Please we had a family sitting."

Master: "What is that you had?"

Mounsey: "Please we had some visiting Friends."

Master: "What do you mean by that?"

Mounsey: "Please we had a religious opportunity."

The situation was getting very difficult for poor young Mounsey when Jasper Capper—evidently a boy with a little more worldly wisdom—called out, "Please, he means they had a prayer meeting."

I think one of the most singular modes of expression had connection with our public ministry. We never heard of a Friend preaching—"he appeared in testimony"; he never prayed but "appeared in supplication." Then if a Friend's public appearances were approved he was duly recorded as a Minister. The late Henry Southall told me of a Friend who had returned from meeting, and when asked what had taken place there replied, "A. B. appeared both from his feet and his knees."

Ministering Friends travelled with certificates from their Monthly Meeting much more frequently than that is now the case, and very often a Minister on coming to a town "would feel a concern to sit with families," which involved on the Elders the duty of arranging a suitable time when each family could conveniently gather together and have a religious opportunity. Often these were times of great blessing to those visited. I call to mind some dear Friends who were specially qualified for this work and who seemed to be Divinely enabled to read one through and through, or as Friends expressed it, "to see into states." Very particularly were Benjamin Seeborn and Joseph Thorp and Priscilla Green favoured in this way, but I might enumerate many others.

My venerable Friend, Joseph Shewell, of Colchester, told me of a curious evidence of the power of "seeing into states" that he remembered when a young man. A minister was "visiting families" in a town where three young men engaged in a shop, who much disliked the idea of receiving such a visit, and they persuaded three gay young acquaintances of theirs to take their places, instructing them how to behave so as not to excite suspicion. The "religious opportunity" was accordingly held, and the dear Friend had no idea that any trick was being played upon him. The three sat very still and behaved most demurely for a long while, and then the Minister just said these words, "A whip for the horse, a bridle for the ass, and rod for the fool's back. Young men, this is all the Lord has given me to say to you, so take it and divide it among yourselves." Probably such words would do them far more good than a long religious address. How they divided the three clauses among them I do not know.

Many instances are recorded of the wonderful insight granted to Ministers of a past generation. I can only record one or two. There was a certain Friend named Luke Cock, by trade a butcher. He was being driven by another Friend to a distant meeting, when in passing a lane, he said to his companion, "I must go down that lane." His friend replied, "If thou dost thou wilt hardly get to the meeting to which we are going in time." "Never mind," said Luke, "I must go down that lane." Accordingly they went, and after going some distance, came on a Friends' meeting house where a meeting was being held and a man was preaching. Luke sat down but soon rose and said, "Friends, the devil is in this meeting," and, after another pause, "Friends, the devil is in that man," pointing to the preacher. Immediately a man in the meeting called out, "Ah, I have won my wager. I knew you could not take in the Quakers." Luke then left the meeting and proceeded to the one he had arranged to attend. I have known Friends whose whole after life has been altered, or influenced by a heaven-sent messenger from one to whom was given the power "to see into states."

In my younger days we were very particular in the use of the plain language, we never used the title of Reverend, or Sir, and the straightest among us never used the word Church as applied to a building. Thus St. Paul's Churchyard was spoken of as "Paul's yard." A very dignified aged Minister, Cordelia Bayes, told of how, when sent to school, she was asked to tell the names of two rivers in North America, to which she answered "The Ippi" and the "Uri," and when she was reproved for such nonsense replied, "Please, Friends never say Missis or Miss."

As a boy I remember often been called after in the streets, "Quack, Quack, Quaker," or the rhyme;

"Oh thou Quaker, don't thou me,
I was not born to be thoused by thee.

It was probably a useful training to learn to bear such things quietly and not to retaliate.

Sometimes our plain language became rather picturesque, as when two sisters were undecided as to which side of the ironing table they should go to and at last they settled it by saying, "I believe it will be right for me to go to the left and then it will be left for thee to go to the right."

Seventy years ago the policy of our Society was distinctly conservative; there was very little mission work either home or foreign, and many were the cautions given to us young Friends to beware of "creaturely activity" or "running before our guide," or "daubing with untempered mortar." The prevailing concern of our Church was that it should be kept pure and clean. Friends spoke of it as "The Spiritual Israel" and "Our Zion."

Many meetings up and down the country were always held in silence except when visited by some Minister travelling with a certificate, and then very frequently the visitor had a concern to have a "public meeting" in the evening to which everybody was invited, and the shutters which usually divided the women's meeting-house from the rest were removed, and often a very solemn impressive meeting was held, in which the Friend appointing the meeting spoke for an hour or more and usually closed in prayer.

As to the discipline of our Society, our women Friends were allowed no power whatever. They held their Preparative, Monthly, Quarterly and Yearly Meetings quite distinct from the men, and if they needed any directions from the men they sent a little note into the Meeting as, for instance, one well remembers the Yearly Meeting Clerk reading, "Women Friends request to know what hour the Yearly Meeting expects to adjourn"; or, "Is the present a suitable time for the Yearly Meeting to receive a visit from a woman Friend under a religious concern?" Speaking of women Ministers visiting the Men's Meeting, I remember some such visits with great thankfulness, so distinct was the message that the "dear Sister" had to deliver.

Sixty years ago the London Meetings were frequently disturbed by the conduct of a fanatical man named Sowerby, and on several occasions he managed to intrude himself into the Yearly Meeting. I saw him spring up from under a form where he had lain concealed, but before he had time to say much the doorkeepers got hold of him, and though he fought manfully, carried him out and handed him over to the care of the police. Once, however, he gave the doorkeepers the slip, and as they chased him upstairs into the gallery he vaulted over the rail on to the sounding board over the Ministers' seat, which was at that time only canvas stretched on wooden frame. This of course gave way and left the poor fellow caught in his own trap. I know it sent a very unpleasant thrill through the meeting for worship then being held, and I fear few of us remember much else that occurred that morning!

But, while we rejoice in our present-day freedom, we surely need to remember that Christ and the terms of discipleship with Him remain the same and that non-conformity to the spirit of the world and the renewing of our minds are the conditions of our knowing "what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God," whether for ourselves or our Church.

WALTER ROBSON.

A CHRISTIAN VIEW OF DISARMAMENT.

ELBERT RUSSELL

(This article was written just before the Washington Conference was held.)

The Society of Friends favors disarmament, and limitation of armaments as a step toward it, as practical measures looking toward the abolition of the use of armed force between nations, because it believes all war to be contrary to the principles of Christianity.

(1) Jesus taught the universal fatherliness of God and the moral unity of mankind. All nations are his creation and their welfare equally the object of his fatherly care. Political divisions are subordinate to the common human brotherhood and can no more absolve nations from the duty of neighborly helpfulness and brotherly love toward others than membership in one family, clan, or corporation can justify selfish or hostile treatment of other social units within the nation. International relations are subject to the principles of Christian morality: national conduct must conform to the Golden Rule.

To belong to the family of God, we must treat kindly those outside our own nation, just as we do our fellow-citizens, even though they be called our enemies. After this fashion Jesus taught: "Ye have heard that it was said to them of old time: Love thy fellow countryman but hate the foreigner. But I say unto you, Love the foreigner, pray even for the conqueror and oppressor that ye may be Sons of your Father in Heaven; for he makes the sun to rise on both Japan and California, and sends rain on Ireland and England alike."

(2) Jesus taught the supreme worth of human personality. It is not to be made secondary to any other values. No institution is of such value as to justify the sacrifice of human welfare or human lives. Institutions are made for man, not man for institutions. To gain the world at the sacrifice of personality is an unchristian bargain. War is never justified as a means to any goal obtainable by it, for it involves the debasing and destruction of men. Armaments involve not only the preparation for war, but divert the national resources and energies from the cultivation of the spiritual capacities, and necessitate a relative neglect of education, philanthropy and religion. The only sacrifice of personality for the general welfare is that which is voluntarily given in the spirit of love, as Jesus went to the Cross. As Ruskin reminds us, it is good when a soldier is willing to die for his country; but evil when he is willing to kill other men for it.

(3) According to Christianity, love is the greatest human virtue; its universal practice, the social goal of humanity. But war is an expression of hate, the greatest sin according to the Christian standard. Booker T. Washington said truly, "The greatest injury a man can do me is to make me hate him." We have recently learned anew how impossible it is to carry on a good-natured war. And a nation can only be kept at the task of supporting a great army and navy in time of peace by propaganda of suspicion, fear, and hate toward some neighbor. Recall the periodic "rumors" and "scares" about Japan before 1914, whenever the naval appropriations came before Congress. Such supreme debasement of the national spirit comes, even though there be no war.

(4) Jesus appealed to the potential goodness in human nature as a basis for the kingdom of God. He believed the higher, unselfish virtues and impulses serve better as a basis of social institutions than the selfish and the vicious.

Altruism is as ancient in the history of even prehuman life as selfishness, as Kropotkin has fully shown in his "Mutual Aid." We have learned to train men to courses of conduct, within limited areas, controlled by altruistic motives. Parents give themselves for their children; patriots die for their country. Tradition, history, literature, monuments, public celebrations and education glorify the deed, praise the heroism, and perpetuate the motive. A similar all pervasive education enjoining the practice of universal brotherhood, calling out in us and trusting in others a code of unselfish honor in all relations, would produce a Christian universalism as reliable for the basis of human relations as is nationalistic patriotism, and as far above it, as modern patriotism is above the tribal clannishness of ancient Scotland or Israel. This cannot be done as long as heavy armaments contain a threat of war, provoke rivalry in hostile preparations and demonstrations, and cultivate suspicion and ill-will.

But we do not advocate a merely negative disarmament. We would substitute spiritual forces, Christian influences and relations, and organized justice and good-will for competition in armaments and threat of war as the basis of national security. We want to substitute the better way for armaments and war. This is not merely a dream of visionaries. In his "Farewell Address," Washington gave the injunction to our nation to "give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence." This can only become effective when our international relations are based on these virtues and the world organized to practice them.

(1) Accompanying disarmament, whether partial or complete, we should, both as a nation and as individuals, continue to disarm the spirit of other nations by the practice of Christian benevolence. We returned the balance of the Boxer Indemnity to China, and made her people our friends. A million German school children think kindly of America because they have been fed by American citizens in the name of America. When they grow to be voters, we will need no armaments.

Instead of spending our revenues on hostile armaments, we should devote it to the spread of those influences that make peace. We have lived for more than a hundred years alongside Canada with no forts or warships along the four thousand mile frontier. We need no armaments to protect us from such a neighbor. If we devote a fraction of the money and energies now spent on armaments to carrying the influences of Christian civilization to Mexico, China, and other nations who might become a menace, we will make them as good neighbors as Canada. Missionaries, teachers and statesmen are better than soldiers to make neighbors peaceable. Schools, hospitals and churches are superior to forts and battlements.

(2) Accompanying disarmament, the world should be organized for the regular and orderly practice of justice between nations and the judicial settlement of disputes. The form of organization and procedure are secondary. A generation trained to respect the decisions of such tribunals will accept their decisions as loyally as the citizens of the American states have come to respect the Supreme Court. Such loyalty will be effective once it is identified with patriotism. If loyalty for a common government can hold the nations of the British Empire together, enough moral power can certainly be found after a generation is so trained to bind the world under one law.

The Society of Friends looks forward eagerly to the coming conference on the limitation of armaments. It is hardly to be expected it may realize fully our ideal. But we hope it may be able to arrange for a reduction and limitation of armaments and thus take practical steps toward lifting from the world their burden and menace. We may hope still further that it may help put international relations on a basis of greater mutual trust; and help statesmen to recognize the evil of national selfishness and aggression as principles of international morality, to proceed more largely according to an ideal of mutual helpfulness in their foreign policy, and to grant every people a fair opportunity to enjoy the good gifts of our Common Father. Even a measure of disarmament may serve to turn the thoughts of the world toward substitutes for military force as a guaranty of national security and a means of settling international disputes; and so help to make room for international relations on the basis of organized justice and Christian good-will.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

A DEED OF KINDNESS.—The hill was alive with merry boys and girls on a bright sunny afternoon in winter. What fun it was indeed to coast swiftly down the icy slope, and what shouts of ringing laughter as the sleds flew down the hill.

Young and old seemed to be having the gayest time possible. Big boys on double-runners, with crowds of little tots at their backs, with rosy cheeks and sparkling eyes, turned the sharp corner to help drag the heavy carry-all up to the top again.

The sun had almost set, and its rosy light filled the street, but before any had started to go home a man driving a large load of wood began to ascend the icy path. The sleds steered out of the way as the poor horse tried almost in vain to go on.

Suddenly he stopped, for he could go on no further. The road was so slippery that in trying to walk his hind legs slipped from beneath him. The man seemed enraged, and began whipping the poor creature. As the horse could not go on, the man struck harder. Then a little girl, Amy by name, got off her sled and stepping up to the man said, politely, "Couldn't I help you with your horse, sir?" The load of wood seems very heavy for him." The man looked very much surprised, but stopped immediately. Amy went up to the horse, patted his nose gently, and whispered kindly in his ear. A number of boys were taking a few of the logs off the cart, and transferring them to their sleds to drag up the hill.

Amy then led the horse along, for she was very gentle, and the noble creature was perfectly willing to obey her. The man walked along and really felt much ashamed, as he ought. At last they reached the top, and the boys put back the wood, as the load was not too heavy for a level. As the children all bade each other good-night to go home, the man turned around, saying, "Many thanks to ye, my lads, and to the little missy," which showed how he felt. Which do you think was happier that night, the horse, or the little girl who belonged to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals?—Our Dumb Animals.

PROBABLY few Friends in America realize the extent of the foreign missionary labor which English Friends are carrying on under their Friends' Foreign Mission Association. The number of missionaries working under the direction of this organization is, according to countries: India, 25; China, 30; Madagascar, 23; Syria, 16; Ceylon, 5; Pemba, 8; making a total of 107 foreign workers.

WHY SAVE IGNORANT PEASANTS?

Someone has said that if you search far enough back in the history of a prince you will find a peasant, and if you search far enough back in the history of a peasant you will find a prince.

This is one of the deep reasons for saving starving, ignorant peasant children from starvation. Woodrow Wilson, in his book, "The New Freedom," says that life is always being renewed from the soil. And in our search we find that it is true that the great men of the world, those who have been most effective in making their talents play a useful part in the world, have been men who have come out of the loins of peasants, who have taken their strength from the soil.

Have we found ourselves thinking that the Russian people are so ignorant and so cattle-like that to save them is only, after all, to keep cattle alive? Have we thought that they are such clods that it might be better to give of our money and resources to people who offer far more possibility in their lives?

Have not some of us paraphrased that sentence which Nathaniel spoke 1000 years ago when he said: "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" And we have said that no good thing can come out of Russia. But Jesus came out of that degraded and miserable and ill-famed village of Nazareth which was despised throughout all his people; and cannot some great, true, useful life come out of even Russia?

Great and healing life has come out of Russia. That gracious apostle of the spirit of Christ, Tolstoy, came out of this Russia. And among this mass of people of the soil there were many who could respond to the appeal of this life which was lived in the spirit of love and mercy and kindly forgiveness.

And is it not strange that we have forgotten the story that for years was one of the forces which kept the soul of the world alive? There was no story that so thrilled our hearts, nor so deeply stirred every passion for liberty and truth and freedom within us, as the story of those brave, undaunted, fearless Russian patriots, who, under the cruellest autocracy the world has ever known, struggled that Russia might be free, and faced the horrible living death of the Siberian prisons for an ideal. These men and women, seeing in their minds the life of the future, free Russia, fought the forces of darkness and evil of a Czar's tyranny, and, torn from family and home and hope, went out unafraid to the frozen deserts of the North.

These men and women were the people of the soil, born of the peasants, reared in the hovels of a people kept ignorant and poverty-stricken by force for generations. These pure, unselfish idealists came out of even the peasants of Russia.

What has come, may come again. Because the lives who fought for freedom under a tyranny and who are still the ones who will lead Russia eventually to the light, came from the soil and the peasants, it is well to save Russian children. Yes, and because He who was born in a stable among the cattle and the lowly of the earth, and worked as a peasant and carpenter, became the One who made the way to God a pathway of light, it is well to save Russian children!

SALE OF EUROPEAN EMBROIDERIES.

The Service Committee, through its Women's Work Department, is arranging for a sale of embroideries this spring. There will be handwork from Russia, Austria and Germany, including laces and linen embroidery. The first consignments of these goods are already on the way to this country in charge of returning workers. The date and place of sale will be announced later.

SELF-RESPECT GROWS WHEN SELF-SUPPORT ARRIVES AMONG POLISH PEASANTS.

It is quite easy to tell which peasants have had a few years of freedom, according to Alizon Fox, a member of the Friends' Mission in Poland, for they seem so much more self-respecting and independent.

The peasants were always kissing the hands of the relief workers and bowing and begging in the districts where they worked last year. But this year none of the men workers in the Mission have had their hands kissed. It is quite a different act when it is extended as a courtesy to a woman, that courtesy being quite common in official circles in Poland. But the peasant hand-kissing went with bowing and begging as to a superior.

The difference is that the district in which the Friends were working last year was set in the midst of large estates. But the peasants among whom they are working this year have had their own land since before the war and their land was the rich black earth of the old Ukraine on which they could live quite well. Only this winter some of the workers visited a village where the peasants had started the old method of whining and begging and subservency, and they found that a big estate was near and the peasants had only had little land for themselves. The plan of the Polish Government is to split up the big estates among the peasants and this will help restore a strong and self-respecting country folk.

The Friends expect to bring this new district also to self-support by the coming harvest as they have done with other districts in the past, through their policy of helping the neediest peasants by food, and by organizing cottage industries in the winter and by ploughing and distributing seeds this spring. Only those who are quite without horse, cow or plough get this kind of help. The others who are relieved of the burden of their more destitute neighbors, are able to pull through until harvest. One good harvest, in this rich black earth, puts a district on its feet.

The village of Koniuchy is one of the four centres in East Poland where the Friends are working this winter. This entire territory was ravaged by war and fire seven years ago and has had no chance to recover, since its ownership was undecided until last year, and neither Russia nor Poland, weighed down by their own problems, had any help to spare for this no-man's-land which might later on go to some other country. The whole of East Poland is now flooded with refugees returning from Russia, fleeing before the famine as they fled seven years ago before the armies.

The simple courage of these peasants in the face of what to English or Americans would seem impossible hardships, is most remarkable. One woman living in a dugout with very little food was asked by one of the Quaker workers if she had a horse.

"There is my only horse," she said, smiling, pointing to a scrawny hen that was picking up food inside the dugout. It was the only animal the woman possessed. A few weeks later she came to one of the Friends' food distributions which is given to the poorest families to help them through the winter. She was asked about "her horse."

"My horse is dead," she said sadly, and then told how even the little hen had died because of lack of food.

RUSSIA EVER CALLS.

The latest cable from Murray Kenworthy in Russia states that children are dying in the children's homes and the hospitals because of the total lack of bedding material. It is hardly possible to conceive of places designed to take care of abandoned and orphaned children, and especially hospitals, being without adequate bedding supplies, but there are very few of these places which have any supplies at all of this character. The pictures which are being sent in tell the story even more graphically than words can. The children lie mostly upon tables and the floor and on whatever parts of the iron and wood portions of the bed will hold their bodies. In several of the homes our workers saw rooms which were so filled with children that there was no space for them to all lie down upon the floor at once.

This situation affords the possibility of giving relief in a most effective way. Old bedding which is still of use is valuable; but new bedding material is, of course, most wanted in order to stand the severe wear to which it will be subjected. There is practically no limit to the amount of this which is needed. Stocks are now being made up at the Friends' storeroom to provide for this need. Whatever you can give will be a most decided help.

BEULAH HURLEY ILL WITH TYPHUS.

Beulah Hurley, who has carried the burden of the direction of the Unit in Russia during Murray Kenworthy's sickness, was taken ill with typhus a week ago, according to a cable received Third Month 28. The cable stated simply that it was a slight case.

Murray Kenworthy is convalescing slowly in Moscow. Nancy Babb is back at work. Cornell Hewson is also recovering from typhus in Minsk. Dr. Mary Tatum, a member of the Polish Unit, is also on the way to complete recovery in Warsaw.

Dr. Lucy Elliott, a physician from Flint, Michigan, who was accepted for service in Russia a month ago, has now arrived in the famine area, and has begun her work in taking care of the health of the Unit.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL NOTES.—An invitation is extended to Friends to hear Dallas Lore Sharp address the school on the afternoon of Fifth Month 5th at 12.40 on "How to Spend the Summer Vacation."

On Third Month 10th, under the Department of Educational Measurements at the University of Pennsylvania, a series of Ability and Achievement Tests was given throughout the entire school. It is expected that these tests will be a valuable aid to teachers in determining what may rightly be expected from each individual pupil.

A committee representing the School Committee, the teachers, and the students has been at work for several months on the preparation of a School Seal. This committee has decided on the phrase, "The Whole of Life," as the School motto. This is a free translation of the poet Horace's "Integer Vitae." The design for the School Seal include William Penn's Coat of Arms.

The drawings have been completed for the proposed addition to the School buildings, which will provide offices and an additional class room and serve as the main entrance from the Parkway. It is hoped that sufficient funds will be forthcoming to erect this addition during the coming summer.

Among some of the comparatively recent additions to Friends' Library, Phila., we find the following:

THE Thirty-ninth Annual Report of the Foreign Missionary Association of Friends of Philadelphia has just been circulated. It is of unusual interest in view of the splendid effort made during the year to collect $58,000 to carry forward the new work at the mission in Japan. Of this sum more than $48,000 have been donated and the work contemplated is being forwarded. Gilbert Bowles speaking for himself says: "The following things have claimed my time and thought this spring: Young Men's Work, especially conferences and the monthly meetings of young men in our home. I have had no regular Bible classes. There is encouraging evidence of real spiritual growth on the part of a number of young men, and that in the face of some special problems. The Christian students are still eager for the dormitory. One young man with very limited means recently gave three yen out of his allotted funds for this purpose, literally begging at the same time on behalf of the Christian young men for the early erection of the dormitory.

"One encouraging feature of the Young Men's Work is that one of the best Bible classes has been for the past two years conducted by Japanese who became Christians and received their first training in our English Bible classes.

"Though in facing conscription call none of the young men have taken the open stand of conscientious objectors, conviction is steadily deepening with a number of them. At least one young man in the service this year is well known to the higher officers for the strong stand he has taken. It is becoming increasingly evident that there may develop in Japan a new type of conscientious objector. Japanese young men must work it out, aided as they have been and will be by the experience of young men in the United States and England."

THE Board of Managers of Haverford College, Haverford, Pa., announce that Jacob P. Jones Foundation Scholarships open to young men graduating from accredited Secondary Schools and passing the College Entrance Board Examinations. These scholarships of $300.00 each are awarded on the following basis: (1) Qualities of manhood, force of character and leadership;

- (2) Literary and scholastic attainments;
- (3) Physical vigor.

Awards will be made early in Sixth Month and the scholarships are offered for National Competition.

The Board announces also four Corporation Scholarships with an annual value of $300.00 each, to be awarded without application to the four Freshmen receiving the highest averages in the College Entrance Board examinations in 6th Month.

WATERPROOF belts of leather may be called the highest development in leather belts. And the process of waterproofing a belt makes it more pliable and more durable, thus increasing its grip and giving it longer life.

To meet your different needs we have three brands. The Watershed oak is a strictly high grade belt and gives excellent service. But it is not so pliable or long lived on some drives as Watershed Tannate.

The Tannate on many drives will give greater satisfaction and probably cost less in the long run.

Watershed Grip-o-tan, one side oak, the other Tannate, combines the firmness of oak leather with the strong pulley grip of the Tannate and costs less than the full Tannate. Try Watershed for your hard drives.

STAKES AND CORDS.

The pen-portrait of the suffering Servant of Jehovah in the book of Isaiah is followed by a vision of the marvellous spread of true religion in the world. The Apostle Paul, we know, interpreted it as a prophecy of the arising and diffusion of the Church among the Gentiles, far beyond the narrow boundaries of Judaism. The prophet cries out: "Sing, O barren, thou that didst not bear; break forth into singing, and cry aloud, thou that didst not travail with child; enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thy habitations; spare not; lengthen thy cords and strengthen thy stakes. For thou shalt spread abroad on the right hand and on the left; and thy seed shall possess the nations, and make the desolate cities to be inhabited."

Similar prospects have often drawn out the anointed seers who from time to time have been raised up in our Society. We have been encouraged to look forward to a world-wide diffusion of the principles of Christianity for which Friends stand. That which is now crystallized in a small society must yet become the faith and practice of humanity. And it is clear that our witness must be world-wide, neither sectarian nor denominational. If we are indeed in our witness, as well as in our experience, "Primitive Christianity revived," we must revive the catholicity of the early Church. We know how deeply early Friends felt this concern. They appealed to "that of God" in all men everywhere. They were not interested in "Quakerism," or in any "ism," but in the bringing of every man into the experience of "immediate divine revelation."

If we have not faith in our Message; if there be a lurking suspicion in our minds that in the very nature of things it could only appeal to men of a certain temperament, in those whom the mystical sense has been in some degree developed; if we do not preach the Grace that hath appeared unto all men, bringing salvation where heeded, we have not a catholic, but a merely denominational mission in the world.

If we are Friends, it is because we feel the urge of two imperatives: "Ye must be born again," and, that "God is spirit, and they that worship Him, must worship Him in spirit and in truth." We plead for the life begotten of God, and not of the will of man, as the way to the Kingdom. We also plead for a worship which does not stand in the will, power, or time of the creature, but which is the upspringing of the fountain of living water in the heart. And we believe that "the Father seeketh such to worship Him" even those who know the inner court, where He is seen face to face. We are forbidden to choose our manner of worship. We can only worship aright in the power He gives. And this pure worship must yet supplant all other worships in the earth, as men come to a truer knowledge of God.

There is a new spirit in the air which re-awakens in our Society the sense of a world-wide witness; that we have a Message to preach to the nations, and that we must live out its ethical implications, in order to back it up. There are many, not only just on the borders of our membership, but far afield, who must be our concern. We must point them to that Voice that can speak to their condition. And we must enlarge our habitation in order to welcome the spiritual children that will be born.

Yet at the same time, in looking out, we must not forget to look in also. With the lengthening of the cords we must strengthen the stakes as well. Expansion without corresponding deepening is a dangerous experiment. We must obtain a firmer grip on the realities of eternity. We must re-discover the central Principle from which our principles and testimonies spring as from their root. In short, we need a fresh conviction, a clearer vision of our Divine Lord, and a richer experience of His healing and baptizing power. The stakes must be driven deeper in if the cords are to be lengthened further out.

M. I. R.

I HAVE not seen, I may not see,
My hopes for man take form in act,
But God will give the victory
In due time; in that faith I act.
And he who sees the future sure,
The haffing present may endure,
And bless, meanwhile, the unseen Hand that leads
The heart's desires beyond the halting step of deeds.

—WHITTIER.

ONLY when on form and word obscure
Falls from above the white supernal light
We read the mystic characters aright,
And life informs the silent portraiture,
Until we pause at last, awe-held, before
The One ineffable Face, love, wonder and adore.
—The Book, J. G. W.

This is the place for solemn thoughts;
Here prayer in silence steals!
And here his word, with healing fraught,
God to the soul reveals.

For from the wheat the chaff remove,
The gold from dross set free,
Till nothing remains save that pure love
Which lifts the soul to thee.

THE OPEN DOOR.

Issued as closing minute of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, Third Month 31st, 1922.

"Behold, I have set before thee an open door."

Repeatedly during our meetings we have been reminded of these familiar words. They express not only our opportunities but also our call. "I have set before thee"—thus the living Christ speaks to His individual follower. It is God's call that should prompt us to any service; and His call should be answered in consecration and with joy. Personal consecration, a living faith in our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, and a joyous obedience to Him as He may lead us into service, are essential if we are to enter the doors of opportunity before us.

And what doors have been opened before us! What a forward looking call, what service!

One of these doors is our own meetings for worship. These are of fundamental importance in maintaining our spiritual power. We should learn to love our meetings, because we expect to meet with God. Our small meetings should especially claim our loving interest and our prayers; and we should visit them as we have intimations of God's leading. Though we may have a Visitation Committee, the door is nevertheless set open before us all and we should pray to enter it.

Another door of service that is constantly open before us is the radiant Christian joyousness of our daily lives. In family life, in business relations, in our social activities and in the use of our leisure time, we can manifest the radiance of Christ. As His character comes into our hearts, and His joy into our lives, we shall attract others to desire Him. "The joy of the Lord is our strength."

Still other doors appear to be set before our Meeting to a very remarkable degree, and the field literally is the world. We have liberated our beloved Friends, William C. and Elizabeth C. B. Allen, for a Gospel journey around the world. They need our sympathy and prayers. We have authorized a Visitation Committee to visit all our subordinate Meetings. Our Peace Committee, Social Order Committee and Extension Committee find larger fields of service than they can occupy.

We are having new opportunities of fellowship with other Friends and with other Christians, and these, we believe, have come to us because our Heavenly Father has service in them for us to render. We are looking towards a closer connection with the foreign missionary work in which our members are engaged. This is another door set open before our Meeting, with possibilities of service which we only dinly foresee. Finally, the great work of the American Friends' Service Committee calls steadily for the very utmost that we can render.

As we consider all these opportunities which our loving Father in Heaven has set before us, we realize afresh that we must put first things first. We rejoice in our opportunity, but we are solemnized by the thought that God has so much for us to do. We remember that we must humble ourselves as little children if we are to enter into the Kingdom of Heaven, or into the doors that are opened. In all earnestness and in all consecration, let us therefore "put on the whole armor of God" and joyfully accept the message: "Behold, I have set before thee an open door."

A WORD FOR THE HOUR.

I have sent out at times of crisis various appeals to Friends to get behind the work of relief in Europe and I have always met a quick and generous response. It has given me deep inward joy to see how ready Friends really are to take their share in tasks and responsibilities when the call comes to them.

But I feel impelled today to send out another kind of call. It is not for money; it is not for clothes; it is not for volunteers to go to distant lands. It is for a deeper and more complete devotion to the spiritual mission of the Society of Friends. It is primarily, of course, an appeal to young Friends, but we must be very careful not to divide our forces into two groups—the young and the elderly. The only way we can get a good crop of noble, dedicated young Friends is to have those who are fathers and mothers thoroughly awake to the significance of our spiritual mission in the world. After all it is not a question of age, it is a question of vision, of loyalty, of devotion, of holy passion for the spread of light and love. The earlier the awakening comes the better. The more years that are given to this great business of life and service so much more is the true joy of living realized. But whatever may be one's age, let the business begin now and let no one say: "I am an old derelict and my time to contribute is past. This is the day of the young and the strong." No, not that. This is the day of the devoted and loyal worker, the faithful servant, even though an eleventh-hour-comer. The all-important thing is the awakening and the readiness for the business in hand. I have been deeply stirred by the death of my great friend and fellow-laborer, William Charles Braithwaite. He is a magnificent revelation of what can be done with a life devoted to a cause. He has been a great leader, a real prophet of present-day Quaker life and thought. He has interpreted our ideals, he has expressed our historical aims, he has exhibited our social hopes, he has preached our gospel of spiritual religion, and his life has proved to be a powerful force for righteousness. I know many young Friends in America today who have just as great a chance as he had to make their lives count toward these ends as he did. It was not alone his unusual powers of mind that raised him, like the incoming tides, above the common level. It was his spirit, his heart, his attitude, his dedicated will that made him different from the rank and file.

The hours call for others who will follow in his train. The spirit which we have shown in our foreign work of relief and reconstruction we must now show within the area of our own home field. Every Quaker Meeting in America, in the world, needs a revival of personal devotion to the truth which lies at the heart of our religion—devotion to Christ and to the kingdom of love which He is building in this world where we live. We do not need to blow the trumpet of our particular denomination and set it into rivalry with other forms of faith. We want no campaign of sectarianism. Not that. But here is the point. Religion cannot be disembodied. It must express itself in and through a group. It must find its organs and exponents among people who have inherited ideals and hopes out of the past, and who have the inspiration of leaders and prophets and martyrs behind them.

The great beyond is ours. Freely we have received a tremendous heritage. What we need to do is to understand it, to appreciate it, to prize it, to appropriate it, and then to transmit it. Such chances that have come to us at the present time in history do not often come to a religious body. Earnest, eager people in our towns and cities are begging us to interpret our faith to them. They ask for books, they ask for lectures, they ask for messages, they ask for quiet personal talks. They want to find a real spiritual religion. Shall we disappoint them or shall we let them see the day-dawn and the day-star in our lives?

One thing is certain. The situation cannot be met by formal, easy-going Christians whose religion is superficial and second-hand. Nothing will work here but a religion that goes down to the rock-bottom foundation. It must be a religion that has cost something, and that is why I am putting the emphasis on loyalty and consecration. Our service, if it is to count for great things, must spring out of living experience of God. Our efforts to better the world must have the force and energy which comes from depth of life. Our love and sympathy will have real healing power only when we go out with "the mighty ordination of the pierced hands."

"With thy calling and shouting my deafness is broken; with thy glittering and shinnings, my blindness is put to flight. At the scent of thee I draw in my breath and I pant for thee; I have tasted and I hunger and thirst; thou hast touched me and I am on fire for thy peace."—St. Augustine, quoted by A. Clutton-Brock in "Pooled Self-esteem."

THOUGHTS ON THE YEARLY MEETING.

[It occurred to us that there might be a service in giving our late Yearly Meeting a review after a different order from that which we have usually followed. With no other request than that we might have a very short paper on "some features or some arresting thought growing out of the Yearly Meeting," we have asked for and received the following. We believe you who read the papers will join us in a sense of appreciation for the effort made.

If ten persons can exhibit such a variety, what a multiplicity of sentiment must there have been in the large assemblage and what a tribute to the training that we have received, that in great harmony and condescension, the one to the other, we could all through the week, differ in judgment and grow stronger all the time in forbearance and love.—Eds.]

MINGLED indeed are the feelings with which we look back upon Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of 1922. Much we see in the retrospect which rejoices most of us, and much that troubles many of us. With the decisions made we are in general unity, and reverently thankful to our Gracious Lord for the issues, but not so easily can we approve the methods employed to reach these decisions. To any one who for years has regularly attended our Yearly Meeting the great change which has come over us in the two or three years just passed must be as clear as the noonday—not only a change in the subjects we consider but, more important by far, a change in the spirit in which we consider them. Now I am not afraid of change or of new subjects. I know our Lord may lead us into new paths, and by the breaking of precedent may our Redeemer's will sometimes best be done. But, in my judgment, there is one great change our Yearly Meeting cannot afford, and that is a sacrifice of spirituality to business efficiency—and this seems clearly the present tendency.

One of our influential and much loved ministers said regretfully to me, "Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has ceased to be a deliberative body." The reason is plain. We are compelled by the increased and increasing pressure of business to pass hastily from subject to subject if we are to transact all our business within our specified time. We have important committees under appointment, and we are all deeply interested in the reports presented. I feel that the meeting as a meeting ought to "get under the weight," as we say, of the labors of these various committees; that we should really as a meeting enter into their labors, and, in a deeper sense than we do, make their work ours; that to all these concerns may be given the sympathetic and loving response of the Yearly Meeting. But we have not time for deliberation. The pressure is great. Just so much must be accomplished at each session. Even deep felt, earnest concerns are crowded out, and all we have time for is the necessary verdict of approval by which each report must be adopted.

There come tense moments in exercise and discussion. Our spirits bow to learn the Divine Will—but time is lacking for spiritual waiting, and sometimes I fear the Voice of God is asked to hurry. I feel that we are losing the very best out of our Yearly Meetings. I love my friends. I love our Yearly Meeting. I write these words with much feeling. But whether or not every one can agree with me I must plead for the return to our Religious Society of those hours in which we are permitted to wait at the feet of our Lord for the clear guidance of his Divine Spirit. The seasons of spiritual refreshment which meant so much to me in the days of my childhood are precious still. I do not want any to misunderstand my expression. I am in the fullest accord with the subjects that come before us for decision. I thankfully believe that we were enabled to come to right conclusions, and I look back upon the days just passed as days of favor and of blessing. But I do feel that the outpouring of God's grace would have been much greater if we had had more time to receive it and rejoice in it.

Glancing for a moment at the Joint Session problem, whatever may be the advantages, certainly we find an increased pressure. The size of the already large assembly is doubled; and, in logical sequence, the expression from either meeting is cut in half. Also it should be said that there is a decided tendency to leave the management of the meeting's business to the voices of a select few.

Now having ventured to be so explicit in my criticism of the meeting I love, may I risk a practical suggestion? Our sessions we all acknowledge are crowded. We have this year admitted to fuller recognition another committee which will annually report on a most interesting and important subject, the Foreign Missionary Association. Other committees stand just outside, and must soon be admitted to official recognition. Certainly our Yearly Meeting week will soon be absolutely unable to give room for the right consideration of all our varied interests. I suggest that we have our regular Yearly Meetings in Third Month and hold a Half Year's Meeting for perhaps three days in Tenth Month. This would relieve the extreme pressure and feeling of great haste under which we labor. This would allow us to consider with deliberation and prayer the great issues that come before us. This would permit us to wait in greater reverence and dignity for the guidance of the Spirit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

ARTHUR R. PENNELL.

IMPRESSIONS OF THE YEARLY MEETING.

Some of the events of the recent Yearly Meeting that seemed to me the most significant were those that had to do with our relations with other bodies of Friends. During the war, it was discovered that in their attitude to Peace all Friends could unite and that in this union there was added strength given to the testimony that had suffered so sorely from dissensions among ourselves. It was discovered also that while thus uniting to do one particular task we learned to understand each other better and, while not compromising any principles, to be sympathetic and appreciative of the contributions from other groups. Hence we were willing to accept the invitation that came this year to send fraternal delegates to the Five Years' Meeting because we had learned to value the outreaching, self-sacrificing spirit of its members and their earnest efforts to carry the Gospel of Christ to those who know Him not.

The letter sent to the Conservative bodies of Friends expressed our love for them in no uncertain way and our desire for and the close fellowship there should be between those who have a common inheritance. Finally, we united with the other Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in sending to all the Christian churches in the world an appeal to follow the leading of Christ in their attitude to war and to see to it that no one of His followers had any part or lot in it.

It was interesting to note that after taking these various steps the report of the Committee on Organic Church Union urged that the next move toward unity should be the drawing more closely together of the groups within the different denominations and Friends were encouraged to come into more sympathetic relations with each other. So, without perhaps fully realizing it, we were being led forward by the Spirit in our small group to the same conclusion as that of the Committee on Organic Union.

In attempting to enter some of the doors opening before us of latter years we have often realized our weakness and insufficiency. We have seen that God has need of many kinds of instruments; that while He calls us to be faithful to that which He has given us to do we can and must join in the sympathetic fellowship of a common purpose with all those who are serving the same Lord.

The message that came to us at the close of the Women's meeting in connection with the memorial of Samuel Emlen might well go with us through the coming year:—"Little children love one another."

ELIZABETH B. JONES.

In the days when as a little girl, I climbed the stairs to the Youths' Gallery and gazed down upon row after row of plain bonnets, I liked to feel myself a part of the Women's Meeting. It was like belonging to a Sisterhood. Something in me responded to something in the saintly, white-haired women, who spoke from the galleries. But this year Joint Sessions were a matter of course, and somehow, I lost my sense of Sisterhood in the sense of a great family, bound together by a thousand ties.

We know each others' names and bits of each others' histories. We know who is sick, who is sorrowful, who is especially glad. We worship together in an absolute equality. We have a great common background. As the business of the week progressed, always I saw the Yearly Meeting as a great family.

There was much business: on Second-day, minutes of the Representative Meeting, in which against the varied activities of the year, the work for disarmament stood out in bold relief. On Third-day afternoon, the Report of the Committee on Christian Labor in Foreign Lands introduced a discussion full of thought and feeling in regard to the situation of the foreign mission interests within the Yearly Meeting. And, that same afternoon, after a free interchange of judgment, it was decided to send fraternal delegates to the Five Years' Meeting. On Fourth-day we learned something of the experimental work of the Social Order Committee in Philadelphia. Then with Rufus M. Jones and Wilbur K. Thomas, we looked on the horror of famine in Russia, and at the gigantic task which lies before the American Friends' Service Committee. Later we had glimpses of the children in the Yearly Meeting's little schools, boys and girls, who are being taught to understand peace as a creative force. And Esther Morton Smith gave us more than a hint of the tremendous possibilities there are in inter-racial work.

The epistles from Friends in West China, in Germany, and in many other places; the Extension Committee's report; and Dr. Hull's letter to the Christian Churches; all seemed to be reaching out in a spiritual way not only to Friends, but to Friends and others.

Are we a family admirable in many ways but self-centered? Do we seek God just for ourselves? As the days went past I began to wonder what the completed record would show. Again and again familiar words spoken during the discussion of the amalgamation of the foreign mission interests and their recognition by the Yearly Meeting, rang in my ears. "Go ye into all the world" and beside them I put the text of William Littleboy's wise, gentle, challenging sermon at the beginning of the week, "And the joy of the Lord shall be your strength."

ELIZABETH T. RHOADS.

TWO YEARLY MEETINGS.

The Yearly Meeting of 1922 has become a part of history. Its record is the result of causes that lie in the past, while it in turn has caused consequences which may take years to develop their full significances. As in every other department of the world we live in, where effects become causes as much as they are the result of causes, so in the life of the church. How important then that we do not take a false step, be it to the right or to the left.

In reality the history of the Yearly Meeting is a dual one. There are two Yearly Meetings, one within the other, more or less affected by each other.

There is first of all the Yearly Meeting which finds its expression in part in the Meetings of Ministers and Elders. Its business is to guard the Altar of the Lord that the sacred fire does not go out.

There is besides the Yearly Meeting which finds its utterance in the manifold and increasing interests and activities which lie as a concern on the hearts and minds of its members.

If the first is the heart, the second may be compared to the hands and feet of the corporate witness of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

The danger is that the two Yearly Meetings should not be properly related to each other, should live apart, side by side only, and not in sympathetic association.

If the first comes to regard itself as an end and not as a means, it will lose its life sooner or later. It will wither like an atrophied organism.

If the second thinks it can get on without the first, its services will without fail be reduced to philanthropy. It will cease to be a clear witness to Christ. And if a Church witnesses merely to her own goodness, accepting the honor of the world because of the abundance of her services for the good of humanity, she will cease to fulfill the purpose of her existence, even to be the manifestation of Him whom the world nailed to a cross, spite of His good works, because He had a testimony to bear in the world.

This is by no means the case with regard to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. But the danger is ever present. It may easily come to pass that the two Yearly Meetings will follow different ideals, and aim at different objectives. To prevent them drifting apart, to the hurt of each, is a service which the need calls for. The sanctuary must inform and hallow the outer courts, while a weakened heart will impoverish all the members of the body.

The time has therefore not come for Friends, in their anxiety not to be deaf to the loud call of opportunity which this age affords, to forsake "the secret place of the Most High," the place of vision, of communion, of tarrying, of silent adoration. The vocation of the Society of Friends obliges its members, when they go forth into any service, whether it be social or the ministry of the Word, be it in the home land or in other lands, so-called "heathen," to be different from the ministers, missionaries and workers, of the various denominations, who do not profess the same principle which underlies our conception of Worship and Ministry.

Let us hope, that with the experience of the recent sessions in mind, that that difference will not be less marked in the future than in the past. Let us keep the heart sound, and the organs of outward expression will be sound also.

MAX I. REICH.

SPEAKING TO BUSINESS

Many different incidents or aspects of the late Yearly Meeting deserve and should receive comment. One of these which has claimed attention may be briefly treated under the caption of "Speaking to Business."

Just as, in the past score of years, the subjects considered have become much more numerous, and just as the opportunities for helping and being helped by others bearing the name of Friends in many parts of the world have been much more freely appropriated, so has the number of persons participating in the discussions and speaking to business greatly increased. It seems that more interest is being taken now than formerly by the younger Friends in the various matters under consideration, though this may in part be due to the fact that we are all growing older together. It is, however, noticeable that the decisions of the Yearly Meeting are influenced much more largely by the expressed opinions of men and women, younger or older, scattered through the house, than they were in the years when many of us were eligible for seats in the now little used "youths' galleries." In those days, it seems by retrospect, the minutes made by the Clerks were very largely controlled by the almost whispered remarks of a few of the "worthies" occupying seats in the galleries, though entirely opposite opinions were expressed by more of the men and women in other parts of the house.

Those who "speak to business" now-a-days may be divided into three groups—first, the Friends who really weigh and fully consider the matter in hand, or present new concerns to which they have given careful thought, and are therefore the ones who really carry on the business. They are, to be sure, the most numerous and the most valuable. Second, those who just naturally cannot help speaking and seem to bubble over before they or any others have had time to consider the subject. Some of these, when a matter of a purely business nature—finances, for instance—is under discussion, arise and quote (almost irreverently, it seems) Scripture verses which only by a play on words could possibly have any bearing on the subject and certainly could have no weight in helping to form opinion. These are a disturbing element in the Meeting and seem to speak only to relieve their own minds. Little attention is, of course, paid to these Friends, but one cannot help wishing they might see themselves as others see them, or that they might be restrained in some kindly but forceful way. The third group are few in number but should be encouraged—those who, by what they say, even though it be said with diffidence and hesitation, show that they have given careful thought to the issue and, with much personal sacrifice of feeling, endeavor to give the Meeting a clear, concise and well-thought-out solution.

Another classification might be made were there more such, but fortunately they are not numerous, though they were in evidence more than once during the recent sessions—he or she who, near the close of a long sitting, or by breaking into the discussion of some topic, which may be similar in some of its aspects, introduces a matter often of very great importance and worthy of the full and fresh attention of the membership. Why cannot such refrain temporarily and bring up the topic at a more suitable time, when those present are less weary and therefore better able to give the matter the consideration it deserves?

It always seems to the writer that anyone, whether older or younger, whether occupying a gallery seat or a seat on the floor, should be very sure that what he has in mind to say is of real merit and will definitely assist the Meeting in arriving at a conclusion, before he imposes his opinion upon those present. Let none speak simply to relieve his own mind. If care were taken along these lines by all who "speak to business" much time would be saved, many useless discussions prevented and the real work of the church would be accomplished with more honor to the real Head of the Church.

WM. W. BACON.

THIS Yearly Meeting has indeed been different from the last one I attended seven years ago. In what lies the difference? We all feel it; the thought was expressed many times in the recent session that we have enlarged our borders and our sympathy and interest extend as a group to the people of many lands. Previously individuals may have felt the call to distant service, but it had not gripped us as a group.

And yet, I do not feel that the meeting this year was revolutionary. It did not overturn the good of that meeting seven years ago, nor disown the leadings of that session. The same divine Spirit which overshadowed us then and melted our hearts together in the outpourings of His love, has again been with us, leading us into new paths as we opened our hearts to that influence. We have had in our sessions historical reviews of past events. Watson Dewees gave us an account which I had not heard before. He said that it was because of the desire of Friends to avoid taking part in differences, because of their love of peace, that all communication was cut off with outside meetings fifty years ago.

Now in our day it is that same love of peace which has led us into new ways. A great war challenged us to arise and defend our ancient faith, and not only to defend it by cheerfully going to prison for it, but for all of us to so live and so to act that no one could doubt that the way of conferring love was the best way of protecting the world from the dangers of militarism.

To prove our faith we joined whole-heartedly in relief work abroad. Then came the thought that we must also keep our ledger clean at home. A Social Order Committee and a committee on Race Relations were created to help us to carry the gospel of love into every avenue of our activities and to all those whom our lives touch. As our hearts continued to burn for those who were suffering in Europe, our thoughts turned to the needy in all lands. A committee on Christian Service in Foreign Lands came into existence. This year this concern has further taken hold of the meeting. A committee has been appointed to work out a plan for incorporating the foreign work more closely among the meeting's activities.

More and more as we worked we saw that we could still be faithful to our light as we saw it, even though we united our hearts and our efforts with others who had convictions differing from ours. This year, in addition to sending epistles to several yearly meetings, we have appointed delegates to the Five Years' Meeting and have sent out an epistle to all conservative bodies of Friends, in America and England. We can indeed feel that, as we have tried to live faithful to our testimony for peace in the world at large, we have also been striving to bring all Friends into one group to struggle for the gospel of conquering love which can unite all men into one brotherhood.

We have also been attempting to come into closer co-operation with other Christians. Our Committee on Church Federation gave its report; and we sent out a letter to all followers of Christ everywhere, urging all to unite in conquering the evil of militarism, with the spirit of Christian love. When all Christians work together, what wonders may be accomplished for the advance of the Kingdom of God!

As we have labored for greater co-operation without, we have also had a care for our own household of faith. Our Extension Committee gave its report, and we are to appoint this year a Visitation Committee. It was recognized that our corporate strength to do all the work which lies before us depends on the vitality of our meetings for worship. They need not be large meetings, but they must be live meetings, where we meet together to worship and commune with Him who alone can give us strength to carry out the tasks which He wants us to do.

As the work of the year was reviewed in the report of the Friends' Service Committee, we were humbled in spirit, as we knew that in our name millions of dollars had been given and millions of children had been fed. Our hearts went out into loving sympathy and prayer for the workers who are suffering from disease and hardship abroad. In our ears was sounded no uncertain call. All that we have done it was only our duty to do. We have been unprofitable servants. As Rufus Jones pointed out, the battle will be won by him who is equipped with the armor of light which is able to melt down walls of opposition and hatred.

Let us, like gentle Samuel Emlen, so live that we may be a benediction to all those around us, reflecting, as in a mirror, the glory of God, as we strive to do our Master's bidding. Let us have all the best that has been in our past as we face our problems of the future, filled with His spirit, waiting for His guidance, answering to His call.

CATHARINE J. CADBURY.

"No man liveth unto himself" might well be taken as a text in summing up the results of the late Yearly Meeting. For there was a keen realization of our broadening activities, and, as a corollary, a deep sense of increased responsibility, both as individuals and as a Church.

We live in a far different world from that of a generation ago. It is impossible for a live religious body not to change, in some degree, with the changing conditions of life. And this can be accomplished without forsaking the great fundamental tenets of its faith. It is a recognition of this fact that enabled the Yearly Meeting to take certain courses of action made necessary by an altered world.

Our widened sphere of influence and usefulness has made inevitable a trend of tendencies which would have been deemed impossible, if not undesirable, a score of years ago.

This is quite noticeable in regard to our attitude toward Foreign Missions, for it is now the intention of the Yearly Meeting to identify itself as a body with this movement by the appointment of a Committee to handle this situation.

Another significant departure was the appointment of a Committee to nominate delegates to attend the Five Years' Meeting. In the discussion of this subject there was a sharp difference of opinion in search of Truth, but in the profound and impressive silence that ensued, the sense of the Meeting was felt to be that delegates should be sent.

The suggested change in the wording of the Fifth Query in regard to diversions is a case in point. The suggestion came in the form of a minute from Concord Quarterly Meeting, that the question of theatres, dancing and moving pictures might be covered by an injunction or admonition as to the proper and profitable use of our leisure hours. It brought to mind the saying of St. Augustine, "Love God enough and you can do as you please." We were all touched by the remarks of Benjamin Vail on this subject, and his concluding sentence, twice repeated, was very impressive—"Oh, for a closer walk with God!"

The question of dealing with those of our members who had enlisted in the late war was introduced by Watson W. Dewees. To the present writer the remarks of John T. Emlen seemed quite apposite. For he realized that those who enlisted (though not unmindful of the Friends' doctrine in this regard) did so from conscientious conviction. He felt that those Friends should not be taken to task for doing what they thought right, but should be dealt with in a sympathetic, understanding way.

Now that the Meeting is concluded we wonder what problems will confront our next session. We may rest assured that they will be solved, as these were, by a reliance upon Truth.

Friends have now a wonderful and unique opportunity. The Society is known much more widely than ever before. The name stands for uprightness in thought and deed; for loving and helpful service here and abroad; it is synonymous with peace. Let us remember our inheritance and make the most of it.

CHARLES B. HESTON, JR.

YEARLY MEETING OVER:— "AND WHAT SHALL THIS MAN DO?"

It was indeed a privilege to any member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to sit through the sessions of the week. And with the privilege over there is now the responsibility. No one can fail to realize that through our various committees we have launched out on a program of unusual activity and testimony to Christianity as "a way of life." Yes, before us is "an open door."

We desire to emphasize in all the relationships of life that the efficiency of man in his helpfulness to others is entirely dependent upon the sufficiency of Jesus Christ to supply all spiritual needs.

A man once hurried into a church just as the congregation was departing. He quickly asked, "Is the sermon done yet?" "No," was the answer; "We are just now going out to do it!" The exhortations and inspirations of our Yearly Meeting are over; but what are we, as individuals, going to do about it?

Most of the active work is detailed to special committees. But the majority of our members are not placed upon committees. The average member has therefore no definite responsibility for the coming year. So we ask, "And what shall this man do?"

What can the average member do, with or without committee appointment, to assist the Yearly Meeting in its duty of proclaiming the Gospel and hastening the Kingdom?

There are more than a dozen different committees related to our Meetings for worship, our moral reforms and our religious and institutional work at Tunesassa, at Christiansburg, at Cheyney, in Philadelphia, and on the foreign field. Those who serve on these committees need the active encouragement and support of the rest of us.

"And what shall this man do?" For my own meeting, I can be regular in attendance and encourage others to do the same. I can go to meeting in the prayerful expectation that the Holy Spirit will be present to bless, comfort and instruct in the Truth. I can help the Visitation Committee by visiting other meetings, "as way opens;" or offer auto transportation to help others. I can also help the First-day School by attending, by teaching a class, substituting or at least being well prepared in the study of the Bible. I can recommend to others the value of the Bible School in its service to the Meeting and making it a living strength to its members. I can spend some time each day in devotional Bible Study for my own spiritual growth. For those committees which aim to promote Moral Reforms, such as peace, temperance and the Social Order, each of us can by God's grace be exemplary in living in the peace of God, as a temple of God, and as a personal representative of Jesus Christ in human relationships, especially among working people. Of course, as "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself," only as we are "in Christ" can we reconcile others to God's will.

When conferences or public meetings are held in the interests of these great Christian movements, I can help advertise them and get others to attend. I can distribute literature, and speak from experience concerning these reforms.

As an average member, I can assist the Inter-racial Committee in its concern, by being friendly to the negro citizen of my town or city. I can take a car-seat beside the foreigner and perhaps with a word or a smile make the day brighter. Whether African or Russian, Italian or Polish, Japanese or Jewish, I can recognize in them potential "sons of God," if they too will recognize the Lordship of Jesus Christ. If "a good soldier," I can at least recommend "the captain of salvation." Nothing will so quickly melt the frost of racial jealousy as "the love of Christ."

For the institutions such as Tunesassa, Christiansburg, the Shelter, Benezet House, etc., our Friends' Missions in Japan, China, Syria and for our members in other stations conducting Christian work, I can each year make contributions of money; and I can at least each week pray for God's blessing upon the work and the workers. What a wonderful help it is to those workers when they know that friends are definitely and regularly holding them up before the Father in Heaven in intercession.

For the committee on the Extension of Christian Fundamentals, I can be an ally by giving money and by having in my pocket some of the Pennsylvan Leaflets, ready with the opportunity, which is readily found, to give to another who will likely be found to be open-minded and hungry for Truth. The Committee will gladly send out samples, so we may know what Leaflets there are and which ones we can most readily distribute. And as the basis of these fundamentals is the New Testament, why shouldn't I recommend it, and even give away a copy to one who will read it? Our Bible Association wants just such "salesmen" for Christ! So before this "open door,"—"what shall this man do?" "Be instant in season and out of season," "redeeming the time, for the days are evil!" There is really so much I can do, as an average member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, that I'll fail, unless "the love of Christ constraineth me."

WM. H. RICHIE.

THE report of the work of the Representative Meeting as read at the first sitting of the Yearly Meeting was rather remarkable for the number of subjects it had under its care and the conclusions and objects accomplished.

The Representative Meeting is by all odds the most important of our committees. It is, and should be, composed of the very best material. We find, however, that at many of its sessions not over seventy per cent. of the members were present. One naturally asks the question why should there be that many absentees from so influential a body? Perhaps we are putting too much work on a few busy people. Many of those on this particular committee of which I am speaking are members of other committees. Looking closely at the names of the members on the twelve committees as published, we find one name repeated six times, four five times, five four times, more than a dozen three times and those appearing twice would be about forty. There are three hundred and ninety names in the aggregate. From the foregoing analysis it would seem they represent about two hundred individuals. No doubt a minority of these do a major part of the work. The meeting duties of these Committee Friends are also increased in the various sub-committees of the Yearly Meeting and in their own Quarterly and Monthly Meetings. It looks as if we had too many activities. Is it quite fair to place so many burdens on a few? These men and women have other cares, which really touch their lives closer than meeting duties, outside of a strictly religious character. We cannot very well get away from the concerns which the Yearly Meeting has taken up. Neither is it right for a few of our friends to overtax themselves. Membership in the Representative Meeting would almost seem to be enough for one person. I would not be so drastic as to say they should be ineligible to other committees. Let nominating committees in the future look around a little more and see if there is not promising material among our younger people. The way to interest most any one in our business meeting is to give him something to do. The reason a great many do not take hold of the subjects which should more nearly claim their attention is because they are not asked. If it is said others are not competent it surely is a sad commentary on our educational system during the past forty years. Few among us have ten talents, but there are many with one or two. Perhaps a wider membership in the numerous committees would result in a better acquaintance and brighter viewpoint. Those now in the younger walks of life will have to do this work some time, and the sooner they are called on to do it the better for all concerned.

So much work as is now thrust upon a few does not tend to calmness and patience that should be our portion. We should not ask any one to rush from his business every few days and probably neglect what should be first duty in life, i. e. provide for his own household. The advices in the Discipline tell us to conduct our meetings with "dignity, forbearance and love for each other." This is sound advice and equally applicable to the daily routine of our lives. Rushing to a Committee meeting and worrying about one's business and how things are at home does not promote that calmness which should characterize us as a people. "Ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them."

Appropos of the foregoing sentiments, I might relate a circumstance which came to my notice. At thirty years of age, a certain man was being considered for the position of assistant Clerk of the Quarterly Meeting. The nominating committee concluded he would not be the one for the place. Afterwards he held nearly every position within the gift of his own and the Yearly Meeting. He was often worried with so much work, away from his home and farm. He said to me on more than one occasion, "I cannot manage my business as I should like."

The Society's first duty should be the welfare of its members. The betterment of the individual is above worn out customs and traditions.

EDUCATION.

The Report of the Educational Committee was one of the most inspiring papers that came before our Yearly Meeting. What impressed me was not the facts it presented but the spirit that animated it. It was full of creative imagination of the possibilities of our educational institutions. It breathed the spirit of dedicated service which is essential if those possibilities are to be realized. It bore a striking testimony to the power of consecrated leadership of which the life of Gertrude Roberts Sherer was such an impressive example. The news of her death since the report was written deepened these impressions and opened up before us not only the need of worthy successors in her particular line of work but also the opportunity for our best talent in the entire educational field.

We are coming more and more to realize that most of the great reforms for which we strive, the christianizing of all relationships of life, are likely to be brought about less by the conversion of this generation than by the education of the next.

Theoretically, the Society of Friends stands high on many of these issues. We have preached Christianity as a way of life rather than a creed. Numerically we are negligible—far more so than we should be did we but live what we preach—but through the schools and colleges controlled by Friends we have an opportunity to spread our conception of Christianity far beyond the limits of our own membership.

Are we making the most of these institutions? Our reply to such a question will depend largely on how we answer such questions as these:—Has the Society of Friends anything worth giving in the field of education? Are our schools and colleges Quaker institutions in anything but name? Are we providing an adequate supply of well-equipped teachers?

The limits of this article do not permit any full discussion of these questions. I believe that Friends can make a real contribution to education and that our emphasis on freedom of the spirit puts us in line with the best educational tendencies of today. It seems to me, however, that too few of our schools and colleges are dynamic centres of modern Quakerism.

The presence of other than Friends on the Boards of Managers of some of these makes it almost impossible for them to be such centres. In others the difficulty lies in the lack of well-equipped Quaker teachers. If the ideal of service guides us many more Friends will certainly dedicate their lives to teaching. We want no narrow sectarianism, but we are losing one of our great opportunities for influence if we do not make our educational institutions vibrant with the fundamental Christian truths which we profess.

TWO ATTITUDES.

Two Friends went up to Yearly Meeting.

One sat and thought of the accomplishments of Friends. "Love and unity are maintained among us. We have a ministry exercised in the fresh life and power of the Holy Spirit. We show forth the sincerity and simplicity which accord with the gospel of Christ. We read the Bible daily and guard our children from corrupting influences. We do not go to theatres, operas or dances and do not take oaths, bear arms, or gamble. We have no fellowship with unbelievers. As stockholders and employers we are vitally concerned that the conditions of work of our employes are such as we would desire for our own brothers and sisters; we earnestly endeavor to secure for them wages and leisure sufficient for the fullest self-development, and in order to do so we are willing to accept smaller financial returns for ourselves. As employes we give in full measure the service for which we are employed. We contributed $50,000 last year to feed the hungry and clothe the naked in Europe, and inasmuch as we have done this unto some of the least of these His brethren we have done it unto Him. I am glad to be a member of the Society of Friends."

The other lifted up his eyes on the need about him, millions dying from want of food and clothing, from disease and other preventable causes; multitudes perishing for want of the love and brotherhood which Christ taught. He pondered how little the Society of Friends is doing to meet these needs. And from the depths of his heart he cried, "Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner."

If the Society of Friends is to advance the Kingdom of Heaven on earth, does it need a larger measure of either of these two attitudes and, if so, which?

HAROLD EVANS.

EXTRACTS FROM PEACE ADDRESS.

(Given Third Month 30th, in the Arch Street Meeting-house.)

"Christ condemns the schism between Friends. Christ condemns the growing schism between the churches. Christ condemns division between the nations. Christ condemns the reliance upon principles and not upon co-operation in settling industrial disputes. Christ condemns the schism between Friends—it isn't Christianity; it is Pharisaism!" said Frederick Libby, at the Peace Meeting on the evening of the 30th.

Looking up, not back, can the Society of Friends go forward as it began—a movement so vital that it could not be contained within walls, that it spread through the other churches. If it is possible that in 250 years there has accumulated a mora earnestness that can solve the problems of this time, "then God has prepared the Society of Friends as an instrument for His work. It should be a united instrument; it must be a living instrument."

"The world that we have been seeing in this Yearly Meeting is a world of strife." It is not a pleasant picture; "but I affirm that it is the real world." The Conference and the treaties and other such moves, we must support, lacking though they are in idealism and resting upon economics and necessity; but we must also work for true religion and faith which regenerates men. Manufacturers are combining to crush labor unions, and those who have labored so hard to build them are fighting back. In the Near East, the menace of the Turk is rising. "It is a world of strife, and what have we with which to combat it? A world of frivolity!" Rich people unmindful of the poor. Young people who have not been taught enough about God. Many of you feel it in your own homes—they are not trained because they are blind and with blind leaders.

Some people will say it is because we have strayed from the essentials of faith. "There is no salvation in orthodoxy!" The longer a man's creed is, the deader is the man. It has always been so; it was so in the time of Christ. "God doesn't wish schism at any time." "Religion, that is the real thing, religion that shall be incarnated in a consecrated body as it was once in Jesus' time, that and that alone is the sufficient solution to the problems of this time."

It needs consecrated brains. Between capital and labor, it takes not merely good intentions, and between nations not merely good wishes. It must be solved wisely step by step. "To discover the next step, that is our task and, when that is discovered, then the next."

"God means us in our time to abolish war. But there again there must be more vision than I have yet discerned in the Society of Friends; there must be more sacrifice than I have yet witnessed."

We need your full support. We must have your moral backing. Frederick Palmer said in a recent speech, "Until you lovers of peace have the consecration that I saw in the men on the front, I cannot expect that there will be the achievement of peace in our time." We need Friends in every community who are earnest and ready to give and to work, then we shall not lack for money as we do lack now.

What I want to see is that vision of what a warless world will be—that vision which will enable you to see how great a thing it will be just to abolish war."

THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF BALTIMORE YEARLY MEETING.

Two hundred and fifty years ago this spring the first General or Yearly Meeting of Friends in Maryland was held on the shore of West River, a dozen miles south of Annapolis. George Fox, the founder of the Society of Friends, on his journey from England to the American Colonies in 1672, arrived just in time to take part on this occasion.

Such an important and unusual event as this anniversary should have a worthy celebration, and therefore the bodies forming the two Yearly Meetings of Baltimore, equally interested in this event, have appointed committees to celebrate it jointly.

All Yearly Meetings, as far as possible, have been invited to send official delegates, and several of them have complied with this invitation. Other visitors will be very welcome. The time will be Fifth month 4th to 7th, inclusive, beginning on the evening of the 4th.

The exercises, according to the preliminary announcements, will consist of addresses by Elizabeth B. Emmott, of England, Frederick J. Libby, Gov. Wm. Sprout, of Pa., Jesse H. Holmes, L. Meachem Thruston, Elbert Russell and Rufus M. Jones. There will also be brief messages from representatives of churches and from the delegates from other Yearly Meetings.

On one evening scenes from Quaker history will be shown; and on the 6th all will sail down Chesapeake Bay to West River and visit the spot where the first Yearly Meeting was held.

Both the New Homewood Meeting-house, 3107 N. Charles Street, and that at Park Avenue will be used for the meetings. Visitors on arrival will register at one or the other.

Arrangements are being made whereby board and lodging will be made convenient to all. Accommodations for a limited number of guests will be provided at cost in the two Meeting-houses. Reservations will be made in the order of their reception.

All who desire to attend should send their names and wishes as to location to Mary F. Blackburn, Govans, Md., by Fourth Month 20th. Those who do not apply by that date will be expected to locate themselves.

THE EFFECT OF WAR ON FRIENDS IN AMERICA.

ELBERT RUSSELL.

The following table gives the results of an inquiry for all groups of Friends. The figures for the Liberal Yearly Meetings and Philadelphia (O) are based on fairly complete statistics. For the Conservative Yearly Meetings the figures represent estimates, except in the last column. These statistics indicate that in proportion to the membership only about one-tenth as many young men of the Liberal yearly meetings accepted combatant service as in the Progressive yearly meetings; while the proportion for the Conservative yearly meetings and Philadelphia (O) was even smaller. Here again the difficulty of finding out how many were furloughed for farm work or given deferred classification because of known objections to combatant service makes it impossible to estimate with any accuracy how many took the full C. O. attitude.

TABLE SHOWING ATTITUDE OF YOUNG FRIENDS TOWARD THE WAR

	Total Membership	Number of Men in Army & Navy	Number of Men Who Accepted Non-Combatant Service Under Draft	Number of Men and Women in Friends' Recons't Unit
Five Years' Meeting and Ohio Y. M. (P)	93,011	2,313*	600*	251
Friends' General Conference 7 Y. M's. (L)	18,218	298	29	67
Philadelphia Y. M. Arch St. (O)	4,479	82*	24	76
Conservative 7 Y. M's. (C)	4,000*	50*	20*	20
	119,708	2,817	673	414

* Estimated on the basis of the figures given for the meetings reporting. Actual number reported for Philadelphia Office was 56.

The general situation is summed up in the report of Commission V on "The Relation of the Life of the Society of Friends to the Peace Testimony" to the London Conference as follows:

"In general among the conservative groups a smaller proportion of the young men accepted military service; among the groups in close touch with the active persons in the American Friends' Service Committee a larger proportion accepted the opportunity for bearing a positive peace testimony which that Committee provided.

"In Canada the membership affected is very small. Two members were imprisoned for refusal to perform military work. They were given a two years' term, but released promptly after the signing of the armistice. They were the only men of their meetings to be called to the test—the others being allowed to remain on their farms.

"But the weakness of Friends in America during the Great War was not indicated merely by the conscientious actions of those who actually bore arms. Perhaps greater weakness in the peace testimony was shown by Friends above draft age in failure to understand and morally support the younger members who felt impelled by their conscience to be conscientious objectors; in failure to do constructive peace work, and in joining in the popular agitation for war campaigns.

"These older members by accepting war work for the government and by subscribing to war loans failed to support to the full the peace testimony of the Society in the one way in which such a testimony could most naturally and offensively be supported. Their actions often became a stumbling block to immature members who in facing more difficult decisions were looking for guidance or for consistent Quaker example. The Society was handicapped as an agency for peace by this serious division within itself—a division which meant not only a weakening in numbers, but unfortunately led in several meetings to bitterness of spirit."

One of the most notable post-war movements was the Forward Movement in the Five Years' Meeting. It was the outgrowth of a program entered on at the Five Years' Meeting in 1917; it took shape at a conference in Richmond (Ind.) at the beginning of 1920; and was worked out as part of the Inter-church World Movement. As carried out it was a joint product of the revival of genuine Quaker loyalty resulting from the challenge of the war to the Friends who felt most deeply the distinctive position of the Society, and the stimulus of the great "drives" for Belgian Relief and the various philanthropies finally consolidated in the "War Chest" idea. The advanced leaders of other denominations hoped to take advantage of the "drive" method and the "giving" spirit before it ebbed, and organized a tremendous movement for an increase of Christian co-operative activities in all departments. This Interchurch Movement was a magnificent conception, but it was an advance movement at the moment when a reaction was setting in from the strain of war-induced mass action, and interdenominational interests not solidly based in the average church member's interests. The Interchurch Movement was caught and partly wrecked by the reaction.

The Quaker phase of it was affected by the same tendencies and suffered to some extent in the general slump. In addition they were not united on the Forward Movement program or methods. The ultra-Evangelicals opposed it for doctrinal and personal reasons. It was too much a movement from outside and above, and did not represent real vital interests of the rank and file. It involved a greater financial budget than Friends were prepared for. But even though it did not reach its objectives, the movement succeeded in part. It resulted in greater support of the work of the Five Years' Meeting than ever before. It will have a good educational effect in preparing for a larger outlook and a unified program in the future. It will help on the process of training the membership to think in terms of the work of the Five Years' Meeting as a unit, as the work of the Service Committee has helped us to think and act in terms of the Society as a whole.

On one side, the war tended to emphasize the interdenominational and undenominational tendencies among Friends. Many had developed the community consciousness and co-operative spirit to the point where they had no interest in anything distinctly Friendly. When the war came with its sharp parting of the ways, their position came clearly to consciousness. Members with this attitude were found in all groups of Friends, but they were relatively fewest in the Conservative and Philadelphia (O) groups and most numerous among the Progressive and Liberal Friends. They felt that the Friends who stood by the pacifist position and refused to participate in the various kinds of war work had shamed them before the world and put an ineffaceable stigma upon the Society. An influential group of Liberal Friends (mostly of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting) issued a public statement disclaiming the official attitude of the Society, supporting the government, and approving of the war. A considerable effort was made to change the pacifist attitude of The Friends' Intelligence. The American Friend also received vigorous protests against its pacifist stand. Some were found to protest against the Bible School Board of the Five Years' Meeting, including in its publications anything that called attention to or emphasized our distinguishing beliefs. The ideal of a considerable group of Progressive Friends (which even many ministers share) seems to be that Friends should be one among Protestant religious bodies without consciousness of vital differences. To their way of thinking Quakerism should be an average colorless evangelical Protestantism which does not practice the ordinances, but attaches little importance to the omission.

This general attitude raises in the minds of Friends of this type important questions as to our future aims and mission. Many of them no longer feel any valid reason for our existence as a separate religious denomination, except that, because of historic conditions now outgrown, we find ourselves in possession of and responsible for a small section of the field of religious work at home and abroad, which we must still care for.

In the past one of the greatest contributions of the Society of Friends to Christian civilization has been to nourish men and women of spiritual vision, humane outlook and religious sincerity. It has furnished the world prophets and spiritual pioneers. As the guardian of exalted ideals and advanced testimonies, it has sought to communicate them to each oncoming generation. Even in modern times we have given many strong men and women to important interdenominational movements; for example, O. Edward Janney to the National Vigilance Committee for the suppression of the White Slave Traffic; Benjamin F. Trueblood to the American Peace Society; Hannah J. Bailey to the W. C. T. U.; S. Edgar Nicholson to the Anti-Saloon League, and Timothy Nicholson to the National Conference of Charities and Corrections. Does nothing remain for us in the future but to train leaders for other organizations or to furnish inspiration and ideals to interdenominational and undenominational movements?

SIX WEEKS IN RUSSIA

"It's a glorious country. I'm frightfully in love with it."

I turned in my chair expecting to see some tourist who had come recently from Switzerland or California. Instead, I confronted Gertrude Ostler, of Manchester, England, who had just stepped off the Courier train from the Russian border. She had been in Russia six weeks and I gather she would like to spend the rest of her life there.

She has been in charge of the campaign for contributions to the famine fund made through the Manchester Guardian. She was so successful in her efforts that the Society of Friends sent her to Russia to see the famine regions with her own eyes. And she returns to tell us that Russia is a wonderful country.

She is not speaking of scenery or mechanical achievement, or even of forms of government. She is thinking of people when she speaks of Russia. She has been among these people for a few weeks, too short perhaps to make profound analysis of anything in such a vast section of the world, but not too short to catch something of the quality of its people. For she has been among these people in the hour of their greatest misery. She has seen them resisting a mighty natural force—the famine.

She has seen every stage of the Friends' work of relief, from the arrival of the food trains in Moscow to the serving of the cooked food to the children in the kitchens at Buzuluk, and the most distant outpost of the area—as large as Belgium—where the Society of Friends is at work.

One of the villages visited was Novo Alexandrovka, once a community of prosperous small farmers. At the Central Kitchen there she saw rations given out to fifty children. Then she visited one of the families to which the rations went. She gives this picture of it:

"We had noticed a little fellow nine or ten years of age who had come to the kitchen for two rations, neither of them for himself. He stumbled away across the snow hugging the can of soup and cup of cocoa with the two bread rations buttoned under his coat. I thought the child would collapse any moment. His face was colorless. His lips drawn back. He was shivering and crying tearfully, as so many do. We went with him to his home and found the mother trying to cook some grass-flour, mixed with twigs and wood. The soup and bread were handed over to the two younger children and the boy stood watching them, following every movement of the wooden spoons, but not attempting to take anything for himself. Later, we saw him struggling once more across the heavy snow; slipping and stumbling and still crying quietly. We asked that if possible a ration should be given him. BUT HE IS ONLY ONE OF THE TENS OF THOUSANDS YET UNFED."

The following is the official report of one village:

General number of souls—2086, children under one year—106, children from one to sixteen—879, Nursing mothers—104, Fed by Government through the Co-operative—108, Fed by the Society of Friends—90, children not receiving food—609, number swollen from hunger—594, Dead already from starvation—Adults—96, children—113.

It is not strange that the letter accompanying this report, received by Arthur Watts, should read in part as follows: "Dear Friends: In the whole Volost you help 341 children and eleven adults and twenty-four mothers. You have saved these from death by hunger. But there are still 552 children and 3,678 adults who are not fed. They hold their hands to you and await a reprieve from death. We beg you to be to them as the Rising Sun in the East. Save them also from death! They pray to you and beg you for help, for it is only from you that help can come."

In one of the villages of this Volost, a peasant pressed to the front of the crowd and handed this note to Gertrude Ostler: "I beg you to include my children in the feeding centre of my village. I have six children, twelve to two years. These are not included. They are threatened by death from hunger." When she went to see this family she found them rationing out thence from the roof to these six children, who were living on a stew made from this and animal hair."

Traveling from Buzuluk to Andrieffka she was compelled to spend the night in the village of Lombazi; for her horse was so weak it could not go faster than a walk, and she made only fifteen versts in one day. With her interpreter, she put up for the night in the priest's family to which, of course, they gave some of their bread: "The priest and his wife sat at the table, their two children and the inevitable 'Aunt' remaining shyly in the shadow of the big oven. The father and mother would eat a little and then, putting down the food, would turn to each other and laugh. They said, 'It is so wonderful to be eating real bread.' The two children behaved very prettily. They would come from their places, take the little sandwiches we made for them very politely, and always say 'Spasibo' (thank you.) The priest said he had been sorry to be unable to celebrate Christmas, and added 'And now it has come after all.' An hour later he broke a long silence by saying, 'I think that the Quakers' work here will help me to be a better priest.' He said he knew about George Fox, and seemed much interested in the work of the Society."

The institutions are grim enough; but worse still are the private houses where people die without any attempt at care or medical treatment. Writing of one of the outpost villages, Gertrude Ostler says, "In company with Doris White, I visited a house where she had recently seen four children not far from death. We entered the home quite dreading what we might see. The mother was alone. We asked where the children were. She said they had gone to a neighbor's, then she corrected herself and said: "They are dead." We did not press her further. Doris White thought it most likely that she had hidden the bodies hoping, poor soul, that she might still receive their rations. In all the houses we visited, sick and dying people, men, women and children, were lying on the floor or on the big stone stoves. It was difficult to know what to say or what to do. We gave what food we had in our pockets, ashamed to look at their suffering and do nothing, but knowing that they would soon be dead. We found no bread in any of the houses save the bread made of leaves and sticks that tortures the children who eat it."

A report on the various hospitals in the town of Buzuluk, was drawn up by Gertrude Ostler. As Buzuluk is the capital of the area in which the Friends' Mission is working, these extracts illustrate typical conditions at the time of her visit in last Second Month.

In the Receiving Home for Sick and Abandoned Children, 160 children were congregated. "Deaths daily average four. Disinfection impossible because of lack of clothing. Typhus and hunger cases live together for a week, crowded into small rooms." In the Home for Children—"too sitting on bare, wooden beds and benches, too crowded for all to lie down. The sick in separate rooms. No bedding." Children's Hospital—"Generally four children in each bed under one cover. No medicine for children with typhus recurrens and diarrhoea. No isolation for children suffering only from hunger. No change of bedding possible. Dead children often in beds with the living." Hospital for Typhus—"In one ward up to six and eight in each bed. No change of bedding." Hospital for Epidemic Diseases—"Doctor in charge doing his best, but no disinfection of patients possible. Doctor and his nurses unable to keep themselves free from lice. All looked badly in need of food themselves. I asked how he dealt with the dead, and he took me to a shed thirty feet from the wards where we saw seventy-five bodies—stripped and frozen—men, women and children."

Her footnote to her remarks about all these institutions was: "In the hospitals that I visited the staffs seemed to be doing their best under the appalling conditions, but efficiency is obviously impaired by underfeeding."

Yet in spite of all she has seen Gertrude Ostler can say that she loves Russia. Perhaps such incidents as these explain it. In a few notes on her travels through the small villages she says: "If you have time to put up the sleigh and see the headman of the village, you may be absolutely sure of a welcome; and if there is a samovar in the place, it will soon be ready for you. The gracious hospitality of these suffering peasants is a beautiful thing to remember. I think of one village where our meal was spread in the living-room. The starving family withdrew lest their presence should embarrass us. Only after much insistence could they be induced to share our tea and bread, and then only after they had been assured that we had enough to see us through our journey."

This is one of the reasons why the Friends' workers love the people to whom they are taking a little food and a little clothing. This is why so many of them say with Gertrude Ostler, "It's a glorious country."

EDITORIAL.

WHETHER it seemed to us wise to send Fraternal Delegates to the Five Years' Meeting or whether we would rather they had not been sent, still all of us were actuated by the desire to further our testimony to a free gospel ministry. 'Some felt that this could best be done by sharing our ideals with others, while some hesitated lest we compromise those principles. The immediate issue is past and we are sending fraternal delegates, but does not the real issue lie ahead? Has not this action placed not only on the delegates but on every individual member of our Yearly Meeting the responsibility of seeing that we at home are living out the principles which we are anxious shall not be compromised at Richmond? If we are perfectly honest in our own hearts are there not many of us who believe in our manner of worship and yet who are not accepting it with our whole lives. We believe in it outside of our meetings, but we are rather afraid to believe in it in our meetings. We want every one else in the meeting to believe in it, we want them to be willing to take their share in the worship and ministry, but are we not too apt to say, "Lord, I pray Thee have me excused?" And He does have us excused. We do not hear the call. Is it because we are out of calling distance? If we purposely stay out of calling distance, if we put the responsibility on others, then are we in reality believing in our ideal of worship? Is anyone who goes to our meetings and does not enter into the corporate worship of the group and is not willing to take any place God calls for, is any such member holding true to our principles? On our delegates there rests a heavy responsibility,—but is it fair to expect them to carry to others that which we so imperfectly live up to? Have we no share in determining the degree of influence they may have? Surely in that measure in which we are living our principles, will they be able to interpret them to others.

FRIENDS' MEETINGS IN COLLEGES.

On Third-day of Yearly Meeting week in Philadelphia, there met, in a little out-of-the-way tea-room, a group of thirteen girls, representing four colleges: Mount Holyoke, Vassar, Oberlin and Wellesley. Our purpose was to discuss the Friends' Meetings that we are holding in our respective colleges.

It was evident from our discussion that a need for such meetings either is felt now, or was felt at some time by each college group. That this feeling is not always equally intense may be readily explained by the fact that certain groups at certain times feel that their desire for religious expression is satisfied by the various activities furnished by the college organizations, including students of all nations and denominations, and carried on in very much of a Friendly manner.

Some may feel, at times, that chapel services, which have, in most cases, required attendance, satisfy them to a good degree, and the lack of a convenient time for meeting tends to allow the chapel to function alone.

There are some of us, however, who have found great help in our small Friends' meetings in our colleges, whether they are long or short. Where the number of Friends in a large college community is relatively small, the difficulties in getting our meetings "going" have proved worth all our efforts.

I believe that every college meeting has its ups and downs. In the first place, as hinted before, the time problem is great, since the various activities of the college keep the students very busy, and First-day is crowded with religious meetings and student gatherings of one kind and another. Also, that day is the one day when several students may meet together socially for any length of time, especially in those colleges where the hour for retiring is determined by the authorities. On large campuses it may be hard to find a suitable place to meet—one which can be reached conveniently by all members. Some students find themselves hampered by the lack of congeniality, one with another, since they are a mixed group who do not know each other well. However, we are not to be discouraged by these difficulties. They are bound to come, and where the need of a meeting is not heavily felt, it has been found best not to force it, but to wait a little, for after we have done without a meeting for a time, a renewed desire often creeps in, so that when one is finally formed, there is greater life and strength in it than would have been had it been kept up merely through a sense of duty. Some of us feel bound to admit that part of the success of our own meeting is due to the knowledge that students in other colleges can and do hold very successful meetings, wherein they receive much comfort and strength.

Different groups are helped by different kinds of meetings. Some feel that they want meetings wherein they may discuss the various problems up against which they come. The discussion may be on friendly matters, on such subjects as the relation of Friends to the rest of the college, community, or world-at-large, or on topics concerning college life, teachings and ideals in general. They usually begin or end with a devotional period.

Other groups find that silent worship fits their needs best. In some of these cases the required Bible courses are felt to furnish ample opportunity for the discussion of religious problems and allied topics, and find in their silent meetings a higher form of strength and fellowship than that which they can receive from any other college gathering.

In practically all of our meetings we include people who are not in membership with us, but who are united with us by ties of friendship or by interest in and enjoyment of our meetings.

We all desire to make our meetings worth more, not only to ourselves, but also to our college community. We feel, in some vague way, at least, that our groups should stand for something to the college at large, and we would like all those who are desirous of coming closer to God and to our Saviour Jesus Christ through friendly worship, to feel free to gather with us in a true spirit of fellowship.

THE DESERT.

Few there be that know the beauty
Of this barren waste of sand,
Few there be that love the silence
Of this solitary land.

But the children of the desert
Reared upon its burning breast,
Know its hardships and its sorrows,
Yet they love it still the best.

For they know its myriad secrets,
Love its changing moods and ways,
Love its roving midnight breezes,
Love its breathless scorching days.

Its mystery chains and binds them,
Till they see naught but its best,
And its bareness seems but beauty,
And its silence seems but rest.

THE CHILDREN'S MEETING.

After attending the meeting on Fifth-day morning of Yearly Meeting week specifically for children between the ages of ten and fourteen, I feel more sure than ever before that our Young Friends' Group must grow in unity and power. Our inheritance is greater than we know, and we must grasp it yet more fully that we may have it in our possession to pass on to these still Younger Friends.

One hundred and twenty-five children stopped wriggling and giggling the instant Margaret James suggested that we begin our meeting with a few moments of silence. They sat for those few minutes, eager and alive with expectation, and at the same time beautifully still. Margaret told them of the Children's Meeting held in England. The children said together the Twenty-third Psalm with real reverence and implicit faith.

"Friendliness" was the theme of the meeting and from each of eleven children representing the different communities we heard a story or a poem illustrating a friendly attitude.

Frances Tatum Rhoads told several interesting stories of Yearly Meeting long ago, and then explained clearly why we come to Yearly Meeting and what it means to be a Friend. She made our obligations as members of our Society seem very real, and yet very simple:—"It is for us to show the friendly spirit." She drew us "nearer together in our spirits and nearer to our Heavenly Father" and her prayer in the period of devotion after her talk was truly a benediction.

THE TRAINING FOR MINISTRY.

[The following is a copy of part of a letter of our late beloved friend, Joseph Elkinton, and was addressed by him, Second Month 5, 1907, to a young Friend. It is presumably one of very many much like it, for our friend had a voluminous correspondence, it being one of his delights to hear from his many friends abroad and to share their messages with his friends at home. The tone of encouragement that pervades the letter in hand was characteristic of Joseph Elkinton. Who can tell how many timid and down-hearted ones have gone on their way from his door cheered and made stronger for their tasks!—Eds.]

The Society of Friends is needing the very best talent it can have, but the gentle impression and constraints of the Spirit must always be the guide for our ministry. The tendering power of these impressions is worth far more than all the ideas that can come into our minds or the theories we may entertain. The exercises through which we pass in coming into a suitable condition to effectually minister to those who are in any need, doubtless will depend upon our past life and disposition somewhat, but I am sure there is a discipline to be gone through that refines and humbles us and makes us willing to do anything or nothing just as the Lord of life directs.

Our human faculties may be in close accord with His Will if we desire to dedicate all we possess to His service. Thus I felt yesterday morning in our Quarterly Meeting as if my mind offered no resistance to and was working easily in delivering the message that came before me, soon after taking my seat in meeting, but I wished to feel the commission to speak before attempting to do so.

The opinion of others or of thy own will must always be held subordinate to the constraints of thy own conscience. I know we can and do make mistakes, but if in entire sincerity and humble obedience to what we feel to be our duty we are not as wise as we might be, He will wonderfully supplement our lack,—if we keep really humble.

To have a real call to the ministry is a trust I long should be committed to those of thy age, who will give themselves unreservedly to it and just do their duty in this line when it arises. And so go on, my dear young friend, in simple attention to what thy Heavenly Father intimates is His blessed will.

We do not have to take any thought for the morrow or the next moment, in the sense of being anxious, but simply yield when the call comes, and it comes so unexpectedly at times and so variously it keeps us always on the alert to perceive the voice of the Spirit—gentle as its whisperings at times seem to be.

With tender interest, thy friend,
JOSEPH ELKINTON.

THE GATE INTO THE CITY.

Now that we are actually on the ground and more or less settled, I must tell you how it really seems to eat and drink and sleep and live in China.

I am sitting here in the quaint Chinese Compound which is the Y. M. C. A., while Joe is having a Board meeting in the next room. But while the men decide matters of importance, I shall talk with you about the pilgrimage and the gate into the city that opened wide.

We started from Moylan, Twelfth Month 28, 1921; we arrived in Moukden First Month 27, 1922. It was a long and interesting journey with short stop-overs in St. Louis, Kansas City, Vancouver, three ports in Japan, and Shanghai. Shanghai was the mildest possible introduction to China. It is a baffling composite of foreign and Chinese. For us it was chiefly American, as we were entertained for luncheons, teas and dinners by a perfect volley of Y. M. C. A. colleagues. It was like finding a new family instead of entering a new land.

One real Chinese evening we had with my good Wellesley friend, Ying Mei Chun Sin and her family. It would have drawn tears from your eyes to have witnessed my carnivorous manoeuvres with chop-sticks. Fancy eating rice and tiny bits of meat and wee little goodies of every variety from the tips of these slippery tools. Just as I thought I had a savory chestnut all dipped from a wonderful brown gravy safe to my mouth, thump it would fall back into my bowl in the most rude and uncouth manner, leaving me stranded and helpless! In the words of that solemn text:

"There's many a slip Twixt the cup and the lip."

And I should add:

"There's many a trick
In that little chop-stick."

But this is a digression.

Aside from this one Chinese evening and the fleeting impressions from the three days' journey on the train from Shanghai to this city, my first real taste of China was reserved for Moukden. The differences hit me first; the likenesses follow and stick. In another month or year I shall be incapacitated for any sweeping and sketchy description of Moukden seen by the "naked eye." While I can and before I have time to correct my first impressions I must hazard a few generalizations about China as I am seeing it these first days.

The external impression is that of brownness and greyness. A sort of ancient dust of ages seems to subdue the background into neutrality. There are mud streets, mud walls, thatched or grey tile roofs, brown people, brown fields. Against this background are the gaily painted signs and decorations of the shops, much blue robe of the ordinary man's garb, much red paper for the Chinese New Year season. The low houses are spread out over much horizontal space in monotonous reaches. And yet the density of these reaches—the little shops crowded close together, the streets a perfect ant-hill of industry and endeavor. The hum of the city is as different from the hum of an American city as a rigsha is different from an automobile. There is little machinery, much of the human cry about it,—more discordance and hunger if possible. One cannot get away from it; it presses in through every unaccustomed nerve. I call it the "cry of China." It is composed chiefly of men calling their wares in a weird, high-pitched piercing cry, beginning with entreaty and in a long-drawn-out wail; of the harsh clang of tinny instruments belonging to fortune-tellers, barbers, tinsmiths and other vendors, of the shouting of rigsha coolies. It is wistful, patient, continuous. When you hear more of it you know that a funeral is passing, or a wedding, or some other sort of human event. So much for the naked eye and ear!

Of the people there are four kinds—and many more. There are the foreign "community people" as they are called, and the missionaries. The "community people," are out here in business or diplomatic service. There may be fifty Americans. They live mostly in the Japanese city of Moukden. The missionaries live in the Chinese city and number forty to fifty. There are only four Americans of us and the rest are British or Danish. The majority are medical men owing to the fact of the medical school and hospitals situated in Moukden. They are not the severe sanctimonious type, but a good, red-blooded, human, jolly crowd. A select crowd, however, of abnormally fine people, I should say, from the British Student movement and other big-minded sources. The third and fourth kinds of people are Chinese—the mass of rather quaint and unexplicable general public and the central focus of Joe's boys—Chinese students and officials who are being touched by the Y. M. C. A. It is interesting to notice how day by day this infinite mass of Chinese is beginning to break up into personalities—as distinct each from each as personalities are the world over—in Europe and America and Asia.

I must tell you about the first night when the process began. It was the Welcome Party that the Chinese Y. M. C. A. gave to us. It reached further into my heart than anything that has happened yet. I knew through every pore that night why we had come to China. I must try to give you some of the feeling of it. The setting was very Chinese and attractive. The boys had decorated the central room and had two long tables spread with refreshments of marvelous variety. But before we partook of physical refreshment there was a series of tributes to Joe's work and welcomes to us, lasting an hour or so. Of course it was all in Chinese except one quartette that the boys sang in stumbling English for my benefit I suppose, but Joe's colleague sat at my left and interpreted the salient points as the speakers sped on.

There was a speech by a dear old man who is the Vice-President of the Board of Directors (the Board is entirely Chinese). I wish you could have seen his face as he sang "Nearer, my God, to Thee," swaying gently back and forth—he and another dear old soul. Then Joe's prize secretary spoke in behalf of the secretarial staff. I felt I could almost understand this big man Yen. Governor Chang Tso Sin's son gave a very remarkable speech on the crying need of the women of China. From a boy of twenty-one this was quite impressive! He is not yet a member of the Christian Church, but a very restless seeker who can't yet decide to pay the price. He is already in high government rank and his father is considered by many to be the most powerful man in China. There is much involved in this young man's position therefore.

After these and other speeches Joe was called on for a response. How glad I was he could stand up and speak with apparent ease in the unknown tongue the great things we were feeling in our hearts! And they were great things. One felt the consecration of that little group of Chinese; the hunger of their hearts to share the Christian message with their fellow-men; their love for the Y. M. C. A.; the love of God for them all. It swept through my heart like a flood what a wonderful, wonderful thing it was to come so soon into this little circle of eager workers and disciples and friends and to help them just a little in their great task.

SONNET.

I have felt beauty throbb beneath the stars
And quiver in the far horizon's haze,
Till this old world of ours on which I gaze
Shrinks into nothingness, and all the bars
That bind the grandeur of the night are snapped,
While through the vast uncharted waters of space
Wave after wave of beauty flows apace
And in their flood our universe is wrapped.

The fathomless wonder pulsing through the air
Bears my lone spirit on its bosom, till
For one great moment all the night grows still,
And in the midst of this strange silence, I Am part of all the beauty everywhere,
Part of the earth, the stars and the domed sky.

A SOCIAL SERVICE INTERPRETATION OF CITIZENSHIP. THE WHITE-WILLIAMS FOUNDATION.

The thing the White-Williams Foundation stands for above everything else is that every child must have his chance—and just as good a chance as the community can give, for we believe that the community is responsible for its misfits and failures—not the individual. Isn't it the most logical plan to get these misfits and prevent their becoming failures, and to get them early—so what more natural than to choose the school as the place in which to work?

So the W. W. F. is now working in ten public schools of different types—with children of all grades and ages from kindergarten to high school. We try to take schools, each one different from all the rest, as we are only a laboratory to prove to the community the need of social work in every school. One of the schools has children of only the first three grades, and there the counselor finds tremendous need of health work. There happens to be no nurse there to follow up and correct the defects which the school doctor finds. In the two years we have been working there we find that forty-three per cent. of the children repeated a grade and of those same children seventy per cent. have one or more physical defects. We feel that we have not studied enough children over a long enough time to make the statement definitely that the retardation is due to lack of physical care—but it certainly looks that way!

Another of our schools is in a foreign neighborhood. Would you have believed that in our good old Quaker city there could be a school of almost 1200 children, only five of whose parents were born in this country? (The principal told us this in Twelfth Month a year ago.) The counselor here finds it very necessary to interpret the school to the home—and, on the other hand, to explain to the teacher many of the old country's customs and traditions which, still clinging to the family, make it hard to teach the child in an American school, but which, once understood by the teacher, make the child a much more interesting subject to be taught.

Our counselor for a colored school in a colored neighborhood is given us by the Armstrong Association. Here again the problem is very different from the other schools. We had trouble with irregular attendance, developing into truancy—and the attendance officer hadn't been able to do much for it. Our counselor found that a great many of the mothers of the children went out to work by the day—leaving the children to shift for themselves on the streets, or else keeping the older children home from school to look after the younger. She has been instrumental in getting a day nursery for colored children started in that neighborhood, which is also developing into quite a community centre with clubs and classes for the older boys and girls in after school hours. I remember reading somewhere of a study made of the men in Sing Sing. By far the majority started their downward careers by playing truant from school!

Another of the ten schools is for backward children—not all of whom are mentally deficient. As yet in the Philadelphia public school a child does not have to have a psychological examination before being placed in an ungraded class—and so sometimes a boy or girl, who, on account of behavior has given much trouble to the teacher, finds him or herself in a class for deficient children. We count it of great importance to keep a normal child from such a class. Among the children in this school we find bad home conditions. The mothers (many of the children have no fathers) are not interested in the education of the children. Is there not a connection between these conditions and the child's being backward?

Through all the schools we try to guide the children toward the education and occupation for which they seem best fitted—anything and everything we can do to adjust a misfit to his rightful place.

When the child must leave school to go to work, the Junior Employment Service finds the job he is best fitted for—and follows him up for about two years (or longer when necessary) to see that he gets along all right. So many children, at their first attempt, take the blind alley jobs—and never get out of them! The Junior Employment Service is the only department of the W. W. F. which is directly under the Board of Education. The salaries are paid by the Foundation—but all the supplies, printing, etc., are given by the Public School system. All our offices (each counselor has an office right in her school building) are given us by the Board of Education.

Another department of the W. W. F., which was just started last Ninth Month, is the Department of Training. To-day, educators think it of the greatest importance that teachers shall understand and know the whole child—not just the part he shows in school—and so twenty-five scholarships were offered by the Foundation, given in co-operation with the Pennsylvania School for Social Service, to teachers and principals of the Public Schools to a course "Social Work in the Schools," to help them see the social side of their work. There were so many applicants keen to take the course that the number of scholarships was raised—and there is to be a repetition of the class in Second Month. It is next to impossible to really teach a class of fifty or sixty children, but it is surely more possible to teach intelligently when one knows something of the child's surroundings outside of school.

It is imperative that we, the community, give to the child as his right the things that will develop him, spiritually, mentally and physically, to the utmost of his ability—and it is not his fault if, for lack of any one of these things, he becomes maladjusted. The work of the W. W. F. is to discover how the schools may give (whenever possible to give through the agency organized for that particular purpose) the thing lacking to make the child the kind of citizen we need.

END OF THE YOUNG FRIENDS' NUMBER

THE EFFECT OF WAR ON FRIENDS IN AMERICA.

ELBERT RUSSELL.

Many seem to feel that the Society is to serve in the future chiefly as a religious holding company to administer our Quaker inheritance of character and idealism, and distribute its spiritual income to all good causes. The strongest members of some of our meetings come to meeting to renew their strength, but go to other organizations to find fields and instruments of service. They would apparently have us renounce as a Society our leadership in social and moral reforms: simply joining with the best organizations and leaders from other denominations in their undenominational or interdenominational "drives," concerted "movements," and "reforms." This would be a useful function, perhaps; but it would be a great renunciation of our ancient spiritual pre-eminence and moral leadership, if now we are to wait on the rest of the world for impulses and programs for human betterment and merely content ourselves with supplying honest workmen for the interdenominational factories that work them up into life.

But even so, misgivings must arise lest we are not taking due care to prevent the original trust from being dissipated and lost. What if the Quaker salt lose its Quaker savor? Are we taking necessary care to keep alive and healthy the Quaker goose that lays the interdenominational eggs? Will a colorless, interdenominational type of Quakerism, and a denatured system of Quaker education serve even such a purpose?

If this theory of our mission were accepted, this study of our present tendencies would have value chiefly as an inquiry into the educational and other means we have on hand to salt the Quaker salt, to keep alive and develop in individuals the Quaker spirit, ideals and loyalty.

I have described a school of thought which is perhaps best designated as "ultra-Evangelical." As a whole it is characterized by insistence upon an extreme evangelical theology with a strong admixture of holiness and pre-millennarian doctrines. It is generally in close touch with similar movements outside of the Society of Friends. It was largely influenced in its origin by the Plymouth Brethren and Moody, but the holiness and evangelical emphasis is chiefly due to Methodist influences during and following the Great Revival. It finds comfort and support in the Ranter influence in our early history and literature.

It is distinguished from the common type of historical Quakerism by its emphasis on total depravity and its despair of the world; its expectation of the speedy end of the world and the outward return and kingdom of Jesus; its literal interpretation of the Bible; its insistence on definite emotional experiences and on correct doctrinal belief. It is individualistic in temper; opposed to strong organization; emotional in worship; and looks for indications of Divine leading largely in strong feeling or even in ecstasy. It is intolerant of liberal thought and opposed to Social Service. Many of this school of thought were pacifist during the war and some of them supported the work of the American Friends' Service Committee, while others kept aloof from it and the London Conference because they involved co-operation with "Hicksites."

In all denominations, the war stimulated the pre-millennarian and Adventist type of thought tremendously throughout the country. It stimulated this type of belief among Progressive Friends also to renewed vigor. This is manifest in an increase in the number and activity of the "training schools" which are centres of this type of Quakerism. Within a recent period Haviland Academy (Kansas) and Greenleaf Academy (Idaho) have become such religious "training schools" and the Union Bible Seminary (Westfield, Indiana) has greatly enlarged its influence. There have been extensive changes in the personnel of the faculty at Cleveland Bible Institute. The Friends' Minister, published at the Union Bible Seminary (Westfield, Indiana) has increased its circulation among Friends in the Middle West, and though it has recently changed its name to The Gospel Minister it is the nearest a successor to the Evangelical Friend, as the organ of the "ultra-Evangelical" wing of Quakerism.

After a period of quiescence since the effort of 1912 to have the Five Years' Meeting adopt the Richmond Declaration as a creed, we hear in various quarters renewed insistence on the Declaration as a standard of sound doctrine. There are fresh outcroppings of intolerance toward liberal thought, and a revival of heresy-hunting. There are attacks, in print and in public speech on our educational institutions, on the leaders of the Five Years' Meeting, and the Forward Movement, as well as on the American Friends' Service Committee, the London Conference and all similar tendencies toward co-operation and union with other branches of the Society. In 1920 there was a powerful movement to have Oregon Yearly Meeting secede from the Five Years' Meeting which barely failed. The same year a strong drive by this element in Indiana Meeting led to the appointment of a committee to which members from Western were later added, to investigate the "soundness" of the teaching at Earlham College. There are threats of a similar attack on the "soundness" of The American Friend and of the heads of several of the departments of the Five Years' Meeting. Judged by the past, the movement could be expected to spend its force in a few years and there are already signs that it is waning. It has not sufficient organization, scholarship, nor coherence to keep together long. Meanwhile, it is a serious handicap to the work of education and of the departments of the Five Years' Meeting, and to progress toward unity. Its positive contributions to the Society are its zeal for evangelistic work and its emphasis on the need of individual religious experience.

On the other side of the ledger, we find among post-war tendencies in all branches of the Society a deepening of loyalty to the distinctive principles of Friends; definite service for international good-will along distinctly Quaker lines; and a new interest in the spread of our Quaker message to the world.

We have already seen that the Young Friends' Movement and our academies and colleges (along with other less effective influences) had at the outbreak of the war produced a group of young Friends who held our peace principles from conviction as well as tradition. When the war emphasized our unique position among Protestant denominations, they were proudly loyal to our history and principles and stood ready, not only to stand apart from the war, but to serve without pay, and to suffer, if need be, in the cause of Christian love and good-will. The experiences of the war-time have deepened their appreciation of their heritage. They are ready now to engage in Quaker propaganda, to work for unity in the Society and for the application of our interpretation of Christianity to social, industrial, and international problems. The fellowship of common service at home and abroad and of the London and Jordans Conferences has broadened their horizon, created a larger fellowship, and strengthened their determination to let our Quaker light shine on the world for the advancement of Christ's kingdom. The Earlham Summer Conference is the most vital centre of this new vigor and unity of thought and action.

The most notable achievement of Friends in the United States during the war was the formation and work of the American Friends' Service Committee. While other denominations contented themselves in the main with supplying spiritual fervor for the war machine and acting as agencies for un-denominational relief activities, we overcame the handicap of division and engaged in a constructive international service of reconstruction and good-will. For the moment the practical expression of our common peace testimony overshadowed our historic differences, and in the contact of joint committee work, sewing circles, and foreign service, Friends of different groups came to know each other and to respect one another's sincerity, Christian spirit, and Quaker principles. In addition, this "Service of Love in War Time" enabled many of our young people to find positive expression of their convictions in a time of stress when mere non-fighting seemed inadequate to the demands of the world-crisis. It enabled the conscientious objectors to keep their self-respect in the face of their fellow countrymen, and helped many to a new sense of the unique value of the principles of Quakerism which they were tempted in the first passions of the war to disown and abandon. The service work has also given Friends a new standing of regard and respect in the eyes of the world, and laid the foundations for a fresh propaganda of our principles. People are asking for the secret which led Friends to behave in such a beneficent and unique way in the midst of Christendom's orgy of hate and destruction.

There had been growing up in the Society before 1914 a tendency toward co-operation across the boundaries of our ancient divisions. The most notable results of it were the American Friends' Peace Conference (Philadelphia, 1901), The Whittier Fellowship Guest House at Hampton Falls, N. H. (1912-1913) and various centennial celebrations in which both branches of Friends joined. The war stimulated these movements toward unity. We have already noted this in the case of the Young Friends' Movement and the work of the American Friends' Service Committee. In New York and Philadelphia there were joint peace committees in the early days of the war. The two New York Yearly Meetings held a joint session on the subject of peace in 1917. There have been many cases where there have been joint lecture courses and study groups of the Friends of both branches. Young Friends of all groups attend the Earlham Summer Conference of Young Friends since 1920. In a few places the Orthodox and Liberal Friends hold their First-day or mid-week meetings together all or part of the year. Woolman School is a joint enterprise for Quaker education. In London Grove (Pa.) and Moorestown (N. J.) the schools maintained by the two branches have been consolidated. The London Conference was the latest and greatest recognition of the essential oneness of the various groups of Friends, in their principles and common tasks. There is an extensive and growing interchange of visitors at important gatherings, summer schools and conferences, of teachers in Friends' schools, and of ministers at Yearly and Quarterly Meetings. Our newer literature is in common use among all groups.

The war and the contacts resulting, culminating in the London Conference, have made clear that the historical divisions of American Friends no longer correspond to our real divisions. The real live divisions between us run right across the old divisions into progressive, liberal, and conservative. Our real differences are between pastoral and non-pastoral, between "liberal" and "ultra-Evangelical," between war-time pacifist and peace-time pacifist, between social conservative and social radical. In varying proportions there are Friends of all these types in all the historical divisions. The realization of this fact will go far to remove the old divisions. Contact with English Friends also reminds us that it is possible for Friends to have all the differences that have caused divisions in America and yet worship and work together as they do in London Yearly Meeting without sacrificing sincerity, freedom, or faithfulness to truth, and with a great gain in love.

On the whole, Friends have emerged from the war in a better position than before for fulfilling their mission. Better united, more thoroughly conscious of their distinctive message and mission, consecrated to their tasks by sacrifice and suffering, regarded no longer as merely a respectable memory, we have become a vital force in a world which has been made conscious by our recent attitude, of a living grace in us and which is more ready to hear our interpretation of the Gospel, which, judged by its fruits, seems to them to hold some new promise for the saving of the world from the menace of hate and war.

We are keenly conscious of our short-comings for the task, but there is promise of renewed power and efficiency in the new loyalty to the Society and the fresh conviction with which multitudes of us hold the faith of our Fathers in the saving power of God manifest in the all-embracing Light and Love of Christ.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE LIGHTS.—In the City of Philadelphia there stands a large home, called the Light House. It is not on the shore—as most lighthouses are, and it does not warn ships away from hidden rocks in the sea—this home is a lighthouse to warn people, girls and boys, men and women, away from the dangers which lie around them in the great city streets; it is a real friend to any one who needs a helping hand, and the light of its loving welcome has saved many a one from shipwreck. Its motto is, "Let the lower lights be burning." There are lights of many kinds we know, high and large, low and small, but a light is a light, and just as beautiful if only a tiny candle flame in the great darkness. We cannot all hold high the huge circle of brilliance which illumines the country far and near, as does William Penn both in statue over City Hall and in his life work, nor can we all be a great street arc light, but we all have our little lamps to carry and to keep trim and bright. So I think when we keep our faces gay and smiling, our hearts full of love, we are doing our part which is just as important as a higher one—we are "letting the lower lights be burning." I am very fond of that motto, for you and for me.

At present there is living at the Light House, a kindly English woman who has seen much in foreign lands. She knows of the great need there is in the dark dangerous cities for a lighthouse, particularly has she felt this need in the vast country of India, and she is here in America now to try to interest us in the people of India; she has realized how many helpful lights we have in our country,—different kinds of lights—and she has wished that she could only kindle these in India—the warning signals—the beacons of great joy, the home-welcome and the glorious Christian faith which lightens our life in America. This is how she tells her story to us!

One quick blast, a slowing down, the grinding of brakes; the train stopped; out went heads; there in the darkness an outstretched signal; a red light spoke. Little Tom was weary and hungry. "In half an hour we'll be home," his mother had said. "Why are we stopping? We'll be late!" "Look at that great red light. It says danger." "What would happen if the train went on?" "There would be a smash, and perhaps people would be killed." "Was that what happened to the car we saw on the road?" "Yes, it did not stop in time."

The train moved slowly, carefully. A green light came in sight. "And what does that mean?" "It means caution. We can go, but we must go carefully. You know, Tommie, sometimes I say, 'you mustn't,' and sometimes, 'be careful.'" And Tommie remembered.

Away on some high ground stood a little cottage where lived a mother and her daughter. Their neighbors were quite far away. The young girl grew tired and restless. "We see no one, things are so dull, I want to go to the town." And she went. She was gone a long time and after a silence, the mother heard bad news. "She will come back, when she needs me," she said; that night she drew the curtain back from the window, and placed a bright light before it to burn all night. This she did night after night. At last someone sick and weak came to the rising ground at midnight. She saw the bright light shining down the slope. She knew what it meant—pardon, love, home! And she went thankfully to her mother.

The people had been sad for years. Their sons had gone from them into a land in which day and night the air was heavy with smoke or poison gas and there was a terrible roaring of guns and cannon. Men were blown to pieces, or left torn, bleeding, dying. And each man there had been some mother's baby son! Then there came a time when the people said, "The end is surely near. Let us flash the news, when it comes to everyone." They made ready bundles of dried grass and wood on hill tops here and there. The people waited. Suddenly a bright fire rose like a column. One watcher saw it, and set fire to his pile; far off arose another, and yet another beacon flame leaping high. What did it mean? The great night of war is past; the new day has come."

Long ago there were three very clever men, who studied books about the stars, and looked at the heavens on many a night. These three men waited for the dawning of a great new star. It was to be more than a star. It was to be a signal for the whole world, and for all the ages to come. One night there it was, glorious before their eyes. It moved. They followed, followed till it stood over a poor little home in a town called Bethlehem. There they found a baby King to whom, on bended knees, they offered gold, and frankincense and myrrh. What was the message of that star? Wider than shining light or flaming beacon, it sent this word, "Peace on earth, goodwill to men."

Far off, near the lands of the three wise kings, lies the country of India. In its great cities are little children in danger—without a warning light; children wandering in the bazaars—without a home; boys and girls under the shadow of heathen darkness for years—and no new day has come.

Who will help to bring them into safety and shelter, to lift the shadow, and let the great light shine in?—W. V. HUNT

JUST FOR TO-DAY.

I will not look along the years
And try to face my future way—
I only need to see my path
For this one day.

O thou who art my life, my hope,
Who art each weak heart's strength and stay,
Help me to live within the line
That bounds to-day.

Then loving with thy patient love
That waits to lift and heal away,
My heart can hold no thought, no wish,
Beyond to-day.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE TREATIES have now been approved by the United States Senate, and our State Department has expressed to the other eight nations involved, Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, Japan, China, Portugal and the Netherlands, our readiness to exchange ratifications at any time. It is hoped that this will be accomplished by the first of next month and that the world can immediately get the benefit of the agreements reached.

The reservation made by the Senate to the Four Power Treaty that "The United States understands that under the statement in the preamble or under the terms of this treaty there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense," will be a satisfaction to many supporters of the treaties, and it is not likely that objection will be made to it by any of the other signers. It is quite possible that some of the other nations will propose reservations of their own, but there seems little probability that these will prevent the adoption of the treaties by all involved.

THE CHURCH PEACE UNION reminds Christians that "the ultimate effect of the achievements of the Conference does not rest solely upon their acceptance by our Congress, but as with the Conference itself, upon the force of public opinion, for which our churches have large responsibility."

NORMAN THOMAS WRITES IN THE "WORLD TOMORROW," "the Washington Conference with its naval blockade cannot guarantee peace, but it can give us a truce during which forces already at work in the world may grow stronger."

"A WARLESS WORLD," says the Federal Council of Churches, through its Commission on International Justice and Good-will, "can never be imposed by governments on peoples, but it can be imposed by peoples on governments. Christians can establish a world peace system and they can outlaw war, if they will."

"PEACE DEPENDS, AS 'THE NATION' has repeatedly argued, upon the abolition of the grievances of exploited races and classes and the substitution of co-operation among peoples for imperialist rivalries or imperialist alliances at the expense of the weak."

SENATOR LODGE RECENTLY SAID, referring to the Naval Limitation Treaty, "Do not imagine for a minute that I think the treaty is a finality. I think it is a beginning and a very great beginning. I hope and believe that this will lead to further reductions by the Powers, so that it will bring them to a point where they will have no more ships than are necessary to protect their coasts and possessions—what we might call the police duty of the sea."

DEFINITE WORK FOR THE CHURCHES. "In a world desperately needing to be held together, served with the stern summons, 'Unite or perish,' the religious forces should subordinate everything else to the one simple task of fostering, deepening and expressing the spirit of brotherhood.

"We need not wait for church unity. We need not wait for anything. Let each body of Christians, of whatever name or sign, let each group of religious folk, in any and every land, begin to put its main force into the production of great stores of good-will, heeding the call of the faith it professes to lead in making this a brotherly world."

WM. P. MERRILL,

Chairman of World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING, in its letter adopted this year, emphasizes one part of the Christian's duty as regards peace and war, when it says:—

"As Christians, we are striving for a 'warless world.' We are firmly convinced that this can be achieved only by refusal to participate in war, simply and sufficiently because war is by its very nature at variance with the message, the spirit, and the life and death of Jesus Christ, our Lord. We unite in supporting treaties of arbitration and conciliation, limitation and reduction of armaments, international courts of justice, a league or association of nations for the preservation of peace. This is well; it is a great achievement for statesmen to accomplish these things; but it is not sufficient for the Christian Church.

"A principle is greater than any or all of its applications. The fundamental peace principle of Christianity demands the utter rejection of war, unequivocally and without compromise. With this principle in its charter the Christian Church can always utter a clear and unmistakable verdict on any specific measure of statesmanship that is proposed; it will not be misled or coerced, by argument or by force, into participating in any kind or degree of preparation for war, or into lending the sanction of Christianity to the waging of any war whatsoever."

THE FELLOWSHIP OF RECONCILIATION recently suggested, "Put fellowship first and cut out all that conflicts with it, not only armaments with its threats, but also economic exploitation with its conflicts, and race antagonism with its bitterness. "Only the replacement of economic rivalry by co-operation will remove the chief cause of war.

"Only the spirit of full, honest friendship and faith, with no strings or threats like that of armament attached, can evoke the corresponding attitude in the other party and produce the atmosphere in which international comity can flourish.

"The call is for a new conscience alert to all social, individual and racial inequities.

"A moral question can be solved only by moral means."

RUSSIA'S NEED FOR RELIEF CANNOT BE MET ENTIRELY BY HER HARVEST.

This Summer's Crop will Alleviate Hunger, but Cholera and the Diseases of Malnutrition will Continue to Take Life.

It is being told in many quarters that this summer's crop in Russia will entirely save the Russian people and that, therefore, there will be no further need of foreign relief. If this were true, it would be one of the greatest blessings that could be conferred upon Russia at the present time. This year's crop undoubtedly will contribute to the relief of many millions. That is, of course, taking for granted that there will be no crop failure. But because of lack of seed and lack of man-power to plough and plant, even with favorable weather conditions, it cannot be hoped that the crop which Russia expects will meet the need which has been caused by the present calamity. Fifteen million people have been starving. Five million will have died. Five million others will have been saved by foreign relief; while five million more, if they are able to exist, will be mere wrecks of humanity because of tuberculosis, dysentery, typhus and cholera due to starvation and filth.

The crop which Russia will harvest this summer will bring relief; but it is impossible to hope that the gigantic misery and disease which this year has caused can be met in any adequate way by this means. Without the crop there would possibly be no hope; but the presence of the crop does not mean Russia's salvation. It can only mean that a foundation for rehabilitation has been laid and that upon this foundation of a renewal of the agriculture the new life of Russia may be built. But if you had gone through nine months of living upon grass and roots and then had even been saved by a relief portion of one meal a day, it is very easy to suppose that your body would not be in adequate physical condition to go forward with life. The effects of the Russian famine will not end this summer, no matter how great the crop may be, for the famine will continue to take its toll of life for a generation in disease-ridden bodies of men and women and in undersized bodies and brains of children. The fight against tuberculosis has only begun. The fight against the children's diseases of rickets, and undersized bodies and brains has not yet begun and must be started.

The hospitals of Russia are destitute even of the supplies which we would ordinarily have in our own homes in case of an emergency. So that at the present time the hospitals may be said to be useless. Bedding has disappeared from the children's homes and, in fact, from most of the private homes of the peasants. Medicines are not known throughout the famine area, and most of the doctors and nurses have died through starvation or disease.

It is a very depressing picture which must be drawn of Russia to-day; but the true situation must be realized, if any adequate program which will stabilize Russia is to be carried on. Money for food, medicines, hospital supplies, bedding and clothing will be needed for five years, to bring Russia once more back into a normal, healthy and clean life.

L. OSCAR MOON IS RECOVERING FROM TYPHUS.

L. Oscar Moon, who was taken ill with typhus a short time ago, has now passed the crisis and is on the way to recovery, according to the cable received at the Service Committee headquarters. At the present writing, no further cases of typhus, either in the Polish or Russian Unit, have been reported; and those who still have the disease are reported convalescing as rapidly as can be expected.

THE CHANGE IN RUSSIAN CITIES.

Practically every large city in Russia has lost heavily in population during the last seven years, according to the list issued by the Health Section of the League of Nations. Petrograd has lost most heavily, being reduced from 2,319,000 to 706,000 or less than one-third its earlier size. This might have been expected, as Petrograd lost its importance when the seat of government was taken away from it and transferred to Moscow and then later was the scene of attack of several hostile armies. Other cities have also had large losses, due partly to the hard conditions of disease and blockade and partly to the fact that the abolition of private trade removed one of the main functions and sent people out into the country.

The only exception in this entire list of seventeen cities, which includes cities as far east as Irkutsk, is the city of Samara, which is spoken of as being in the midst of the famine area.

Between 1913 and 1920 this city increased in population from 144,000 to 171,000. This enormous increase, when all other cities were losing, was due to the fact that Samara was the central city in the Volga grain area, and was consequently near to the best food supplies. The natural increase of people who wished to be near supplies of food in troublous times, was accentuated by the sending of hundreds of thousands of refugees carried away from Poland by the retreating armies of the Czar. These were settled all over Russia, but mostly in the province of Samara. Samara as the central city for this increased population, grew in size until the housing facilities were entirely inadequate.

Such, on account of the terrible drought, is the city now the heart of the famine area. In that city and the surrounding territory the famine is at its height; and a few miles north of Samara in the district of Buzuluk is where Friends are concentrating upon their feeding.

THE WOMAN WHO CHEATED.

In one of the villages in Poland where I went once a fortnight, to distribute and collect the work for the cottage industries by which the poorest peasants are kept alive, there was a woman who cheated. She was not the only one. I used to find them occasionally, sometimes very bold, and sometimes trying pitifully to cheat and failing because of want of practice. It is not surprising, for their need is so great.

This woman was returning balls of yarn made from the raw flax we had given her. As soon as I took them in my hand I felt that they were overweight.

"What have you put inside these balls?" I asked. "They do not feel as they should."

"I swear that there is nothing in it," the woman declared loudly.

"No, I am not satisfied," I answered her. "I am putting your balls to one side on this chair, and when I get them home, I will unwind them and see whether or not you speak truly." The woman looked startled and seemed taken aback, but then she went out through the crowd with her new allotment of work. Even though I felt sure she was cheating, I still gave her the largest return of work, for I knew she was poor and might suffer if I reduced her portion.

At the end of the distribution I said to the village President who had been with me, "You see these three balls that were brought in by that woman. I am wrapping them up separately to examine them."

"You are doing well," he said, "for they are too heavy."

When I came home I found that one of the balls contained good thread and one had a large stone inside of it to add weight, while the third had good thread on the outside but such coarse stuff inside that it could not be used even for sacking. It was quite clear that she had cheated and had kept some of the flax.

A fortnight later, when I returned to that village, I brought out the three balls of yarn and laid them on the table. The crowd looked on. A horror-stricken silence held them. It was so tense that I wondered at the reason.

"This woman did not do well," I said, and waited for an answer.

The village President gave it. "The woman is dead," he replied.

The peasants are hardened to death. Most of them have lost half their families on the long journey from Russia, and deaths from typhus and relapsing fever occur continually in the village. But I could feel in the air that this death was different. I doubt if they went far enough in their reasoning to suppose that God had punished her because of her false oath. Perhaps they felt merely worried that she died with an unconfessed fault which was discovered afterwards. But there was something not comfortable about it in their minds. Since that time there has been a higher standard of work from that village and a higher standard of truth-telling.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

ELIZABETH B. EMMOTT and her daughter, Margaret, met Wilmington Friends at a Tea Meeting on Second-day, Fourth Month 10th, and, after tea, spoke informally on the extension work of English Friends, answering various questions, as to the work of Quarterly Meeting Secretaries, the recording of Ministers, the "tramps" to outlying meetings, etc., the cottage meetings, etc.

In commenting upon American Friends, the decline of evening meetings for worship was noted, and E. Emmott said "we do not feel that we are making the right use of our meeting-houses if they remain closed on First-day evenings."

The Friend [London] speaks of the prospect of a public meeting on Disarmament, as a part of the Yearly Meeting programme. It is to be held on the evening of Fifth Month 20th, in "the Large Meeting-house, at Devonshire House." John William Graham will be in the Chair and the speakers will include Lord Robert Cecil and Lady Parmoor."

CARROLL T. BROWN has in the last number of The Friend [London] a pleasing paper called "An American Lover of England," which, touching not at all upon personal or Quaker relationships, makes us aware of our debt to England in our literary joys and satisfactions, in our Geography (names of places, etc.), and other such "fundamental lines of connection."

"It is not that we do not love our own country," he says, "or that we are blind to its beauties" . . . "Rather is it that we have two mother countries and a grandmother country. Neither is it that we do not see the blots on your escutcheon." . . . "But with all her shortcomings, England is to us one of the great factors, perhaps the greatest factor, in the stabilizing and civilizing of the world. We do not admire England; admiration may cool. We love England, and love understands, and forgives, and hopes."

WESTTOWN SCHOOL NOTES.—The winners of the Peace Essay awards, founded by Elliston P. Morris and Elizabeth Smith, have recently been announced. They are Anna Moffitt, '22, of Nashville, Tenn.; June Levering, '22, of The Hollow, Va.; John E. Forsythe, Jr., '23, Atlantic City; William B. Test, '23, Philadelphia.

Robert L. Simkin, home on furlough from missionary work in West China, and Elizabeth Braithwaite Emmott, author of "The Story of Quakerism," with her daughter, Margaret Emmott, have been recent visitors at the school. These friends were in attendance at our meetings for worship, and on First-day Elizabeth Emmott spoke to the girls in evening collection, touching on certain periods in the history of our Society; following the collection, she attended the Community meeting now regularly held on First-day evening.

A valuable collection of shells has recently been presented to the school, and will be added to the museum. It is the gift of Margaret C. Engle, of Newark, N. J., in memory of her son, William C. Engle, who was much interested in the Natural Sciences when a student at Westtown.

A generous gift has just been made the school by Henry S. Williams, of Rosemont, for purchasing needed equipment for girls' athletics. The most pressing needs at present appear to be the placing of new posts for the five tennis courts on the west end of the campus, and the purchase of a new marker for the tennis courts and the hockey field. A considerable balance will still be left for use another year.

A chapter of the Cum Laude Society has recently been established at Westtown. This is an honor society for secondary schools, corresponding to the Phi Beta Kappa in the Colleges. Students are eligible for membership in their Senior year if they have had a high average of scholarship for the last two years. The symbol is a cross-shaped key on which are the words, "Cum Laude."

The Society was founded in 1906 at the Tome Institute, and about twenty schools have now become members.

A new course in Agriculture will be offered next year, in the First Class. It will be a general course in the elements of Agriculture, and should be useful not only to those who expect to engage in farming as a business, but also to those who will live in country and suburban homes, and will wish to have some contact with agricultural pursuits. The course will include gardening, fruit-growing and poultry-keeping, with probably some elementary landscape gardening, and will be open to girls as well as boys.

JAPAN NOTES.—Yearly Meeting is to be held in Tsuchiura this year. Henry T. Hodgkin's meetings in Mito should be a good preparation on the spiritual side. His work in Tokyo, very little of it strictly among Friends, has been an inspiration to many, who for the first time have heard love as a world force discussed so simply. During eight days I heard him speak nine times, and those were not half his engagements. A wonderful man with a wonderful message! I visited the Shimodate meeting last evening with T. E. Jones. The new house for living and the meeting room have greatly encouraged them all. We feel that the spirit is fine and the outlook hopeful. The Evangelist, S. Ouchi, is working to create a friendly spirit in his immediate community and if one member of a family becomes a Christian he concentrates his efforts on the others of the family, believing a Christian family to represent more strength and permanency than the same number of scattered Christians. Personal individual work is his best way of working. The First-day school has a regular attendance of fifty children and one evening a week he gives a lantern talk for the children to which some of the elders come too, those not yet Christian. The whole outlook is good.

Our graduating class is the largest we have had, twenty-eight, and a fine lot of girls. A good many plan to enter High Schools. We hope to have fifty in the entering class, but will not take that many unless they are prepared. There are more than eighty applications in so far, and more to come. It is fine the way the Japanese are giving for the meeting-house basement. It is assured so far as the excavating and walls are concerned. As we get a larger constituency, we can hope to raise more money in Japan.

WATERPROOF belts of leather may be called the highest development in leather belts. And the process of waterproofing a belt makes it more pliable and more durable, thus increasing its grip and giving it longer life.

To meet your different needs we have three brands. The Watershed oak is a strictly high grade belt and gives excellent service. But it is not so pliable or long lived on some drives as Watershed Tannate.

The Tannate on many drives will give greater satisfaction and probably cost less in the long run.

Watershed Grip-o-tan, one side oak, the other Tannate, combines the firmness of oak leather with the strong pulley grip of the Tannate and costs less than the full Tannate. Try Watershed for your hard drives.

THE MEETING HOUSE BY THE SIDE OF THE ROAD.

As the automobile takes us over our beautiful country how often, with something of a thrill, we come upon a Friends' Meeting House standing alone and quiet in the midst of its grass-grown yard, shaded with spreading maples or oaks. The old-time builders seem to have had a keen eye for scenery, for the surrounding sweep of hillsides and valleys is often most charming. Whether erected in Colonial times or in the years following 1827, these meeting-houses are easy to distinguish—they are ample in dimension, strong in structure, plain in design. The graveyard nearby may be a beautifully sodded, well-ordered spot, or it may be an overgrown patch with a broken-down wall.

What memories these old places hold for some of us! "Fair First-day morning"—and what other morning in the week seemed so fair?—surely found us traveling along the hedge-bordered road, on the way to meeting; our father's well-filled two-horse carriage falling in line with those of other like-minded travelers. It was not etiquette to pass another Friend's carriage on the way to First-day meeting and so our sturdy horses had to be restrained, not being wearied by their week-day services. We were at the meeting-house betimes, for we did not calculate the minutes so closely as we do now, when we may be a minute or so after the hour without seeming late. Then it would have shocked us. Exchanging kindly greetings in subdued tones with relatives and friends, we passed indoors with sober faces and quiet tread. With reverence we sat through the unbroken silence or heard the message from the lame minister; and when the meeting broke we filed past the end of the bench where she gave us her loving greeting. These were subduing occasions. The impression they made on our childish hearts is indelible and it was good for us to be there.

But now as we pass these ancient land-marks we say—"No meeting there, all the Friends have gone from this neighborhood" or, "Only a handful assemble here on First-days." Like the California missions they remind us of the zeal and devotion of a former day.

Is that all? Is our view only backward cast? Is there no future for Friends in these neighborhoods where formerly they were the influential factor?

We are seeking to do extension work. Why not ask ourselves and our fellow-members whether these old Friendly centres, where Friendly traditions still linger and the places of worship are ready-made, may not after all be among the most fruitful fields for extension work? It is a commonplace that from the farms have come most of the strong men of the cities and of the nation. Thus Dr. Gunsaulus is quoted in the Michigan Christian Advocate as saying that "every one of Chicago's foremost preachers came from the farm. Eighty-six of Chicago's hundred leading physicians, eighty-one of her hundred greatest lawyers, and seventy-three of the hundred best engineers were farmer boys." If then the country is the section from which is drawn so largely our national strength, may it not be a matter of concern to us that this source shall have within it the spiritual elements which we as a Society desire to see more generally received? There are, to be sure, other reasons for urging work in this field, reasons savoring less of cool calculation and more of Christian love. They come readily before the mind.

A study of the old neighborhood where you and we used to live and worship may reveal the fact that many now resident there have no church home. That crops and cows and roads and taxes crowd out the affairs that are not "practical." Idealism and the things of the Spirit have a far-away meaning to them, as they have, indeed, to many town-dwellers and to too many of us Friends. You invite these "practical" people, kind and neighborly though they are, to join Friends at the old meeting-house. The results are discouraging. What then? We have read with admiration the story of the foreign missionary who chose the most difficult field of labor for its very difficulty. Why should not the missionary zeal fire those of us who remain at home?

If, earlier in this paper, we have seemed to dwell on the sentimental side of the subject, please do not for a moment think that we regard this as sufficient urge for rebuilding the old waste places. This may be a great help. But something more impelling, more insistent than the memories of the past, or the desire for a pleasant excursion into the blooming country must grip us if we are going to carry this business through successfully. It is "a big man's job." We review with great appreciation the efforts made year after year for many years, through summer's heat and winter's snow, and through still greater discouragements, by one of our members, to keep up and build up a little country meeting, and now the long struggle and sacrifice are bearing fruit, while his endeavor stands out as an incitement to those upon whom the like duty may be laid to "go and do likewise." Yes, it is the call of the Spirit that is needed if a spiritual movement is to follow. "You cannot build up a church on ice cream," said a Northfield worker. Suppers, entertainments, outward devices of various kinds go only so far. It is the deep that must call to the deep, and it is that which will rouse a response. So if we would awaken any spiritual longing, if we would attract to the old meeting-house those who have no church affiliations, we must certainly be filled with burning love for them and for the cause which we represent.

But the non-resident can have little influence in this direction compared with that of the man who lives amongst the farmer folk. We hear that the cry, "Back to the country!" is being increasingly heeded, and we trust that young Friends will more and more re-people their ancestral homesteads, and build up again their home meetings. There are rewards that cannot be measured with dollars and cents, or ease, or fame.

We may at the very least see that these houses of worship show by their outward appearance that the Society still has a respect for the religion once upheld there, and that in the adjoining burial-ground the graves of our ancestors shall not lose their identity nor "the long grass o'ertop the mouldering wall."

HUMAN ORCHIDS.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

A friend recently presented my wife with a beautiful orchid. Its curious form was symmetrical, its texture was exquisite, its markings were chaste, its colors harmonious. It had no roots—no visible means of support—it had simply grown upon a tree. It was epiphytic rather than parasitic because, whilst clinging to the branch of a tree, it actually subsisted upon the air.

There are some persons like the orchid. They are compelled to cleave to others whether they want to or not. I do not refer to those who willingly or weakly stick to other people and who do not try to help themselves. I speak of the men or women, or children, who because of lack of good physical or mental equipment, or because of hereditary feebleness over which they have no control, or because of cruel circumstances of business or social environment have been obliged to lean on others more favored than themselves. The invalid for long weary years, the sufferer from malignant pain, the financially shattered man or woman may, like the orchid, become an involuntary dependent on the superior strength of some one else.

These invalids, these "shut-ins," these folks with worn bodies and tired minds, these men and women of crushed ambitions and exhausted powers may—if you please—be considered parasites, but they are God's children. How undauntedly some of them accept their ungracious situations. How beautiful may become their apparently wasted careers, how symmetrical the pattern of their lives, how warmly they can color the thought of compassionate beholders. Some even live joyous lives within their narrow limitations. Some maintain a pure faith behind the walls that circumscribe, but shelter them. Some find their refuge and solace in the affection and solicitude of sympathetic relations and friends. Such can become the interpreters of the gladness of Jesus to the rest of us. Their abnormal existence may develop into a more exquisite fairness than that of any flower that glows in the beauty of the sun.

Our royal Christ makes use of you and me in upholding others. To some extent in some way in all our intricate relationships we are—whether we would have it so or not—exceedingly dependent upon one another. God sometimes asks us to become like the grand old tree or little bush and sustain the human orchids that he has placed within our care. The obligation rests upon us—we become orchid-bearers in his name. Our reward here and hereafter is assured us: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me!"

SAN JOSE, California.

HARRIET LUKENS UNDERHILL.

Harriet Lukens Underhill ended a long and useful life in her daughter's home in Germantown, Pa., on Second-day, Fourth Month 3rd. She was the daughter of Dr. Israel and Susan Jones Lukens and was born in Philadelphia, Twelfth Month 12, 1837. She was married in 1859 to Reuben Howes Underhill, of New York. Their married life of almost fifty years was spent in Brooklyn. She survived him by fourteen years, which she spent in the homes of her son, Reuben L. Underhill, of Berkeley, Calif., and her daughters, Alice Underhill Doane, of New York City, and Eleanor McConaughy, of Germantown, Pa. In all of these places, as well as in summer homes with her sister, Emma L. Thompson, at Pocono Manor, and her son-in-law, Benjamin H. Doane, at Barrington, Nova Scotia, she had large circles of friends who will miss her greatly.

For more than sixty years she was actively connected with New York Monthly Meeting of Friends, in which she served as an Elder. Her Christian sympathies were broad and brought her into fellowship with Christians outside of the Society in whose principles she so strongly believed. Her Brooklyn home for many years was near the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church and she had warm friendships with its successive pastors, Drs. Cuyler, Cregg and McAfee. She actively served up to the time of her death, as a Vice President and Director of the Women's National Sabbath Alliance, an earnest company of Christian women representing different Protestant denominations.

Her religion was social and practical. She had rare gifts in the making and keeping of friends. All humankind interested and attracted her, from the postman, milkman and iceman, who served her home, to the men and women of leadership in public and philanthropic affairs with whom she came in contact. Her smiling face, her simple and becoming dress, her unaffected cordiality, made her welcome with all, and beloved by many. Her home was always a centre of hospitality.

During her later years her serenity and cheer grew more and more marked, until all felt her to be, what one of her friends aptly called her, a true "Lady Sunshine." Her departure was but a translation. To the last she retained all her faculties unimpaired, delighting in the service she was able to render to others. During her very last week on earth she daily attended Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends (which to her was the great event of the year), taking the keenest interest in all its proceedings. On her last day on earth she aided in home affairs, wrote to her daughter in New York and to a friend in sorrow, enjoyed a visit from her grand-niece, joined in family worship, and lay down as usual to rest. An hour later there came a few minutes of troubled breathing, no pain, no struggle,—and the spirit slipped away from the body which even in death expressed the beauty and serenity that had animated it.

Services were held in her daughter's home in Germantown, where the message of her life was voiced by George M. Warner, Walter W. Haviland, Hannah P. Morris, and other friends, including Dr. William Porter Lee of the Westside Presbyterian Church, where she had often worshipped. New York friends gathered next day in the Twentieth Street Meeting House, where her long-time friends, John C. Pritchard and Sarah Haydock had their part, together with Augustus T. Murray, who had known her both in California and New York. The burial was in Friends' Cemetery, Brooklyn.

She loved God and was interested in all his creatures, in every growing thing, in every animal, in every human being she met, however lowly, however great. She passed through many hard experiences, suffered many losses and trials, but she illustrated in her life her own favorite passage, "All things work together for good to them that love God." She radiated a sunny charm which was the outward expression of an inward spirit of joy and love. Naturally strong-willed and quick of speech, she learned to control her utterances and make them, though often keen, ever kindly and cheering. Thus through more than eighty-four years she represented her Master, into whose joy she has now entered.

DEPENDENCE.

To keep the lamp alive,
With oil we fill the bowl:
'Tis water makes the willow thrive,
And grace that feeds the soul.

The Lord's unsparing hand
Supplies the living stream;
It is not at our own command
But still derived from him.

Man's wisdom is to seek
His strength in God alone;
And even an Angel would be weak,
Who trusted in his own.

Retreat beneath his wings,
And in his grace confide:
This more exalts the King of kings
Than all our works beside.

In Jesus is our store;
Grace issues from his throne:

Confesses he has none.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' WORK IN WEST CHINA.

REPORT OF ROBERT L. SIMKIN FOR 1921.

Happy is he whose privilege it is to be even in small measure leader of developing Christian life. I desire that the following record shall most of all convey my thankfulness for the joy of being numbered as one of this happy brotherhood.

GENERAL CONDITIONS AND TENDENCIES.

The year opened with a sharp antagonism of students against the soldiers. The latter had maltreated some students who had unwisely delayed in yielding to them the occupancy of an athletic field in the public park. In protest practically all the students in the city stopped attending classes, with the result that school was broken up two weeks before the end of the term and examinations had to be deferred until the beginning of the following term. The occasion, however, afforded opportunity for teaching some valuable lessons which could not have been learned from text-books.

Among a large body of students there will always be found a small number of agitators who push their way into notoriety in times of political crisis. Few of the Chinese have as yet developed so large a degree of independence of action as we find in the Occident, so that it is easier for the agitator who talks vehemently enough to get a following. On the above occasion the feeling was so intense that the students hissed those few of their number who saw also the other side of the question. They repudiated the representatives to whom they had entrusted the negotiations and elected others of more extreme views. On several occasions, however, the students of the University have exercised a restraining influence upon those of other schools in the city, in one instance dissuading them from a course which might easily have resulted in bloodshed. In the above-mentioned strike, considerably more than half of the students really desired to continue their work, but they did not dare to oppose the decision adopted in other schools. A much larger proportion of the students in the Friends' dormitory than elsewhere voted for the continuance of attendance at classes.

This was due partly to the smaller number of students in the Friends' dormitory which makes the problem of discipline simpler. In large dormitories it is difficult to maintain close personal touch, and the tendency to mass action is stronger. Our students also saw more clearly the "better way" of dealing with the situation. In the summer it was my privilege to present at the Y. M. C. A. Conference the Christian way in international relationships. When in the discussion which followed it was objected that Christ's way is impracticable in the present evil world, it was magnificent to see how two of our most exemplary Christian students defended the truly Christian position. It caused one of the missionaries who had taken a less Christian position to remark: "What fighters these Quaker students are!" One of these two requested at the Yearly Meeting that he be appointed to write a letter of fraternal greeting to the Friends' Meetings in Japan.

The Chinese distrust and hate Japan which they regard as seeking to exploit their country for her own interests. This distrust extends in lesser degree to Great Britain as the ally of Japan. America is generally regarded as China's friend and the most disinterested of the great powers. Yet the Chinese cannot fully persuade themselves that America is entirely disinterested. During the Washington Conference, fears were expressed both in private and in public that the powers would combine to carve up China for themselves.

Few have yet come to realize that China's worst enemies lie within her own borders. The government, although republican in name, is more corrupt than under the Manchu régime. It is really a military despotism. Each "General" enlists larger and larger numbers of coolies who, having experienced a comparatively easy life as soldiers, are seldom willing to return to their former hard labor. Rather than be disbanded, these soldiers turn bandit. "The robbers are soldiers and the soldiers are robbers." On my recent journey to the coast our boat was twice boarded by soldier-robbers who, after casual inspection of our goods, allowed us to proceed without molestation, probably because we were foreigners and missionaries.

Over a year ago a body of local militia at a village where Friends have a chapel ventured to defend their homes from a band of soldiers who were passing. The militia were defeated. The soldiers rushed into the town, killing as they went, some 180 persons. The chapel was soon crowded with refugees, but the soldiers entered and killed three before noticing that the little room was a chapel. Then the officer commanded his soldiers to desist, and when they left the town, they brought to the chapel a quantity of articles which they had looted throughout the town and were unable to carry away, requesting the church people to return them to their proper owners. The Yearly Meeting was asked at its next session what disposal should be made of the articles for which the owners could not be found, and replied that they should be handed over to the local officials and a receipt taken as in the case of other goods already returned.

In some counties the magistrate has a definite understanding with the brigands and shares in the proceeds of their robberies; in others he is powerless to oppose them, as they are better armed than his own soldiers. Knowing that their tenure of office is precarious the officials have little incentive to undertake public improvements or to plan for the future. Too often their chief thought is to fill their own pockets and provide against the famine which they know will overtake them when they are turned away from the public crib. Taxes are collected as far in advance as possible, those normally due in Chengtu, I was informed, being already levied at the beginning of 1922.

The soldiers, however, absorb the funds before they can be apportioned to the legitimate expenditures of government. An official in Chengtu whose duty it is to receive revenues from various points in the province and disburse them to their respective uses finds his office but a shadowy name, because the various local military leaders refuse to allow the funds to pass out of their control.

Education feels the pinch first. Some schools are closed entirely, while others occasionally declare a prolonged "holiday" because they lack the funds to pay their teachers. In the country bandits terrorize the well-to-do, whom they call "fat pigs," so that many of the better class of land owners are compelled to move to the cities. Even in the cities these moneyed classes are not safe from the extortion of military leaders. At Chengtu city gates stand soldiers who search the loads as they pass in or out and subject the poor man to similar extortions on a smaller scale by occasionally appropriating for their own use such articles as excite their cupidity.

There is a modicum of reason for this inspection of goods because of the great quantities of smuggled opium, but the officials frequently are as guilty as the people, encouraging farmers to plant the poppy and sharing in its illicit profits. On boats and wharves and as one passes the houses the odor of the opium pipe often assails the nostrils.

Although all classes increasingly realize that militarism is eating at the heart of society, I can recall only one instance outside the Christian church where it is being fought in any active way. This is the case of two brothers who publish in Chengtu a daily newspaper, the avowed purpose of which is to promote peace. They, in common with many other students, were deeply influenced by the visit of Dr. H. T. Hodgkin last spring. It was my privilege to interpret for Dr. Hodgkin at the last six lectures which he gave at the University.

THE WEST CHINA UNION UNIVERSITY.

In material equipment, steady progress has been made. About nine acres of very valuable land have been acquired, and a grave plot immediately in front of the Administration Building has been purchased and the graves removed. Three residences, and the splendid building donated by the Scattergood family of Philadelphia for the Middle School, have been erected during the year, besides a dormitory for the students of the Church Missionary Society who were formerly accommodated temporarily in the Friends' buildings. There are now eight substantial brick buildings and five groups of temporary buildings occupied by students. Thirty missionary families occupy twenty-five residences, of which houses four-fifths are of permanent construction.

My own work has included teaching Church History (one class of 49 students) in the University, three Church History classes in the Bible School, a class in Mandarin four hours a week in the Language School, classes in Biblical Geography and Religious Instruction during the Summer Normal School, and the Treasurerships of the Language School, the University, and the F. F. M. A. College. I served on the University Cabinet which is composed of the President, the Vice-President, and a representative elected by the Senate. This Cabinet is a new body organized last year which decides or prepares for presentation to the Senate the business arising from day to day. Its organization has resulted in the saving of a great deal of time over the former method by which business was transacted in larger committees.

I have also served as principal of the F. F. M. A. College Dormitory. To this I have not been able to devote so much time as I desired. It has not been necessary, however, to give it such close attention because we have some sterling young fellows who have largely governed themselves and have maintained a strong Christian atmosphere. It would fill your hearts with thanksgiving if you could attend the daily worship in this dormitory. It is chiefly in the hands of students, and most frequently there is no leader appointed. At 6.45 the students gather quietly and settle down for personal Bible study or silent prayer. Frequently there is a hymn, the reading of a few verses of Scripture, vocal prayer or an earnest exhortation, but the larger part of the twenty or twenty-five minutes is spent in silence which is frequently so living and vital that the Holy Spirit's presence is unmistakably felt. During the past two or three years few students have been able wholly to resist this quiet influence of their fellow students. The majority confess themselves disciples of Christ and apply for membership in the church before they reach the middle of the University course.

(To be concluded.)

THE complete Christian who is such by possession, makes his prayer and request for the truly good things which appertain to the soul, and prays, he himself also contributing his efforts, to attain to the habit of goodness, so as no longer to have the things that are good belonging to him, but to be good. —CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA.

OUR FOUNDATIONS AND OUR FUTURE.

[The largest school of its type in the United States, with a total enrollment of a little less than six hundred, is the Friends' School on Coulter Street, Germantown. With a little play of fancy it is possible to link this great modern institution with the name of Francis Daniel Pastorius, the first schoolmaster in the German village, when Philadelphia, six or more miles to the southeast, claimed no greater distinction than belonged to the German village.]

We are glad to publish the following, taken from a recent school Bulletin, evidencing as it does that through the long stretch of years that have passed since Pastorius' time, the same spirit that would put first things first still controls the management of the school.—EDS.]

My desire for our School is that it shall continue to stand firm in these times of stress and agitation, that it shall maintain its splendid record as an institution of learning founded on the broad principles of serious thinking and right living, a shining light, a sure foundation, a house of work and play, sending forth each year young people sane and sober in their attitude toward life,—a little band going out into the world, sound in mind and body, thoroughly equipped to "hold fast" amidst the whirligig of jazz, joy-rides, and the movie craze, alluring them on every hand.

Our children are entitled to normal pleasures and recreation. Let us then emphasize exercises and games in the gymnasium, sports and contests on the athletic field, encourage recitals, and elocution contests, exercises which do not place extra burdens on teachers and parents. Perhaps I am too old-fashioned and conservative, but there are present in the social structure of today elements of dangerous freedom, of irresponsibility, of lack of reverence for the real things of life, that have vastly complicated the situation of our growing boys and girls.

May we be alert for the best methods and the newest systems of education, keep our minds open for innovation and improvement, ever willing to adopt measures of proved value in the field of academic effort, but also watchful that we are not swept along on a popular current of foolish whims and shallow fancies.

Again, I say, let our School stand firm, alone, if necessary, on the solid foundations of strict discipline and moral courage which have stood the test of time, and have always helped develop capable men and women.

We want the best teachers, happy and comfortable in their work. To secure these we must pay adequate salaries and supply them with ever-improving equipment for accomplishing their best work. There must be a time and place for rest and recreation, especially during vacation, and while it is often desirable and even necessary for our teaching staff to study new problems, I would advocate that at these times a part be spent in absolute oblivion of all school activities—whether at home, on a farm, in the mountains, or at the seashore. There should be a short season at least with no professional engagements. To get up late, sit on the old porch, read a light magazine, take a stroll, canoe, swim, ride the family horse, or bump over the country in the "family flivver," anything and everything which does not have to be done would seem to me to be necessary after wrestling with the rising generation for nine months in the year. At all events, I don't want the teachers in our School to break down in their work, and I consider it a serious reflection on the management if a physical or nervous collapse occurs. Let none of us be so careless or indifferent to our full responsibilities in this particular.

As a member of the School Committee for several years, I wish to express my appreciation of the devoted service and untiring efforts of our Principal. His serious Christian character, thorough methods, and forward-looking plans have contributed in no small degree to our present high standards, while his wise guidance and good counsel have directed the ambitions of many a boy and girl now successful in college, in business, or in professional careers. May we all contribute our share toward a still better school in the future.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

"JUST A BEGINNING." How John "scrapped" his war-ships.—We have all been thinking about the results of the great Washington Conference, and wondering "What Next?" A fine article in a recent "Ladies Home Journal" tells how the women of our country "will keep up the fight to crush war throughout the world," and in the same article is told the story of "John" and his toy battle-ships.

At John's school the boys had been having play-wars, and there was to be a big naval battle on the floor of John's room, so, when he was at home he asked his father for another battle-ship to add to his fleet. "What's the use of all this talk in Washington about sinking our real battle-ships, if boys would rather play war than anything else?" asked his mother.

"Who's going to sink our battle-ships?" said John.

"Why, we are going to sink them ourselves, and the other countries are going to sink theirs," exclaimed his mother. "Don't you know the newest thing is to get rid of ships instead of getting more of them? Why don't you play a game that's up to date?"

Then John's father proposed a day's trip to Washington, and they saw the Pan-American Building, and some of the delegates as they went in, and John heard a "naval holiday" talked about, and asked what it meant.

That gave his father an idea, and before John went back to school, he asked whether he would agree to this plan:—He was to have no new battleship for three weeks. In that time he was to do more reading and write home every week, and he was to ask the other boys to take "a naval holiday" for three weeks. They were to try to invent some good, new, lively game to get rid of their old battle-ships. If he did this he might have at the end of the time a new battle-ship if he wanted one. If not, something else.

John came around to this plan rather slowly. They could not sink the old ships in their bath tubs, he said, they were only allowed to bathe in them. They would "have to invent some way," his father told him. He had a dollar of his own uncle Earl had given him. Would it be fair to get the battle-ship with that, and have his father's present beside? No, John decided that for himself—it would not. And so John went back to school, and the rest of the story is so well told in his letter home the next week that we can all see how the plan worked out. Here is the letter:—

Dear Mother and Daddy:—They like the game, but we had a lot of trouble. They drove us out of the bath-room the way I told you, before we got enough water in the tub to sink them. There was a little ice on the pond, but the boy that owns the Japanese fleet has a cold and the housemother won't let him help break the ice to make a Pacific Ocean. But we played the new game with mousetraps that spring up where the cheese is. Not the big round traps with holes in the edges that catch five mice at one time, because they are too expensive and are too big to go in the boats. We use the little traps made of just a narrow piece of wood and one spring to catch one mouse. Billy brought one from home and hurt his finger with it, and it flew across the table and broke the round looking-glass his sister gave him to see if his face was clean before supper. That made him think of something, so he invented this game more than I did and he never went to Washington at all. He put a trap in a boat and sprung it, and it knocked over the smokestack and the boat rolled over on its side. We bought a lot of mousetraps for five cents for each.

One boy wasn't in our crowd at all and didn't own any battleship, but he had four white mice in a cage. We gave two big battleships and a submarine and a raft with a drowning sailor on it for the four mice. Then we put cheese on all the ships and turned the mice loose in the room while we peeked through a crack in the door. It wasn't fair. One of the mice ran away when we looked in and the other three all went and exploded British ships and didn't touch the United States and Japanese. They got killed in the traps. The other one is somewhere in the dormitory and the housemother is sort of mad. She keeps thinking she hears it somewhere. Next day we took the ships away from the other boy because his mice didn't play fair and then we sprung the traps by dropping marbles on them. It wasn't war, but peace, for each one dropped marbles on his own boats and not on the others. We thought at first we'd explode half of them, but we exploded them all, and the rule is we can't fix them till after three weeks, as you said.

But what will we do next? What will we do with the soldiers? We've got a lot of soldiers. We can't play peace by each boy killing his own, like battleships, for soldiers are people. It would be all right if we could kill each other's, but that isn't peace and we can't use them for anything else, because they've all got guns that are made a part of them all in one piece of lead. They are just standing around. Tell me, mother, what to do with the soldiers. The other boys want to know too.

With love,

JOHN.

P. S.—I think, daddy, I'll want a catcher's mask instead of a battleship after three weeks. And could you send me a quarter in the next letter? I borrowed it for my traps from the boy who owned the mice and he's mad.

JOHN.

BOOK REVIEWS.

RED-LETTER DAYS.*

The thirty-five poems in this "vest pocket" volume are full of a very welcome type self-revealing of our lamented Friend. The collection was first published in 1906, but many will be grateful for this re-print. If William C. Braithwaite had never written in verse we should still have suspected his poetic gift. Even in historical writing the poetic fervor of his nature is manifested. It adds to his careful scientific method the sure instinct of getting at the heart of things. Is not that the essence of poetry?

But we are thankful for his incursions into the realm of verse, and shall await with interest the new volume which we understand he had prepared for the press before his sudden death. These thirty-five short poems, almost without exception, record spiritual experiences which, in degree, we can all match in our own lives. We shall want to carry the volume with us, and by frequent reference to it make many of the happy poetical turns of expression our own. Whether he writes of "Daffodils" or "The Inward Voice" he makes it equally clear that,

"Life's year for us hath rubrics, friends of mine,
Great days whose syllables in radiance shine,
When into some new deep of love we dipped,
And the pure bliss made all our world Divine."

"ECONOMIC IMPERIALISM."†

This is a book for the present day. It makes clear some of the difficult problems of the Far East which came before the recent Armament Conference at Washington. In simple style and with an accurate knowledge of history and a broad outlook, L. S. Woolf has put into one hundred and eleven pages the salient points of the present tangled situation which European and American domination have caused in Asia and Africa.

In the Introduction, Woolf presents the thesis upon which the book is based: "Great world movements like that of Christianity, feudalism, the war of 1914, etc., appear to the ordinary man . . . to be completely out of his control. They seem to come upon the world and upon him without inevitability of some great natural force, the earthquake, etc. This fatalistic view of history, though it is comforting to many people and to historians, is a delusion. Man has derived so large a victory over natural forces and his distant relations of the animal world, that his history is now but little influenced by them. The history of man has, in the last 2500 years, been mainly determined by man, by his beliefs and by his desires. If certain men had not begun to believe and desire certain things, there would have been no Christians and no Christianity, and if certain other men had not believed and desired certain other things, there would have been no persecution of the early Christians, and the failure of Christianity to produce a Christian world has resulted from a victory of the desires and beliefs of the one over those of the other." Could man's responsibility for world conditions be more clearly put!

A comparison of the world in 1800 with that of 1900 shows great changes due to a world movement which the author calls "Europeanization." The process is two-fold: "in America, South Africa (to some extent), and the Pacific, the European conqueror or colonist has either fused with the native population or has himself multiplied to form new and independent communities with their own civilization and their own government." In most of Africa and in Asia the peoples and the territory have been subjected to the rule of European countries or they have been exploited to further European interests. The author has clearly and ably traced the development of the situation in Asia and Africa due to the application of these methods.

While the motives which led to direct or indirect control of Africa and almost all of Asia are complex, they fall in a general way into three classes: sentimental, military, economic. The most powerful motive has been the economic. Under one pretext or another territory was seized and economic imperialism ruled such possessions. In Africa economic exploitation was carried on by cruder methods than those adopted in Asia, a land of very ancient civilization with which are bound up its art, religions and literatures. Woolf proposes that Europeans and Americans should substitute co-operation for economic imperialism as their foreign policy. Such a method has already been tried in the Chinese customs service with such success that it should be applied in a much larger field. A wise application of the system of mandates would meet the needs of these now oppressed peoples. Such a proposition is not chimerical for "it is not true that human beings never change their beliefs and desires, and, if they did so with regard to capitalism and economic imperialism, the mandatory system might well open a new era in the relations between Asia and Africa and western civilization."

"UNIFYING THE WORLD."*

The rapid development and multiplication of means of communication, national and international, is outlined in "Unifying the World." Much of this development, especially the most sensational, has taken place in recent years and within the memory of the present generation.

Interchange of ideas has accompanied this physical expansion and the inter-dependence of all parts of the world has resulted. Truly if one nation suffers, all the nations suffer with it, and had man's progress, spiritual and mental, kept pace with this movement, the poet's vision of a "federation of the World" would have been realized. But alas, quite a different result is the summing up of the conclusions of G. W. Clark. "Broadly," he says, "the whole argument may be said to illustrate a gloomy judgment which has often been passed on the world that has been made by the industrial revolution namely, that it has fashioned for itself the most marvelous tools that have ever been seen, but that, instead of using them for its service, it has let them rule it. The gigantic machinery of communications, of which we have tried to indicate the size and complexity and cost, is essentially an instrument; but an instrument is nothing apart from its purpose, and here the purpose is unknown or misunderstood or neglected or perverted. . . . The machine is too heavy for the game to be safe. We are none the happier now that our prayer has been answered," and time and space are so largely annihilated.

WHAT INHERITANCE SHALL WE GIVE OUR CHILDREN?

The Christian work and influence of the Society of Friends is mostly manifested through the individual members of the Society, rather than in a corporate capacity.

This being the method by which our message is given and extended in the world it seems most essential that all of our children should be given the best opportunities and advantages in their education, that they may become useful leaders wherever they may be situated.

When we grasp the vision of true values we will realize that the only earthly possession that cannot be lost while we have our faculties is our education. We may lose our relatives, our friends, our money or other property, but our educational training remains with us throughout our experience.

What better inheritance then can we give to our children, than the best education of which they are capable?

What investment can we make to obtain greater returns, than to provide the means whereby the best educational facilities shall be procured for the few children in the smaller Monthly and Preparative Meeting schools as well as for the many in the larger city schools.

The youngest children in the formative period of their lives need to have the best trained and most skillful teachers. At this period the child is most in need of his inheritance, when he is least able to care for himself. The parents of young children are naturally less likely to be in affluent circumstances, than later in their lives, and consequently less able to support these smaller schools, which have their struggles for adequate maintenance.

These schools have no large alumni associations to arouse interest in raising endowment funds for their support, as do the high schools and colleges, and consequently they must depend upon the more or less uncertain contributions of interested friends.

Should not Philadelphia Yearly Meeting be concerned to establish a permanent endowment fund, the income from which could be applied as needed through its Educational Committee for the assistance of these schools in supplying the needed advantages for our younger children?

Is not this an avenue for the extension of Christian fundamentals?

Do we not owe such an inheritance to the children?

AN UNDERSTANDING HEART.

An understanding heart is a loving heart. Love makes insight. "As much love, so much perception." Good-will broadens and deepens our sympathies; it is clothed with power.

"Keep thy heart with all diligence for out of it are the issues of life." We see here the deep necessity of "keeping" one's heart and preserving an affectionate interest in the lives of others. And this, not only for the happiness of others, but for our own also. As Maeterlinck wrote in his book, "Wisdom and Destiny," "And so can we too count the steps we take on the highway of truth by the increase of love that comes for all that goes with us in life; the increase of love and glad curiosity, of respect and of deep admiration."

To have attained an understanding heart is well worth while. It adds to the interest and significance of life itself. Its possession indicates a certain culture and refinement. It is the development of our own finer qualities that enables us to understand, appreciate and draw out what is fine and noble in others.

Spirits are not finely touched
But to fine issues.

*"Unifying the World," by G. W. Clark. The Swarthmore (English) International Handbooks, whose small price should make them accessible to many readers. Sold at Friends' Book Store, 302 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

Robert Louis Stevenson had an understanding heart. It was said of him that he made the law of kindness the ruling law of his life. "There was an atmosphere of good-will diffusing itself from the speaker, a glow of eager benignity and affectionate laughter emanating from his presence."

How we are drawn to a person with an understanding heart! What a deep delight it is to feel that we are understood with intelligence and sympathy! How refreshing and inspiring it is to come into contact with a warm-hearted personality!

Gentleness, cheerfulness, loving-kindness, how these beautiful words enkindle in us the high aspiration that we too may be blessed with an understanding heart!

Send all clothing supplies to the storeroom, 15th and Cherry Streets.

Such is the famine situation in Russia that foreign missions can properly care for only ten per cent. of the needy cases.

This is the testimony of Julius A. Hecker, of New York City, who writes from Buzuluk, located in the area where the Society of Friends is feeding about 100,000 children daily.

J. A. H., who rode on a caboose with the crew of a refugee train, says that typhus is raging among the peasant folk crowded together in box cars which make their way slowly across the vast Russian plains toward regions where the survivors can find food and shelter.

He writes, "For about three weeks, these refugees had been on their way and it would take them another month or two before they would reach their final destination."

"Refugee trains do not enjoy the scheduled traffic regulations. They are sent along whenever the single track line is open, and often stand, especially in places where there are snowdrifts, sometimes for a week before they get a chance to make another hundred miles.

"I have seen refugee trains that for four months were creeping toward the southeast to the promised land of Turkestan. How many of these unfortunates will survive the privations of the journey I do not venture even to guess. Hardly a day passed without its death list in the long row of box cars.

"The railroad stations were crowded with refugee families encamped for weeks upon the floor. Outside were piles of the dead, which received frequent additions from the passing trains of refugees.

"At Samara, which is the centre of the famine region, this condition was especially bad, literally thousands of people being encamped in the large railroad station."

CLOTHING THE NAKED.

The American Red Cross is now actively engaged in collecting clothing and shoes for the destitute men, women and children of Russia. All of these supplies are being distributed by the relief workers of the A. F. S. C., who state that there is also need for bedding; that children are dying in the homes and hospitals for lack of covering, even during this month.

They crouch against the walls or on their beds, hour after hour and day after day. Clothes and bed-clothes are almost as necessary as food.

Another case cited of these homes was that of a building in which 400 children were housed, with accommodations of all sorts for forty. Clothes were as non-existent as food, so that in most cases the children are left in their verminous rags, spreading the infection of typhus and cholera.

"In one home," says A. Ruth Fry, Secretary of the English Friends' organization, in Russia, "by some great effort rather more was done for them. They were washed and dressed in thin cotton shirts, and yet all the staff were down with typhus except one woman doctor. It is difficult to exaggerate the need for clothes; every scrap sent here already has been distributed."

RUSSIA RESPONDS.

It is gratifying to note the support which is given to the work of the Friends by the Russian press, especially on account of the fact that the newspapers are confirming the reports of the workers in the field.

Following is an extract from an article which recently appeared in the The Iztvestia, a periodical published in Moscow:—

The Society of Friends are working in districts where the suffering from famine is greatest. In the Buzuluk district they are feeding 180,000 children and adults. Their intended program reaches 300,000. In the Buzuluk district the peasants' farms have suffered greatly. Taking this into consideration, the American Quakers have offered to import 1,000 horses from Kansas State. This offer has been gratefully accepted.

The work of the Society of Friends is carried on at the present time only in the Buzuluk Oyezd of the Samara government. The whole of the Oyezd is divided into four districts. The chief warehouse is in the town of Buzuluk.

In the beginning of last Twelfth Month, the Society of Friends was feeding 38,000 children; and towards the end of that month 65,000. Later this number was greatly increased, and by Second Month 15th the Society was feeding 70,000 children and 60,000 adults (including 5,000 transport workers), a total of 130,000 persons.

According to the latest reports, up to the first of Third Month the Society of Friends was feeding 135,000 children and adults (English Section); 185,000 children and adults (American Section).

Besides supplying foodstuffs, the Society of Friends has given medical assistance; providing the hospitals of the Buzuluk Oyezd with medicines and hospital equipment. As the children of this Oyezd are sorely in need of clothing, which is often the cause of their being unable to attend the kitchens, the Society of Friends has sent 933 poods, 12 funts of various clothing, to the Samara government, which has been distributed amongst the most needy children.

LAYING UP TREASURES.

The following letter, recently received by the A. F. S. C., is from one who in the spirit of Christ's teachings is laying up treasures in heaven.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

Enclosed you will find a money order for $1541.90 for the starving of Russia. It is practically all I have, but I think that perhaps it will never go so far again toward alleviating human suffering, so I am giving it and trusting God for the future.

There is another matter about which I wished to write. I wish during the rest of my life to feel that I am helping to make the world a better place for humanity and it has occurred to me that one of the ways in which to do this, for a few years at least, would be to help in the Friends' Relief Work in one of the countries of Europe.

UNITY and harmony are essential for the strength and efficiency of any combination or association of individuals. They must have a consecration and zeal for a common purpose. Just as soon as they split into cliques, or go off on tangents upon which the whole is divided in interest or belief, they are so much weakened. Would you temperance advocates join in an intimate and active organization with saloon keepers?

"HOW DO YOU DO?"

There are a great many different ways of saying, "How do you do?" The French people say, "How do you carry yourself?" while the Italians ask, "How do you find yourself?" the Dutch say, "How do you fare?" and the Germans, "How goes it?" while in Sweden the greeting is, "How can you?"

The Egyptian question is due to the hot climate, of course—"How do you perspire?" They ask their friends! The Chinese say two short sentences—"How is your stomach? Have you eaten your rice?" While in Africa the Mpongwe greeting is, "What is the news?" and the conventional answer—"Good news, but for the hunger."

The Polish ask, "How do you have yourself?" and the Russian says, "How do you live on?" When a Persian greets a friend he politely remarks, "May thy shadow never be less," meaning may your health be good and your body never waste away. In Arabia they often say, "I take the ground from beneath your feet and kiss it," meaning that meeting you is the greatest pleasure the earth can give me! So you will see that customs vary, but friendship colors every greeting, for in the South Sea Islands is a place full of cannibal savages where the missionaries found them saying the most hopeful of good-bys: "Fire again in the sky to you—namely, 'another sunny day for you tomorrow.'"—The Baptist.

TEXTS—PHRASES—SHIBBOLETHS.

Touch not, taste not, handle not. Col. 2, 21.

In one of the popular school readers, much in vogue many years ago, was an article in which the passage just quoted was used as a proof text for the entire disuse of all intoxicating drinks. The article made a profound impression on the youthful mind, and I grew up in the full belief that this text constituted absolute authority for the practice of total abstinence, and to this day occasionally in temperance literature we note this text quoted as a scriptural injunction against the use of intoxicants. Such reference ignores the context. It is a good illustration of the fallacy of using a text, isolated from its context, as an argument for a theory or a principle however meritorious. For while many passages stand forth as gems of thought, or as wise maxims for human conduct, without reference to what precedes or follows, there are other sayings whose interpretation depends entirely upon the context. It goes without saying that students or thoughtful readers of the Scriptures have understood the application of the text to which attention has been called, but in order to make my meaning plain to all readers, the context of the passage, taken from the Twentieth Century version, is given. "Do not, then, allow any one to take you to task on questions of eating or drinking, or in the matter of annual, or monthly or weekly festivals. These things are only the shadow of what is to come; the substance is in the Christ. . . . Since, with Christ, you became dead to the puerile teaching of this world, why do you submit, as though your life were still that of the world, to such ordinances as 'Do not handle, or taste, or touch?' You are following merely human directions and instructions. . . ." The apostle Paul is manifestly directing the true members of the church to disregard the absurd commands of unreasonable fanatics or of misguided enthusiasts. In this particular instance, the teaching is in opposition to any prohibition. Paul's thought was to counteract the influence of the Judaizers who were burdening Christian believers with the observance of many rites and forms which had no appeal to Gentile converts nor to the more liberal of the Jewish believers. Among these trouble makers were vegetarians who insisted that no meat should be eaten; there were others who would rigidly investigate all meat sold in the markets in order to ascertain whether it belonged to an animal which had been offered in the heathen temples; there were strict Sabbatarians; there were moon-struck members who were particular about the observance of new moon festivals. Paul was willing that each believer should act in such matters as his conscience dictated, but he did not desire that each party should endeavor to impose its own peculiar views on the entire membership.

Even if this particular passage from the writings of Paul may not be cited as an argument against the use of ardent spirits, there are other scriptural teachings, which clearly indicate the duty of everybody to abstain from the use of intoxicants. Drunkenness and revellings are universally condemned and in the strongest terms. Heaven is closed to those who thus indulge. Paul was willing to abstain from either flesh or wine, if by his partaking thereof his brother should stumble.

ALBERT H. VOTAW.

TRUTH—WITHOUT EXAGGERATION.

Certain remarks in a recent article in THE FRIEND have brought me to the point where I feel I must express a conviction, which has been growing steadily stronger for some time past.

This is the conviction that the customs of the time are leading many people to have too light a regard for Truth. I refer to a passage wherein the writer speaks of "assuming a joyous smile and gasping in admiration" of certain objects for which she entertained no real admiration whatever.

Were it not that I have seen (and heard) this kind of thing actually occur many times since I have been in this country, I might have supposed that the words were written just for effect. But I know, from experience, that many people, I might almost say the majority of people, are constantly making pleasing remarks which have no foundation in their real feelings, merely for the sake of making a pleasing impression.

Now, this may, at first sight, seem to be a very slight failing, if a failing at all, but if we trace out the final effects of this habit, I think we shall decide that a stricter adherence to truth, even though it may not seem so pleasant at the time, would, in the long run, be much better. When one has discovered, as one is bound to do, in time, that many of these pleasing remarks were insincere, one is apt to come to the conclusion that none of them are sincere: indeed, how is one to know which are real, when all the complimentary remarks are uttered with such apparent sincerity—even to the "joyous smile and gasps of admiration?"

It appears to me that we, as Friends, are called upon, by our professions, to make a definite stand in this regard. We are supposed to have such a great regard for truth, that our simple "yea" and "nay" are to be taken as of equal value with another person's solemn oath.

The early Friends were very frank in the expression of their opinions and held strictly to the Truth in all things.

I do not, of course, think that we are called upon to express ourselves in the blunt and discourteous manner of that period, and it may not always be necessary to express disapproval or disagreement when we feel it, unless directly asked for an opinion, but it does seem to me that we should avoid empty formalisms, whenever possible, and not give expression to sentiments which we do not feel.

It appears to me that this custom depreciates the value of words in the same way that the issue of paper money, unrepresented by real wealth, depreciates the value of the currency.

JULIAN M. TRENT.

LANSDOWNE, PA.

If the presence of a good man, through the respect and reverence which he inspires, always improves him with whom he associates, with much more reason does not he who always holds uninterrupted converse with God by knowledge, life and thanksgiving, grow at every step superior to himself in all respects—in conduct, in words, in disposition? Such an one is persuaded that God is ever beside him, and does not suppose that He is confined in certain limited places; so that under the idea that at times he is without Him, he may indulge in excesses night and day.—CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

THE Friends' Historical Society in London has on at least three occasions honored American Friends by appointing as President one from this side the Atlantic. We refer, in order, to George Vaux and Issac Sharpless, both deceased.

The present appointee, is Charles F. Jenkins, Treasurer of the American Friends' Service Committee, who sailed for Europe on Fourth Month 7th. He will give the annual address before the Friends' Historical Society in London, and plans to spend about two months travelling through England and France.

Chas. F. Jenkins has made certain interesting Quaker "finds" in the Congressional Library at Washington regarding William Thornton, the Quaker architect of Tortola. The subject of his address before the Historical Society is in connection with Friends' history on the Island. It will be illustrated with lantern slides, of which he has made a considerable collection.

DR. WM. I HULL, whose reports of the late Washington Conference in THE FRIEND were so highly appreciated, has, as already noted in these pages, prepared a summary of the results of the Conference, which has been sent to over 20,000 clergymen in the United States.

He has been appointed a delegate to the international church meeting which is to be held at Copenhagen and present this report there. The Conference is called for next Eighth Month.

THOSE who have enjoyed the charming Quaker stories by Violet Hodgkin will be interested to know that on Second Month 14th, she was married in the Friends' Meeting House at Truro, England, to John Holdsworth, of New Zealand, before a very representative company from almost every Quarterly Meeting in the London Yearly Meeting.

THE following should elicit the interest of all our readers, but those who have met Justine Dalencourt and have entered into personal sympathy with her in her great work will be especially alert to help her in the good cause. The Friend (London) says—The Training Home for French women workers in Paris under Justine Dalencourt's care is for sale. Many Friends and others in England and France have already contributed towards its purchase so as to secure its continuance. The premises at 67, Rue du Theatre, are specially suitable. During the thirty-four years of its existence over 200 young women have been trained, and most of them are now filling responsible and useful posts in France and elsewhere. The sum asked for the property is 100,000 frs.; towards this, 76,000 frs. have been received.

Catharine L. Braithwaite—2 West Bar, Banbury, England, may be consulted for further information.

THE following has been sent us by a correspondent recently from Germany:—

THE GERMAN ATTITUDE TOWARDS THE QUAKER.—"The Quakers are gradually leaving Germany, and it is good that it is so. Charity in distress is the most beautiful thing that men can give; but when distress is over, then charity easily becomes demoralizing. The greatest physical distress for Germany is over, and it is high time that town authorities attempt to make good out of their own resources the harm that the diabolical war has done to the children of the people.

"On the departure of the Quakers we take the opportunity to express to them once again our heartiest thanks for all they have given to the German people in its great distress. But we most particularly emphasize that our thanks in the first place are for the spiritual goods which the Quakers brought to us. They taught us to believe once again in the goodness of men; they showed us that there are still people in the world whose words and deeds are in unison. May the spirit which they lived out before us find dwelling-places amongst the German people.

"We are pleased that the Quakers are giving up only their practical work in Germany, and that some of them are remaining behind to foster further those spiritual connections which are so necessary to all peoples in the moral degradation of post-war time."—From Die Frau im Staat.

THE Journal of John Woolman, Edited by Amelia Mott Gummere, of Haverford, is now ready for publication. The task that our friend set herself years ago has grown to one of great dimensions. The volume will be a large one and will be one of the richest additions made to Quaker literature for many years.

The work is to contain the full journal of John Woolman. It will interest many to know that the popular edition edited by Whittier years ago was not based on the original journal but doubtless on some other, which it may be by accident had permitted certain errors and abbreviations to be made.

The present seems emphatically to call for neither less nor more than the original. What John Woolman really wrote, it interests us to know; and while there may be nothing that the ordinary reader among us will notice, there are not a few who lay much importance upon the absolute accuracy of the work.

The book will contain much material of great historical interest, which the editor has gathered both in England and here, this coupled with the pure English of John Woolman's own recital will, we trust, make another epoch in "the making of Quaker books." It will be well illustrated with photographs of original minutes, addresses etc. It will be an honest surprise to most of us to see what a wealth of material Amelia Gummere has unearthed.

Later we expect to publish a complete prospectus of the book.

OUR Friend, Max I. Reich, has been furnished with a minute of his meeting, endorsed by Burlington and Bucks Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders for extensive service in Ohio and Indiana.

It is his expectation to attend the Quarterly Meetings of Ohio Yearly Meeting as they come in course a month or so hence. In this he is to have the company of S. Francis Walton of the Arch Street Meeting, their desire being to make a visit to the Indians in Western New York on their way to Ohio. Following the visit through Ohio, his minute contemplates further religious service in Indiana. On this part of his visit he expects to have the company of Albert H. Votaw.

DEAN INGE ON QUAKERISM.—Dr. Inge, Dean of St. Paul's in London, has an interesting and remarkable article on "The Quakers" in a recent issue of the Contemporary Review, which seems to have been called forth by reading Rufus M. Jones' "Later Periods of Quakerism," as well as preceding volumes in that series and other modern works about the Society. The Dean, after remarking that there is growing conviction that the late war "was a ghastly and unnecessary blunder," and that if belligerents had listened to the precepts of Jesus Christ they would not now be weltering in bankruptcy and misery, says that "it is not surprising that some notable conversions to Quakerism among persons of high intellectual culture have lately occurred, and that even in the Anglican Church attempts have been made to introduce the most characteristic Quaker service, the silent prayer meeting." For the Quakers "in their uncompromising condemnation of war have testified consistently to their belief in the wisdom of the New Testament." While Dr. Inge is appreciative of Quakerism generally and of Woolman and Whittier particularly, he is not afraid to criticise where he thinks he should, and says that "worldly prosperity has not promoted faithfulness to the Quaker traditions," and that the Society, especially in America, has suffered from conforming too much to the methods and practices of other denominations, by which they lose their main reason for existing as a distinct sect.—Exchange.

THE Year Book of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, recently published, shows that there are in attendance at Friends' preparatory schools in and close to Philadelphia, 2367 boys and girls. The total of children between the ages of 5 and 20 members of the Yearly Meeting is 809—there are therefore about 1,400 children, non-members, attending the schools. Excepting two schools on the list, it is the practice for the children to attend mid-week meetings for worship. Is it any wonder that our late Friend Samuel Emien often remarked,—"I feel a great concern in the matter of the children attending our schools and our mid-week meetings, where they make up a considerable part of the congregation."

WM. I. HULL, whose weekly articles in THE FRIEND on the Washington Conference were appreciated by hundreds, has issued a four-page summary of the treaties, resolutions, and declarations that were under discussion and became a part of the Conference. It should be procured and bound up with the above mentioned essays. It can be had through the Book Store, at 304 Arch Street or direct from 154 N. Fifteenth Street.

The American Friend contributes the following:-

Occasioned by the numerous financial drives conducted in connection with the recent war, the American Economic Association announced liberal cash prizes for the best essays on the subject, "What Can a Man Afford?" Much interest was aroused in the contest, some forty papers being submitted. The first prize of $1,000 was awarded to two Friends, Paul H. Douglas, of the Department of Economics of Chicago University and his wife, Dorothy Douglas. Their comprehensive treatise of some one hundred pages has recently been published in a supplement to the American Economic Review.

NOTICES.

VOLUNTEERS FOR MENDING WORK WANTED.—The Mending Room, which is being conducted by the Woman's Work Committee of the Service Committee in the Meeting-house at Fifteenth and Cherry Streets, has proved to be a decided success. Many women are volunteering for part, at least, of each Third-day; and many garments contributed for the relief work and which are in need of repair, have been put into wearable condition, and thus made more valuable. The Committee is most grateful to those who have helped in this work.

The Sewing-room is open on Third-days beginning at 9 o'clock; and all who have an hour or two, or longer, are asked to come and aid in this very important work of mending the old garments. If those who come will bring aprons, they will probably be more comfortable in working.

FIRST-DAY, Fourth Month 30th, will be Friends' day at The Home for Aged Colored Persons, Belmont and Girard Avenues; the hour is 3 o'clock.

DIED.—On the twenty-fifth of Third Month, 1922, at Hamot Hospital, Erie, Pa., in his thirty-ninth year, ERNEST D. WILLIAMS, son of Mary E. and the late Joseph Williams; a member of Flushing Monthly Meeting of Friends, Ohio.

"HE HUMBLING HIMSELF."

It has been said more than once, and not inappropriately, that any one who presumes to express himself on the virtue of humility, stamps himself as lacking in that very thing.

It is the unconscious acts of our lives, what we live day by day, oftener than not in the narrow circle of our own families, that measure what we really are. A man is rarely himself when on parade. If what one does surpasses what he is, he lacks the essential of essentials.

A novice had made some commendable progress in his chosen calling, when his superior remarked on the development he had witnessed in certain traits of the young fellow's character. "Indeed," was the reply from the youth, "I have given no heed to that, and surely I merit no praise, for what I do has become second nature to me, but," he added, "I fail to achieve this other," referring to a standard which he had not attained, and toward which he was bending every effort.

The young man failed to appreciate the significance of what had been said, but later when consulting a diary he had kept during those testing years he found this entry, presumably the very remarks that had been made by his superior—"when ever a man's character transcends his achievements, those achievements will make but a transitory impression upon his consciousness."

Maybe nowhere better than in the prophecy of Micah do we have a true measure of the value of this spirit we have under review. It is a Divine method the prophet prescribes; "He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly and to love mercy (kindness) and to walk humbly with thy God."

How lightly we often esteem that which we can do with ease and what a high valuation we place upon that which promises us months and perhaps years of studious endeavor to attain! It is natural in our measurement of men to think chiefly of the material obstacles which they have met and surmounted, and it would be very unfair for us to return our estimate with these ignored. But the finer and the truer analysis of soul values takes cognizance first of something vastly more subtle.

It was said of a prominent figure in American life of the fifties and sixties that he was "a self-made man and that he had never ceased to worship his creator;" of another who lived at the same time, and who, through contact with college students, wielded a wide influence, that he "grew in favor with God and man and developed with the years that spirit of humility, which through him stamped itself upon his boys so that a measure of his gentleness overflowed into their lives." The first was conscious of the long gap between his start and finish, the latter, with an ideal ahead, was conscious only of a radiant joy that he could make some little advance toward it.

It is the standard we set and strive for that measures us. We may deceive ourselves,—we mostly do; we may entangle our best friends in such a web of questionings and forebodings about us that the scales of estimate will topple first this way and then that, but there remains something that we cannot deceive; the final verdict of our fellows can be trusted.

We are not called upon to belittle ourselves or our attainments; to speak less of ourselves than the facts justify is hypocrisy, upon which our Lord pronounced His most scathing censure. Some are endowed with a superlative amount of self-consciousness, which in the eyes of others often develops into pride; even this, if held in abeyance to that which is higher, should not argue against the attainment of real humility.

Humility and sincerity should be good bed-fellows. To claim humility and to be at heart not sincere means that we are lacking in both; while to be sincere in intent but to be lacking in humility is the status of very many.

Should we be so lifted up as to become vain of our own achievements, it may be all unconsciously on our part, we are tending to make ourselves the centre of that which is about us, till finally the illusion is broken, our importance is shown to be counterfeit, and we find the littleness of self and the greatness of that about us.

But, on the other hand, should our wills become subject to His perfect Will, and should our actions reflect the purpose He had in our creation, we shall then be in a position to accept Him in the way of His coming. When this high attainment has been experienced, we shall have reached the highest round in the ladder of possibilities, for we shall in good measure have been clothed upon with humility, the veritable badge of true discipleship.

We are not asked to perform any impossibilities, even less, we are not asked to be other than our own natural selves. But just as He humbled Himself and in due time gave Himself to the most ignominious death, so shall we be emptied of self and selfishness.

It was said long ago "that the greatest achievement of man was the surrender of his will to the Divine Will." If it was true when written to the little band of Christians in a church in Galatia long ago it is no less true to-day. Just as in the outward creation a fundamental law of nature is violated if we picture two objects occupying the same space at the same time, so two wills cannot dominate the same individual at the same time in the spiritual realm.

There is nothing belittling in the thought of poverty of spirit. Our Lord pronounced upon it the greatest of the blessings, for He said to such shall belong the Kingdom of Heaven. He made this condition the only condition upon which He could enter into our human and finite nature.

Surely herein lies the strength of those, who, it may be, are at times reckoned as weaklings, but who in the final rendering of accounts, even as measured by our finite judgments, are the possessors of God's richest blessing.

It has been written: "If our citizenship is of heaven our hearts become instinctively humble. Humility is the prerequisite of growth, as pride is the precursor of decay."

OUR BOOK OF DISCIPLINE.

That Philadelphia Yearly Meeting should make changes in its Discipline from year to year is neither new nor abnormal. In printed books of Discipline of the edition of 1806 blank leaves were provided, on which subsequent changes could be written in. Thus we find, in a book which belonged to Southern Quarterly Meeting, eight amendments or additions variously dated from 1807 to 1824. The series of dates following paragraphs in our present Discipline, show how many passages have been added or altered from time to time, how, in fact, the constitution of our Society has evolved.

A document once known as "Canons and Institutions," bearing the signature of George Fox and probably issued by the first Yearly Meeting held in London in 1668, may rightly claim to have been the earliest written Discipline, but in its more extended form the Discipline is a compilation from minutes and epistles. A beautifully bound copy of "Extracts from the Minutes and Advices of the Yearly Meeting of Friends held in London, from its First Institution," published in 1802, was presented to Ruth Ely by her friend Elizabeth Robson in 1828, and is very similar to the Books of Discipline of Philadelphia and New England Yearly Meetings of about the same date.

For a long time, the Discipline was in manuscript and intended simply for the guidance of officers of the meetings, but as the Society of Friends grew more democratic in methods of government, it was put in printed form and members at large were encouraged to read it. This is as it should be, and a careful reading of our present book will repay Friends, older or younger, who are interested in Quakerism and its extension.

It has been frequently remarked, in regard to our late Yearly Meeting, that we were making history, and so we were, and it is to be hoped that we shall continue so to do. But for those who would make history, a knowledge of past history is a great help. Joseph Bevan Braithwaite showed to an American Friend who visited him, his library of ancient church literature, and in doing so, said that in each generation of Friends there should be one or more with a thorough knowledge of church history. A teacher in a theological school told young men preparing for missionary work, that missionaries should know church history because, in their experience in newly organized Christian communities, they would have to solve many problems which had been dealt with in succession by the early church.

If then, we are to make history, should we not know our own past history, and if we would revise discipline, should we not understand the development of our present discipline? Let us try to get at its spirit and consider how far that spirit governs our own lives. Let us further know its provisions for the organization and work of the church.

Some of us are pained when we hear the weakness of our Society in this day blamed upon mistakes or even insincerity in the generations now gone. Remembering our parents and grandparents and their worthy contemporaries, we say with humility, "I have a goodly heritage." Yet each succeeding generation sees new phases of truth in the light of its own pressing problems.

"New occasions teach new duties,
Time makes ancient good uncouth,
They must upward still and onward
Who would keep abreast of truth."

Doubtless our fathers made mistakes, but closer study will show that certain principles have held from the rise of the Society until now, although new applications are needed in each generation.

"Therefore every scribe who hath been made a disciple to the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is a householder, who bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old." The old is the principle, the new is the application. Let us look at our Discipline in the light of its highest function, that of making disciples. This is the great purpose of all discipline. And let us cherish, and live in its spirit, for should we lose this, shall we not have lost what has been called "the soul of the Society of Friends?"

A GREAT HEADMASTER.

THE LATE FREDERICK ANDREWS, WHO WAS FORTY-TWO YEARS AT ACKWORTH SCHOOL.

(From a Correspondent.)

One of the race of great headmasters has "passed on," in the passing of Frederick Andrews, for forty-two years headmaster of Ackworth, the famous Quaker school founded by Dr. John Fothergill, F. R. S., in Yorkshire, in 1779.

He passed away suddenly at Ackworth Cottage, Cloughton, on the Yorkshire coast on First-day, to which spot he retired two years ago when he left the School at which he had been so long the head, and where, too, he had been a boy and also an assistant master.

Born in Sunderland in 1850 of an old Quaker family, he gained his B. A. London in 1872, but bad eye-sight prevented his studying for a further degree. But this weakness was never allowed to interfere in his playing the game of life as few men play it, never disheartened and always ready to believe in men and causes. "Sympathy" was the keynote of the success he had with the boys and girls passing through his hands—3,828 of them during the forty-two years. He measured each one up, and one and all liked him. He was the leader and the "enthusiast," whether in the literature lessons he introduced, in the First-day evening talks that live so vividly in the minds of these four thousand, or on the cricket field where he led the team of masters and boys able to meet any team in Yorkshire. Cricket was a passion, and one of his great hits is still pointed out on the Scarborough ground.

A strong Liberal in politics, Frederick Andrews could have had any constituency in the county had he cared to stand for Parliament, and while not an orator, no man could hold both a friendly and a hostile audience better, for he "sensed" his audience immediately, and his entire belief in the causes he espoused made opposition a difficult matter.

In 1906 he was made a J. P., and served regularly on the Bench. It was said of him that he was as keenly interested in the sins of his fellow-men as in their virtues.

None of the failings in human natures of those with whom he came into contact ever made him a pessimist. "He would pull his nose and see the comic side of anything," as an old friend has said.

The faith of those who made him head of a great school at the age of twenty-seven was abundantly justified. A great educator in the more restricted sense he may not have been, but his claim to be a great headmaster none will challenge.

He lost his wife in 1888—a loss never forgotten. She was the sister of William Scarnell Lean, the Quaker orator who joined the Church of England, took orders, but returned to the Society of Friends before his death.

LETTER FROM THE SERVICE COMMITTEE.

[We know that very many of our readers have received this letter direct from headquarters. We shall be glad if our publishing it in THE FRIEND will lead others to make donations according to their ability to this most worthy cause.—Eds.]

FOURTH MONTH 26, 1922.

DEAR FRIEND:—

As one of the contributors to the fund for Russian famine relief through the American Friends' Service Committee, I should like to submit a brief report to date.

Since last Ninth Month when we began the special appeal we have received:

In cash allocation for Russian famine relief . . . $823,481.48
In additional gifts in kind as follows:

40,000 barrels flour, value	200,000.00
160,000 pounds small garden seeds, valued at $.50 a pound	80,000.00
Corn, approximate value	57,000.00
Soap, approximate value	2,000.00
Food, approximate value	32,400.00
Clothing	72 Tons

All the gifts in kind have been forwarded promptly as received except the corn, which we are having milled in this country. A good part of the corn products, however, have been shipped.

In First Month last we authorized our Unit to feed an average of 100,000 children and adults a day for six months. Gifts in kind and additional funds will enable them to increase this number.

We have increased our personnel until at the present time we have eighteen workers actually on the field. They are all mature men and women and some have had considerable experience in relief work before going to Russia. Five of the workers have already had typhus, and we are glad to report that they are all on the road to recovery. All of the workers are on a volunteer basis.

On account of the various statements which have been published in American papers, I should like to answer a few of the questions which we are asked most frequently.

1. Have you been able to get your supplies into Russia?

We are glad to say that all our shipments have been forwarded from the port of entry to the famine area with a minimum amount of delay. The winter has been severe and this coupled with a crippled railroad system has delayed shipments to some extent, but so far we have had no cause for complaint. Delays are inevitable in handling large shipments, but we feel that the Soviet government has done the very best it could under the circumstances. They have given the right of way to all food shipments, carried the supplies free of charge, and furnished warehouses and helpers for handling the supplies.

2. Has the famine situation been met?

No, there are still hundreds of thousands to be fed, and the food cannot be gotten to them before next harvest. Relief should have been extended to about 20,000,000, and the very best that all of the organizations can do will not reach more than nine or ten million. This larger number will probably not be fed except for a period of two months at the very most. Up to the first of Seventh Month we can increase the number of people fed according to the amount of money received. The number of deaths from famine this winter has been estimated by Dr. Nansen to be somewhere around 8,000,000. However, figures of deaths during famine are almost always overestimated.

3. What of the future?

If the crops are very good this summer, there will not be much need for supplementary feeding during next winter. So far, however, we have been unable to get any reliable statistics as to crop prospects, acreage of winter wheat sowed or the possibility of getting the spring wheat sowed at the proper time. Unless the crop is very good, it will be necessary to carry on famine relief work next winter. We will make a report on crop conditions as soon as possible.

In the meantime there is a great need for all the sanitary, medical and hospital supplies that can be gotten in. Our workers report having visited homes for children where there were accommodations for less than one-seventh of the inmates of the home. There is a great need for soap, disinfectants, drugs and medical supplies, cod liver oil and hospital supplies, such as bed linens, bandages and surgical instruments. Whatever money is given to us that cannot be used to very good advantage in food will be used to purchase such supplies.

We expect to continue our work in Russia for several years. Even after the famine situation is met there will be tremendous need for outside help. Moreover, we believe that one of the best ways to bring about normal conditions is to give some expression of friendship and good-will to the people themselves. We purpose to continue the distribution of relief without regard to class or creed, trusting that by so doing we are helping to create a better understanding between the people of the two countries.

We appreciate your co-operation in this work and assure you that any further contributions you may care to make to our organization will be used to the very best advantage. We are in a position to continue to pay all our own overhead expenses, thus assuring all contributors that every dollar that is given actually goes into the relief work.

Sincerely,

WILBUR K. THOMAS,
Executive Secretary.

"Who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, out of weakness were made strong." Heb. xi. 33, 34—

She met the hosts of Sorrow with a look Meekly, her gentle rule, and frowned no more.
And soon the lowering brood were tamed, and took,
That altered not beneath the frown they wore,
Her soft hand put aside the assaults of wrath,
And calmly broke in twain
The fiery shafts of pain,
And rent the nets of passion from her path.
By that victorious hand despair was slain;
With love she vanquished hate, and overcame
Evil with good, in her great Master's name.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' WORK IN WEST CHINA.

Among larger groups of students or among students less mature it is difficult to avoid that stereotyping, deadening, professional type of religious services where it is the duty of one person to lead and of the others to follow—where everyone knows in advance almost exactly what the program will be from beginning to end. In the University, and to a larger extent in the Middle School as well, the Friends' students have avoided this danger in large measure. Even the Anglican Church who were several years guests in the Friends' dormitories, now that they have a new home of their own, occasionally hold their dormitory meetings after the manner of Friends.

In the same way our students feel the dangers of a professional ministry. Several times during the past four years the University has held meetings daily for several consecutive days and has invited strong speakers to present the opportunities for Christian service in the various professions. Frequently students have found in these meetings just the added incentive they needed to bring to motivation the influences of previous months or years of Christian teaching, and have made their choice to follow Christ or have definitely consecrated their lives to His service as doctors, teachers or ministers. Few of the Friends' students, however, draw this sharp distinction between the minister and the non-minister. They regard every Christian as responsible for the proclamation of the Gospel. The business man and the teacher preach in our meetings, and our two fully qualified Chinese physicians are not less zealous than the evangelist in bearing their share in the onerous but joyful work of the street chapel. On one occasion several of our finest medical students, not Friends, handed in cards signifying their desire to be enrolled with others as Student Volunteers for the ministry, yet not in the least intending to abandon their profession. Were they not, after all, right?

PLANS FOR A WOMAN'S COLLEGE.

I hope within a few months to receive additional information which will enable me to report more fully on this subject. Here I will mention only that important developments have taken place which I hope may result in the opening of the doors of the University to women students.

A BEGINNING FOR AMERICAN FRIENDS' WORK.

Enclosed within Chengtu City wall and formerly separated from the rest of the city by a high wall is a large area in which lived the garrison of the Manchu conquerors of China. Only Manchus were allowed to reside there, and up to about 1900 Chinese children were afraid to venture far into this section even in the daytime. Previous to the Revolution the two races had begun to amalgamate and Chinese were allowed to purchase land and reside in this section. The Revolution accelerated the process, the separating wall was torn down and thousands of Chinese bought land for homes and shops from the Manchu owners, many of whom were in dire necessity, owing to the stoppage of ration allowances which they had formerly received from the subjected Chinese. Even the names of the streets were changed from Manchu to Chinese, and so completely have conquerors been absorbed by the conquered that to a casual observer this section is hardly distinguishable from any other Chinese city. The whole section is rapidly becoming an important residential district for better class Chinese, and streets which were formerly almost deserted are filling up with shops and assuming a busy aspect.

Over ten years ago the Chengtu Monthly Meeting laid plans to open a chapel here, but was unable to do so for lack of funds. Recently the question was reopened in view of the great need and special opportunity in this comparatively unoccupied field. The Monthly Meeting opened a subscription list and agreed to be responsible for the workers and for twenty per cent. of the expenditure, eighty per cent. being provided by American Friends; so a chapel and a lower primary school for boys and girls have been opened in rented premises. The total cost is less than $400 gold per year. The work is under the direction of a committee of the Monthly Meeting. There is preaching in the chapel two afternoons a week and a meeting for women only once a week. Twenty-one boys and girls enrolled the first term. I have enjoyed taking a share in the speaking in the chapel and have also frequently had a part in the meetings at the older established congregation in the city.

THE BEGINNINGS OF AN INDIGENEOUS CHRISTIANITY.

The test of the ultimate success of missions is the degree of responsibility which is developed in the native Christians. The following may indicate in some measure our rating is judged by this standard. With the exception of the University and the Friends' Institute, all the work of the Society of Friends in West China is under the control of a Central Executive Committee composed of eight Chinese and eight missionaries. On the local executives at the various stations the foreign missionary is usually far outnumbered by Chinese members who really take responsibility for the work under their care. This year the presiding officer of the Central Executives is a Chinese, and last year both of the Clerks of Yearly Meeting were natives. They presided with dignity and spiritual insight. For several years the Clerk of Chengtu Monthly Meeting has been a Chinese. Last autumn when on one occasion he was unable to serve I was asked to take his place. I declined, and stated that there were present several Chinese who could perform the service better than I. One of them was called to the chair and proved the truth of my statement.

I believe the function of the foreign missionary is to take the lead only until he has developed his fellow-workers to a point where they can carry the responsibility, when he should gradually withdraw into the background. Let me illustrate: Last summer the committee in charge of opening the new school in the Manchu city was contemplating the engagement of a teacher in whom I had little confidence because he seemed to lack the requisite evangelizing spirit. However, I believed the committee considered him a satisfactory candidate, so I refrained from expressing too decidedly my uneasiness upon this point, and the engagement was decided upon. A day or two later the Chinese members of the committee halted the negotiations and called another meeting which decided upon another candidate who has proved to be a suitable and useful man. They said, "We have been examining more closely into this man's qualifications, and we are not satisfied with our former decision. Here we are planning to expend a considerable amount which it is very difficult to raise, and it will be a pity if this school does not fulfil our purpose of preaching the Gospel." It would have been easy to have pressed my view and secured a decision in accordance with my opinion (which might easily have been a mistaken one) and so forged another link in the chain of dependence upon the foreigner. In such cases the judgment of our Christian Chinese leaders can be depended upon, and it is far better to give them a chance to walk alone, even though they may sometimes make a mistake.

I have space here to mention only a few names of dependable leaders:

S. C. Yang, now in his ninth year as Principal of the Middle School. He is in no small degree responsible for the recent subscription of ten thousand (silver) dollars from T. R. Liu, a Christian business man, for the erection of a chapel for the Middle School, and also for about a dozen individual Chinese subscriptions of $125 (silver) each for the furnishing of classrooms in the new Scattergood Building.

D. M. Liu, one of our first graduates. His work in the Normal School has won the confidence and esteem, as well as the love, of his associates. He is now Supervisor of Education for his mission (the M. E. M.) in a district comprising several counties.

S. H. Fang, is another of our graduates, who has recently returned from further study in England and America. He takes up the Principalship of the Normal School, succeeding D. M. Liu.

H. Y. Fu is of the Canadian Mission. He is the first graduate of the University and has recently taken up the principalship of the Bible School. At the Y. M. C. A. Summer Conference he gave a powerful appeal to students to enter the Christian ministry.

Such men are now becoming a great force in the councils of the churches. The University has recently invited three Chinese to become full members of the Senate. The church does need the presence and counsel of the foreign missionary and will continue to need it for many years to come. No one, however, who has lived and worked with these and many other efficient and spiritually-minded Chinese Christians can fail to recognize the dawning of a new day which is full of hope.

The above has been written on the Pacific on my way to America in response to a cable informing me of the serious illness of my wife who left Chengtu a year ago and since last Tenth Month has been at Battle Creek seeking to regain her health. The skill of the Sanitarium physicians, however, proved unavailing and she passed away on Third Month 10th, before my arrival. During these fifteen years she has suffered more than is generally known in order that our work for the Master might not be interrupted. She consciously gave her life for West China. I can only pray and confidently believe that He Who knoweth the hearts of all and Whose love is Infinite will not permit the offering to be in vain.

THIRD MONTH 19, 1922.

NEW LIGHT ON WILLIAM PENN.

FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA IN COURT AND COTTAGE.

Lord Macaulay has not been the only person to be critical of the connection of William Penn, founder of Pennsylvania, with the Courts of Charles II and James II, so that the appearance in print for the first time of a reminiscence concerning the "Quaker Courtier" is noteworthy.

This has been handed down in a letter which has just come into the possession of the Society of Friends' Reference Library, Devonshire House, London.

"On one occasion," the letter runs, "coming to Reading and being about to proceed thence to London in order to attend at the Court of James II, as was his frequent practice, several Friends manifested their uneasiness at his being so much at the Court, expressing their fears that in such a place, and in such company, he would be in danger of departing from that simplicity of demeanour which Friends believed it their duty to maintain.

"W. Penn, after listening to their observations, expressed his wish to take one of their number with him to the Court of James, and one of them accordingly accompanied him thither. Being duly introduced, he remained with him during the whole time, thus having a full opportunity of observing the tenour of W. P.'s carriage, as well towards the king as towards others with whom he came in contact. Finding that his conduct, mode of address and general conduct were quite in harmony with his profession and practice as a Friend, he was entirely satisfied and was thus put in a position to allay the uneasiness of such of his friends as had entertained doubts on this head."

On another occasion during the visit to Reading, "several Friends spoke to him after Meeting saying they should be glad of his company to dine, but feared they had not suitable accommodation or provision, &c., for him. At last, a plain, honest woman asked him to her house, saying she could furnish all he could require. W. P. accepted her invitation and accompanied her to her very humble dwelling, in which was a small shop where she sold provisions, etc. She took thence some bread, butter and cheese, and W. Penn made a very sufficient dinner, much enjoyed his visit, and, at parting, heartily thanked her for her hospitality and especially for her cordial kindness and hearty welcome."

These anecdotes are recorded in a letter of Thomas Mounsey, of Sunderland, to Thomas Robson, of Liverpool, according to the current Journal of the Friends' Historical Society, dated Tenth Month 3, 1850. He quotes as his authority Joseph Naish, of Congressbury, who died in 1822, aged seventy-two, who was acquainted with a man whose father knew William Penn when he resided near Reading.

BETWEEN THE YORK AND THE JAMES.

ANN SHARPLESS.

I.—HAMPTON—"THE SOLUTION OF THE NEGRO PROBLEM."

Six hours of railroad travel from Broad Street Station, Philadelphia, southward through Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland and Virginia, over landscapes illuminated with sleet and snow, brought us to a boat-landing on Chesapeake Bay, well down toward Cape Charles. Then came a rocking, rolling passage of two hours, whereby in the dark of a winter evening, we reached Old Point Comfort. A taxi ride of two miles and we met a warm welcome at the Holly Tree Inn, Hampton Institute, Virginia, from a Westtown student of '79 and '80. Thus in the renewal of an old friendship auspiciously began a delightful study of a delightful place, though we had little idea of what was in store for us.

For, he said, we had wandered down to Hampton, not for the purpose of studying race-relations, nor yet expecting anything thrilling. The thought of taking life in an easy fashion, of the balmy airs of the South, its birds and the greenness which had not yet arrived in our Northern home, had allured us; while the Institute stood out in our fancy as an interesting side-show to fill in some idle moments.

It was our fate to be disillusioned in various particulars. The air was not very balmy, a temperature approaching zero awaited us the first morning, and the ground was covered inches deep with snow. Life was bustling and humming at Hampton. It wasn't a Southern settlement, i. e., it was dominated, not by Southern traditions and views of life, but by New England and New York aims and energy. The Institute was no side-show. It was the great outstanding feature, and you could not spend eight days there in its midst and not appreciate to some extent its splendid go-ahead spirit.

We Friends do not need to be told the condition of the Southern Negroes after the Emancipation Proclamation and the advance of the Northern armies had cut those Negroes loose from their former services and homes, to rely on their own abilities when they had no experience of their own on which to depend. It remained for a general in the U. S. army, the son of Hawaiian missionaries, to begin in 1868, in a small wooden house, with fifteen students and two white teachers, that "story of vision, of sacrifice, of self-effacement" which has resulted in the Hampton Institute of to-day. What it is now is briefly described by W. A. Aery in a recent pamphlet:—

"Hampton Institute is an educational demonstration station where three races work out daily with a minimum of friction, the problems of every-day life. Indeed, it is an industrial and educational village—with well-kept, brick dormitories; large dining-halls; an architecturally beautiful community auditorium with a seating capacity of twenty-five hundred persons; a general store; light, power, heating and refrigeration plants; a trade school; farms; home-economics class-rooms; steam and hand laundry; and other valuable equipments for training efficient, Christian community leaders."

In the little inn near the entrance to the Institute grounds we began to learn the strength of the spirit of loyalty to the place held by those whose interests had kept them at Hampton in some cases for many years. There we met the daughter of General Armstrong, the founder and first principal; there, too, the widow of Hollis Burke Frissell, the second principal, delightful Christian people. But it was not long till our especial friend and chaperone, the head of the department of industrial sewing and weaving for seventeen years, took us out sight-seeing. Her aim was to let nothing escape us which would shed light on the great work, or give us pleasure.

The laundry was the first workshop visited. Here we discovered a little Indian girl from Tunesassa, using one of the mangles. She told us later how very happy she was at the great school, while her face confirmed her words. Afterward we looked in at the carpenter and blacksmith shops, the automobile repair shop, the printing-room, the tailor and other sewing departments, the weavers and the cooks. We saw the students in the great auditorium and the great dining-room; the mammoth dish-washing machine, cleansing in a little over an hour the dishes of its eight hundred students; we went part-way on the rounds with the inspector of girls' rooms, who observed whether the books on the shelves were right side up and whether the upper bureau drawers were in proper order. The more obvious features needed no comments of blame.

Many other hives of industry we saw; I will mention only the Whittier Training School, where hundreds of little colored boys and girls from the towns nearby get the rudiments, partly under the direct teaching of the students from the Institute, and also under the supervision of one whom I used to see forty years ago training the teachers at Oswego Normal School. It was good to meet her again, and ask for old friends; to find out also whether the Oswego methods, insisting so strongly on self-reliance and thought-production—the Pestalozzian principles—worked well with the little colored boys and girls. She admitted it was rather hard work sometimes.

On our half-mile walk to the Whittier School, a giant live-oak was pointed out, almost the only one we saw in those parts. It was said, that the sight of a Negro under the shade of this tree giving instruction in reading to others around him, aroused in General Armstrong's mind the idea which later brought the great school into being.

The place is too large and many-sided to be searched and known in a few days. But one feature was too evident to escape our notice—the air of respectful, self-respecting manhood and womanhood, as we met the students on the campus or in the halls and shops. And we very much hope that Aery's words are confirmed in the experience and observations of many outsiders:—

"To-day many thousands of people are coming to realize for the first time the wisdom of General Armstrong's doctrine that 'selected Negro youth' should be so trained that they would 'go out and teach and lead their people'; that these prospective leaders should not be given 'a dollar that they could earn for themselves'; that they should 'teach respect for labor'; 'replace stupid drudgery with skilled hands'; that they should 'build up an industrial system for the sake, not only of self-support and intelligent labor, but also for the sake of character.'"

Yet we could but feel there was something sadly significant in the assurance we received that only two of the hundred or more instructors at the Institute were from the South. The Southern whites do not seem to be back of the movement. And we found when we went elsewhere in Virginia that there is a fear that at Hampton the Negroes are being educated out of their "proper place." The Southern people are feeling the loss, as we do here, of dependable, submissive house-servants and field hands; and somehow they connect this condition with the importance to which the colored people are raised by the effort at Hampton to give them a broader outlook on life, and increased vision of their possibilities. This brings up the whole, great question of the elevation of the Negro which is too large to be discussed here.

One longs, however, to ask a few questions:—Is it well for the white race to develop its powers of mind and body, and not well for the black race to do the same? May there be anything selfish on the part of the whites in wishing to keep the blacks always in a subordinate position? And lastly, because the Negroes have certain racial faults is this a reason that they should not be helped to overcome them? The call of a former age was especially to sinners. Why is it not the call of the present?

(To be concluded.)

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

FRIENDS' RELIEF WORK AND ORPHANAGES.

RAS-EL-METN, Syria, Twelfth Month 6, 1921.

MARY E. HOPKINS:—Dear Friend: Thy letter of Twelfth Month has come to hand, and I want to thank you and the class of Sharpless children who kindly sent their contributions to Wm. B. Harvey to be sent on to us here. So far nothing has arrived here. But as the children may be interested in what we are trying to do here I will try to give you some idea of our work, and the need of the people here which is still acute and urgent. Our work is largely among children, young women, and widows, and very old women. Our boys and girls in the Orphanages are without friends in the world, without homes, and apart from us, without anyone to care for them. Perhaps your children can hardly take in what it means to be fatherless, homeless, penniless, and friendless. All because of the cruel, cruel war and the famine and pestilence it produced. How many homes, yes, thousands and thousands of homes in this country are falling into ruins because the happy families who once inhabited them are all gone. Most of them are dead and the odd ones who escaped are either in orphanages, or begging, or if old enough they may have managed to have emigrated to some other country as deck passengers. For little ones the story is too sad to go much into detail. It is our work to teach people to laugh, and to see that when all is lost, irrevocably lost, we must still go on and make the best of things. As long as God remains—as long as it is possible to be good, and true, and pure—it is still possible to be happy. It is easier for young folks to learn this lesson than for those who are older. But it is really wonderful how much remains that can make us happy.

The mountains with their unfailing message of comfort and strength, the birds, the flowers, the sunshine and the stars, and the Man who walked on the hills in Galilee, who sat by the lake, who sailed over its waters—still lives, and walks beside those who are bearing heavy burdens, or who have suffered and lost, and His strength is made perfect in weakness. So we are trying to catch "the broken threads" in many lives of young and old, and it is not easy work, but there is satisfaction in it.

Thou may have seen my letters to THE FRIEND, if they got through, about the Armenian Refugees. We have about 60 of them here, and we are hoping to be able to bring others up from Beyrout.

The other day we had a young Armenian doctor for a few days staying with us. He was nearly killed twelve years ago and I was instrumental in saving his life. I had not seen him for eleven years. He had been through the Balkan Wars, and more recently through the World War as a doctor on the Turkish side, of course by compulsion, not by choice. His story might be taken from the "Arabian Nights", so wonderful and so full of adventure and escapes. But among his near relatives, including his father, he had lost twenty-seven by massacre and famine, and when I spoke to him about love, and that only love and forgiveness could wipe out the evil of the past, he seemed like one amazed that such a thing could be expected of him. But we talked long and earnestly, and while it still seemed to him almost impossible to love or forgive the Turks, yet he had a different conception from what he ever had before of the meaning of the Sermon on the Mount, and He exclaimed, "If I stay long here you will change all my opinions. It seems all my opinions are wrong."

Last year, 1921, Hajeme, a town in the north of Armenia, with a population of 10,000, was wiped out by the Turks, and only 375 managed to fight their way out. We have some of those here and what a story they have to tell.

Shaar, another village with about three hundred, was wiped out by the Turks; only eight young men fought their way out. Of these seven were killed, only one remained. He is here. What a story he tells. There is nothing like it in any novel. He hid five days in the mountains without food and then managed to escape to Adana. All his family and relatives, including his wife and boy, were killed, but need I go on? It is the same tale of tragedy upon tragedy, too terrible to be realized by those who are not in direct contact with it. That is the fruit of war and hatred. We have got to retrieve the situation by teaching men to love and to forgive, and to be reconciled. There is no other way possible under Heaven. We can help in this lesson, when love and sympathy are practical by relieving the suffering, by feeding the hungry, and by giving clothes to those in rags. Then it is easier for them to believe there is still love somewhere in this poor, storm-tossed world.

All the Armenians who have come here were so desperate that they had no clothes to change into, and they were dirty and in rags and many of them covered with vermin. How could it be otherwise? First we got hot water and all had a bath. Four boxes of second-hand clothes had recently arrived from America, and the contents of these were sufficient to provide all with clothes. I wonder if those who sent garments realized how useful they were going to be and how much comfort and blessing they brought to the outcasts from home and country. If they did know they would be satisfied indeed.

We are grateful to thee and the young folks for remembering far off Syria. I am afraid a great many of our friends have forgotten us. We are so far away, and constant pressure of doing the work leaves little time except late at night to write about it.

Please give the young folks our sincere thanks. We are in great financial difficulties and every cent helps to feed and clothe the Syrians and Armenians who are in the direst need. Second-hand clothing in good condition is most welcome and of much use. All our stock is about used up. Children's clothes, women's and men's clothes of every kind and description are needed and if sent to Mary H. Whitson, Fifteenth and Cherry Streets, Philadelphia, they will be sent on to us. Every garment should have a tag on addressed:

Daniel Oliver's Work, Syria.

This will ensure that none will be lost but that in time we'll receive them.

Please give our love and good wishes to the many dear friends in your neighborhood, who remembered us, and with cordial greetings to thyself.

Sincerely thy friend,

DANIEL OLIVER.

This is my message to your class:—

"Be strong!

We are not here to play, to dream, to drift;

We have hard work to do, and loads to lift;

Shun not the struggle,—face it; 'tis God's gift.

Be strong!

It matters not how deep entrenched the wrong,

How hard the battle goes, the day how long;

Faint not,—fight on! To-morrow comes the song."

SERVICE COMMITTEE ASKS FOR $3500 TO FEED DESTITUTE CHILDREN IN WEST VIRGINIA.

It is estimated that approximately 28,000 families of the miners in West Virginia have been dependent upon charity for the last year. Averaging three children to the family the total number of children thus made dependent is 75,000. During this time these families have only sustained life by existing upon the meager ration of food, amounting to $3 a week, which the union relief committees have supplied. This is enough to prevent actual starvation, but there is an increasing amount of undernourishment among the children, who are forced to live upon a very limited supply of beans, cornmeal, flour and, occasionally, bacon. The children have practically no milk. Some of the families were living on two meals a day and some are reported as having no food on hand for the next day.

This is the gist of the report which has moved the Service Committee to ask for $3500 with which to undertake the feeding of 2000 of the neediest of these children for a period of two months. The report was made by Drew Pearson and Walter H. Abell, after they personally investigated for a week the living conditions among the miners' families in West Virginia.

There is no doubt but what there is an industrial war being carried on between the miners and the operators in the coal fields, but for this the children are in no way responsible. The merits of the case of either side need not be discussed when the need of innocent children is so appalling. These children were living in small two-room huts, and mostly in small communities away from educational and social advantages and upon a mere subsistence which is wrecking their physical strength and so will take its toll upon their mental strength. They are little children, such as ours, in dire need.

The Friends who made the investigation have recommended that the first step which the Committee should make in relieving this distress, is in the feeding of 2000 of the neediest of these children. They have estimated that one meal a day, consisting of oatmeal, milk and cocoa, for these 2000 children, for two months, would cost approximately $3500. The Executive Committee, to whom they made their report, decided, at its meeting on Fourth Month 20th, to accept these recommendations and to appeal for funds to carry out this project. The plan is for Drew Pearson and Walter Abell with possibly one or two helpers to organize committees among the miners' families to operate kitchens in small communities to which the children may come and receive the supplementary meal.

The plan will be comparable in a small degree to the one which is being used in feeding the children of Germany.

Has not Elizabeth Barrett Browning spoken the words for this time?

"For the young, young children, O my brothers,

They are crying bitterly.

They are crying in the playtime of the others,
In the land of the free!"

The need for feeding these destitute children is not a question of the rights of either side in this industrial war, even as the feeding of German children is not a question of the rights of either side in international war. The story of the pitiful need of little children has come to us and their cries and their suffering cannot be stilled by our saying that the side to which their fathers belong in the industrial conflict is either wrong or right. We know the emphasis that Jesus placed upon the value of good-will and mercy as being the strongest force of life to heal bitterness and conflict; and is it too much to believe that Jesus' way of helping those in need cannot heal the bitterness even in this form of conflict?

POLISH SCHOOL-GIRLS CARE FOR RUSSIAN ORPHANS.

"They are poor little orphans who cannot speak Polish, so we must see that they have an especially good Christmas."

This was the view taken of an Orphan Asylum of White Russian children by Polish school-girls in Warsaw. This is one of the by-products of the Friends' Relief Mission work during the past two years, and in a country where national feeling is so strong as in Poland it is doubly significant.

The peasants from the district which is now Poland are pouring back from Russia at the rate of from fifty to sixty thousand a month. During the great war some seven years ago their villages were devastated and they were carried far into the interior of Russia. They are now returning. Large numbers of them die on the way from cold, hunger and disease, and thousands of children are thus left orphans. Although they live in a territory which is now under the Polish Government, most of these peasants are White Russians, and speak only Russian.

Some of the girls in a Secondary School in Warsaw learning of the work which the Society of Friends was doing for these unfortunate refugees, asked if there was any way in which they could help. An assembly was called, and was addressed by two members of the Friends' organization. It was decided that the girls would make long shirts and underwear as part of their domestic science work. The smaller girls made overalls for the children. The Friends supplied the material and distributed the goods later. About 280 new garments were made by the girls in this first school.

Another school heard of it, and asked also for a little lecture about the refugees. After this lecture they decided to make 200 flannellette dresses for the children.

A third school received some grey flannel from the Friends and made 250 women's nightgowns of a kind which are being used by the refugee women alternately as night-gowns and house dresses, since they are in many cases the only whole garment of any warmth.

A mathematics school came forward to make 150 warm clothes for children, and now there are seven schools making 1,500 pillow-cases and sheets for hospitals and outposts.

Not only did the movement grow, but it began to deepen in interest. The first school formed a permanent Committee, and asked to be put in touch with orphans whom they might help. They were allotted an Orphanage at Kobryn. A sister of one of the girls had been a nurse there, and had just died of typhus, and this naturally added to the sympathy which the school felt for the orphans. Four big boxes of food and three sacks of clothes have been sent there for distribution up to the present.

Other schools also began to form permanent committees to care for Orphanages. When the Orphanages are located in Warsaw the girls take them toys and colored picture books, as well as the more necessary food and clothing. It was in this connection that the spirit arose regarding the "poor little children who could not talk Polish" and who therefore must have an especially good Christmas because they were strangers in a strange city.

ALL grim and soiled and brown with tan,
I saw a strong one, in his wrath,
Smiting the godless shrines of man
Along his path.

"I looked: aside the dust-cloud rolled—
The Waster seemed the Builder too;
Uprising from the ruined old
I saw the new.

"'Twas! but the ruin of the bad—
The wasting of the wrong and ill;
Whate'er of good the old time had
Is living still.

"God works in all things; all obey
His first propulsion from the night;
Wake thou and watch! The world is grey
With morning light!"

GANDHI AGAIN.

Following what has recently appeared in THE FRIEND we believe the subjoined statement to be reliable. A correspondent writes—The date of Gandhi's arrest had become known to the public and notice was given that no lady missionaries should go into the Indian city next day. Elaborate precautions had been taken; European officials out on tour had been recalled to headquarters; and all missionaries out in the districts had also been brought in. The Scotch Mission here has at present no isolated district missionaries, but quite a number of Americans belonging to the Methodist Episcopal Mission have been brought into Nagpur.

At the mere rumor of Gandhi's arrest, in 1919, there had been fierce rioting and murders in the north, which had led up to the Amritsar tragedy. In those days his influence was far less than it is now, and his name hardly known at all amongst the poorer and more ignorant sections of the population. So there was considerable reason for fearing serious disturbances as a consequence of his arrest on this occasion, even though there have been indications of late that his programme of non-violence is becoming distasteful to the more extreme nationalists.

As far as can be learned at present, the arrest has been received throughout India without any demonstration or violence.

The grief of the people at the arrest is very real. But one and all whom I have asked about the reason for the quiet way in which it has been received, give the same answer. The absence of disorder is due to Gandhi's repeated commands that if he should be arrested there should be no hostile demonstrations of any kind. He repeated these orders very emphatically as he was being carried off to jail, and so far the whole of India has obeyed them—a most extraordinary instance of discipline and self-control, and a real triumph of the Kingdom of God.

IN ONE LIFETIME.

[At the suggestion of Martha H. Bishop we publish the following, taken from the New York Continental for last Third Month. The Proposition in Robert Barclay's Apology on the Scriptures continues a satisfactory exposition of Quaker doctrine on the place and value of the sacred writings. Placed in more modern form one would do well to review the chapter on the same subject in "A Reasonable Faith," published forty years ago, already out of print, but found in many public and private libraries.—Eds.]

John P. Peters' new volume of Bross Lectures attracts attention by reason of its opening declarations as well as by reason of its later conclusions. He is an archaeologist of note and has been recognized as always sympathetic with any theory which promises advance. He speaks of himself as having taken his turn at most of the more radical theories about the Bible and its origins and he is far from abandoning many of those positions.

He notes, however, that a marked change has occurred in his own lifetime at certain interesting points. "When I began to study ancient history, ancient meant a period about 500 B. C. Practically there was nothing known before that date." This meant that the Old Testament was considered in informed circles to contain little or no reliable history, since most of it purported to come from earlier periods. In the same way, in Dr. Peters' first experiences, "every tradition of date or authority of Bible books came under suspicion." The New Testament as a whole was assigned to the second century after Christ or later. The Pauline authorship of almost all the epistles was denied and Paul's originality at all points was cast aside. Scholars persisted that the decalogue postdated Moses by centuries; Jesus was not born in Bethlehem; it was open to doubt whether he was born at all—everybody was having free sway with the Biblical documents.

Into this atmosphere of Biblical study Dr. Peters came as a youth, and what he found current in critical thought seemed to him well justified by scientific methods of investigation. Nor has anything happened since to make him doubt those methods. They are legitimate, and any changes that have occurred have come not through abandoning them, but through more rigid application of them. The counter-irritant to critical study is a better critical study. New and contributing methods have emerged, to be sure. Dr. Peters is himself a devotee of the spade, as everybody knows who has heard his name at all, but a spade is a critical instrument and its results are apt to be rigidly scientific.

But in the lifetime of this one man a great change of opinion has occurred. The extreme conclusions of his youthful days are so modified that they seem as impossible now as they seemed necessary then. "The children having grown older are feeling differently about the knowledge and the traditions of the fathers, and in Bible study there is at the present moment a strong current, almost threatening to become a flood, toward the rehabilitation of older views." He declares that "leading critical scholars have reaffirmed the older views of date and authorship of the gospels, Acts and the epistles almost unchanged," while in the Old Testament "critical views of composition, authorship and date of books and documents, which had come to be accepted by most modern scholars as final, are being rudely questioned." "By means of the Bible, studied with its traditions, plus the spade, we are now restoring the very ancient history in a rather wonderful way."

These strong statements of a critical scholar will meet three different responses. Some readers will leap upon them with joy, finding confirmation of the wholesale error of all that differs from the traditional faith. The author, however, warns his readers against that conclusion. The change has come about through no surrender on anybody's part, but solely by the consistent application of the very same principles on which destructive conclusions were formerly reached. New facts have emerged, new ways of surveying the documents have developed, and if the familiar old conclusions are approximated again it is by a wholly new route and on wholly different grounds. It will be a misuse of Dr. Peters' conclusions to take them as admitting the overthrow of critical methods.

Another group will denounce these conclusions as unauthorized, since they themselves still refuse to accept them, adhering to destructive dogmas still. It is as difficult for some scholars to change their minds as for some common men. There is a scholarly pride of consistency as well as a street pride in it. Some scholars will merely say, "We notice with regret that Dr. Peters has become reactionary; it is too bad, but such things will happen." They will be as much confused in their judgment as the conservative enthusiasts.

Most thoughtful men, however, will accept the story of this one lifetime on its real value, finding in it reason for calmness in the midst of disturbing currents of opinion, a rebuke of their own anxiety or over-enthusiasm at mere newness, and an undergirding of their assurance of truth and of the validity of honest methods of searching for it. They will bid Goodspeed to scholarship and will fear nothing for faith because of it.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FOURTH MONTH 21, 1922.

DEAR FRIEND:—

There will be anxious to correct a misstatement appearing in the issue for Third Month 23rd, page 451, dealing with statistics of church membership in the years 1916 and 1921. The statement reads: "Practically all of the major religious faiths have made a gain, except the Unitarians (who show a loss of some 30,000 as compared with the 1916 figures)." This statement is due to an estimate made by the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America and was no doubt published by them in good faith and by The Outlook from which it was quoted in THE FRIEND, but that the estimate is due to a misunderstanding of figures is made clear in The Christian Register for Second Month 23rd. Apparently instead of a loss the Unitarian churches made an increase in membership in the five years of 20,000 persons or about 25 per cent.

HENRY J. CADBURY.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

OUR Friend, Henry J. Cadbury's name is included prominently among the contributors to the second volume of Part I of the important work, "The Beginnings of Christianity" (Macmillan & Co., publishers), of which Dr. F. J. Foakes Jackson and Dr. Kirsopp Lake are the editors.

H. W. PEET.

THE Bulletin of Friends' Historical Society, Philadelphia states: "The New Emphasis in Quakerism" is a pamphlet of fourteen pages by Alfred C. Garrett, issued by the Representative Meeting of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. It is an examination of the effect on Quakerism of the war and post-war problems. The new emphasis is found to be upon the love of God in the heart, impelling to good works.

THE cloak worn by Stephen Grellet during his travels in the ministry has been given by a descendant to the American Friends' Service Committee to be sent to the sufferers in Russia.

THIS notice appeared in The Quaker which came to the Editor's table a few days ago:—

"With this issue, The Quaker discontinues publication. It wishes to extend warm appreciation to those who have worked so signally for its growth and given it the power to maintain purity of ideal. Unexpired subscriptions will be refunded in due course, and all unpublished manuscripts returned.—THE EDITORS."

We shall miss the fortnightly visits of this sheet. The feeling is an honest one that the ground is well covered by the papers of its class already in the field. The Quaker during the two years it has been published has printed some matter of unusual interest to Friends and some of a real historical value. It is hoped that those who have contributed to its pages will offer what they may have in the future to the Friends' weeklies, THE FRIEND receiving its share.

THIS interesting item which appeared recently in a Philadelphia daily may have escaped some of our readers:—

"It wasn't much more than a year ago that Rear Admiral McCully, of the United States Navy, arrived from the Near East with his seven adopted Russian youngsters. In the interval the melting-pot has been at work, and to-day, thanks to their training at the Friends' School in Washington, all seven are promising specimens of '100 per cent. Americans.' The rudiments of English have been conquered and the pastimes and habits of American children absorbed as if the exiled youngsters had never known any other upbringing. The brood, three boys and four girls, are not allowed to forget their native land. A Russian governess accompanied them to the United States, and she sees to it that their mother tongue and the soil of their parentage and birth are properly venerated."

THE American Friends' Service Committee desires publicity on the following item:—

Openings are offered by it to young Friends interested in home service: five positions in Federal and State prisons to work and study methods of treating prisoners; places for teachers and assistants in girls' and boys' reform schools; places for teachers in Negro schools to study racial problems; places in social settlements and in other social work; places for prepared students in foreign fields. For study of industrial conditions students may enter textile mills, the garment trade, mines and other industries. Swarthmore's students are already doing social service work in the schools in connection with the White-Williams Foundation of Philadelphia.

TEN THOUSAND copies of the German translation of "Friends and War" have been produced by the Quaker centre in Berlin. One man in Upper Silesia has asked for two thousand copies to distribute among members of his Society and a minister has requested that he be allowed to advertise it in his church paper and quaintly adds that he fears "it may be too irksome for Friends to fulfil the request."

THE famous Mountmellick School has been closed. The Friend (London) in commenting on the circumstances states: "Founded in 1786, a few years after Ackworth and a few years prior to Westtown, the School has occupied for 135 years an important place in the life of the Society of Friends in Ireland. The Quarterly Meeting placed on record its sense of the faithful and self-denying service rendered by succeeding generations of Friends, as members of the Committee, of the staff, or otherwise, in devoting their efforts, often in times of difficulty, to the successful working of the School. The Committee in charge of the Quarterly Meeting Education Fund is entrusted with the proceeds of the sale of the School premises and of sundry investments, to be applied for the education of the children of Friends of Leinster Province."

THE Survey of recent date is responsible for the following item:—

Among the political prisoners still held in one of the United States Federal prisons is "William M. Hicks, a grandson of Elias Hicks." "He with others are held for the expression of opinions deemed by the court to hinder the prosecution of the war."

THE Friends' Historical Society of Philadelphia has come into possession of the original patent to Benjamin Duffield for 250 acres in Bucks County, Pa., from Thomas Penn, Eighth Month 9, 1733. It was presented to the Society by William T. Elkinton from the papers of his father, Joseph S. Elkinton.

WOOLMAN SUMMER SCHOOL.

AN IMPORTANT OPPORTUNITY FOR EASTERN YOUNG FRIENDS.

Arrangements are under way to enlarge the scope of the summer term at Woolman School. It seems an opportune time, since there is no important gathering for young Friends east of the Alleghenies this summer, except possibly a conference of New England young Friends. Neither the Haverford nor George School summer school comes this summer. The Earham Young Friends' Conference, the Friends' General Conference and the Five Years' Meeting are all to be held in the Middle West.

The regular six weeks' term is to be held Sixth Month 27th to Eighth Month 5th. There will be five regular courses, three hours a week: The Life of Christ and Quakerism, by Elbert Russell; The Poetry of the Old Testament, by Elizabeth W. Collins; An Outline of Social Work, by Elizabeth Wood; and Success in Religious Education, by Morris E. Fergusson.

The school wishes to provide for those who might attend a conference or summer school for a few days, but who are only free week-ends or for a few days' vacation. The success of the week-end class the fall term suggested the way. There will be five special week-end programs, Sixth-day to First-day evenings, each week-end program complete in itself, and yet arranged so that those who attend all five will get some consecutive work. Among the features planned are lectures by prominent speakers on timely topics, such as the labor and industrial questions, international and race relations, foreign missions and political prisoners.

A class for First-day school teachers and a story-telling hour on Seventh-days, and a Bible Class by Dr. Russell and a young Friends' Vesper Conference on First-days are other features.

The managers of Swarthmore College have kindly put the college buildings at our disposal, as far as we need them. For the social advantage of having all together it is proposed to feed all the visitors at Woolman House, if possible, and to house those who cannot be accommodated in Woolman House in some of the Swarthmore College cottages. Means of recreation, such as tennis, croquet, boating and bathing will be available. Fuller announcements will be made shortly.

NOTICE.

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING to be held at Media, Pa., on the 9th will convene on daylight saving time; the meeting of Ministers and Elders will convene on the afternoon of the 8th on daylight saving time also.

A WELL-INSTRUCTED SCRIBE.

There lies before me a tiny leather-bound volume, printed in 1802 and bearing the mark of the seventeenth edition. If it had appeared for the first in these present days, with a title devised by some editor or compiler, it might have been called A Little Book of Great Thoughts, or some such unrevealing name. Not so does Hugh Turford, the author of this ancient little book, designate his work. He goes straight to his purpose; namely, to set forth "the grounds of a holy life;" and the quaint title-page of the first part goes on to explain that the way thus shown is that by which many heathens have become Christians and sinners may become saints,—and this too without much preaching. Such an introduction was calculated to awaken interest at least; and the theme was so well justified in the treatment, the work so plainly suited to a need, that the interest in it was by no means transient. It is not surprising that the book had cordial reception in the Society of Friends (and, we may hope, a useful place elsewhere) from its first publication in 1702, on into the next century.

Inquiry recently on the part of some Friends who were at the Westtown Farmhouse, resulted in bringing to light a copy of this precious little book, the existence of which, in a particular collection belonging to the School, had escaped the memory of the Librarian. The interest which led to inquiry in the matter had been aroused by reading Rufus M. Jones's description and estimate of the work, given in "The Later Periods of Quakerism." In this account it is shown that Hugh Turford's book passed through many editions after that of 1802, and into several European languages. It is therefore reasonable to conclude that there must be more than a few copies of it extant, even though the work is now comparatively little known. The Friends' Library in Philadelphia is fortunate in having at least one copy.

Now in what way is the book so remarkable? Or what should give it a claim to particular notice in these times? It is indeed, as Rufus M. Jones says, "a worthy contribution to mystical literature;" but its distinguishing qualities are not easily described in a way that is both brief and adequate. From its title—if we view that thoughtfully—we might expect a two-fold treatment, and such we shall find. This, whatever aspect of the subject is considered, is clear, strong and candid, bespeaking both conviction and experience on the part of the writer. We may, to be sure, feel that part of the address "To the Reader" might have been spared, and that certain terms or phrases in the book are not quite according to our choice; yet it must be allowed that the work as a whole contains a portrayal of Christianity good for all time and for "all sorts and conditions of men."

What, in Hugh Turford's view, is a holy life? Not that of the recluse in particular, nor of the merely contemplative "saint." It is not studied austerity that he recommends, but heavenly-mindedness, and a Christian self-denial that would join hands with benevolence and justice and sincerity. Mystic though we account him, we see that he has regard to an ethical social outcome of soul-experiences. He lays much emphasis upon "doing as we would be done unto," and sets forth the requirements of the Christian religion in terms that are not ambiguous, and that leave no shelter for pride or deceit or covetousness. Such holy living is not founded in theories and formal observances, but in love and obedience to "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus,"—a transforming, illuminating Power, working in human hearts. "There were in the creation," he remarks significantly, "good men, faithful men, self-denying men, when there were no preachers nor books that we read of; and who was their teacher but the eternal Spirit? What guide had they but the light of righteousness in their own hearts?" Yet that some men may be commissioned to plant and some to water, Hugh Turford does not deny;—else why his own book?

A short digression at this point brings to view a little matter of interest. In a long doctrinal letter written in 1819 by John Barclay, there occurs this observation:—"There is one Friend's book only, that I know, wherein the term 'conscience' for 'Light in the conscience' has crept in; it is Turford's 'Grounds of a Holy Life.' But there or elsewhere it is not considered by us orthodox, or at least we understand by the former expression, the latter." This last clause is not remarkable for clarity, but we may believe that both Hugh Turford and John Barclay intended to distinguish between things natural and things spiritual. It does not appear what edition of Turford's book John Barclay had read; but in that of 1802 I have not found any evidence of confusion of thought on the point referred to above, and one can hardly think there was any such confusion in Hugh Turford's mind, even if somewhere or somehow an inaccurate use of a term had "crept in."

All in all, there are in this treasure things new and old; new because living and forceful, old because fundamental, and true "from the beginning." It is not suitable here to draw upon it for many characteristic sayings, but the following may be accepted as indicative of its spirit and content:—

"If we have truth in our hearts, equity will be performed by our hands."

"A Christian is not known by his words or his devotion [only]; but by his works, his nature, his life, and his conversation."

"Where a right spirit rules, every member of the body is under a limit."

"Men or angels could not give better advice . . . than Paul gave to the Galatians when he exhorted them to 'walk in the Spirit'; for if we are not guided by a right spirit, we can never lead a righteous life."

Finally, this excellent testimony declares that by living under the Divine government we shall be qualified to perform "every Christian duty; we shall love the Lord our God with all our hearts, and our neighbors as ourselves; which is the sum of all godliness, and the true character of Christianity."

BEFORE AND AFTER.

Our annual assembly came to us this year, bringing with it a more than usual feeling of responsibility as matters of world-wide importance have placed before us the "Open Door" and revealed the startling fact that, unworthy as we are, the Great Ruler of Events has seen meet to use us in the economy of His own gracious work. With such thoughts uppermost in mind, the gathering on Seventh-day was characterized with deep inward waiting and intercession which seemed to gather into a oneness of spiritual travail, under which most weighty considerations were placed before us, and it seemed to be our place to be dipped as we have scarcely ever before been dipped into a humble and weighty concern of two of our dear absent members to visit again, in the love of the everlasting Gospel, the isles afar. The "whole burnt offering" thus laid upon the Lord's altar, and before us, for renewed loving service, had a baptizing and cementing effect upon the Meeting; and in unity and harmony a fitting testimonial was issued, thus making the living concern a part of our own measure of life, reminding us that "They that water shall be watered." It is the feeling of the writer that this baptizing concern had much to do in favoring us with the love and life that followed it, under which covering we looked forward to the sittings of love and service which were to follow.

As the Meeting gathered on Second-day morning in the large joint session, the feeling of love and life which characterized and crowned the Meeting of Ministers and Elders was carried over to this waiting assembly, and so with much dignity and weightiness the labors of the Representative Meeting were placed before the Meeting, impressing us with the faithfulness of that body in its truly representative work. In its scope and variety this work had largely increased, and hence the most pertinent and solemn query arises, whether we are giving proper place and prominence to the fundamental thought that although the Meeting is a business meeting, it yet should be one in which "a waiting, spiritual worship" and the anointed ministry growing out of it should still have its place—reminding us of the words so dear to our spiritual life—"Friends, hold all your meetings in the Power of God." If the love and the life are to be the measure of our faith in a wisdom that is better than our own and transcends all purely intellectual effort, that love and that life must be owned and recognized, as Christ is still to be our Supreme Leader in all our words and works. We recognize this and so we wait and so we pray, but is there not a feeling growing up in our midst that the pressure of expediency is still to be reckoned with? Since way was opened in these columns for expression on these important matters, these thoughts have been pressing for utterance, and so they are offered.

A few weeks ago a very clear reference to the Discipline of the "Five Years' Meeting" appeared in these columns. I read it with care, as I had previously read the original from cover to cover, hoping to find an explanation for the difference between the practice as I have witnessed it and the fitting expression of Christian doctrine as it is to be found in the pages alluded to. In that work I found but little with which I could not unite. I have also read and re-read the many comforting and adequate expressions of Christian doctrine as they have found their several places in our own Discipline, and I turn with gratitude to the fitting words introducing to us the precious heritage from other days of life and favor, which we would do well often to read and ponder—"So may we be living members of the Church militant on earth; and inhabitants of that city that hath foundations, whose maker and builder the Lord is, knowing indeed with exceeding joy that great is He, the Holy One of Israel in the midst of Her."

Changes have been properly called for at times and have been made; the Spirit of the work has not been mutilated and so a harmony has been preserved, yet now an expression of alarm and warning may not be out of place, as other changes are being called for in order to harmonize our discipline with our practice. The very evident feeling of resend interest between ourselves and our brethren and sisters of the Five Years' Meetings would be much strengthened, if, on our part as well as theirs, we would earnestly and prayerfully seek "a way of life" in harmony with the fitting expression alluded to. A stronger bond of unity would bless a humble endeavor to hold aloft the "banner given us to display because of the Truth" as we have seen it, and which remains to-day the reason for our separate existence in the family of Christian believers.

Let us see to it that our practice may yet more and more harmonize with our high profession, and may our hearts grow together in a love for "a waiting, spiritual worship and a ministry of life, love and service growing out of it."

WESTTOWN, Pa., Fourth Month 23, 1922.

BETWEEN THE YORK AND THE JAMES.

ANN SHARPLESS.

WILLIAMSBURG, "THE MOST FAMOUS VILLAGE IN THE UNITED STATES," AND JAMESTOWN, "THE BIRTHPLACE OF ENGLISH-SPEAKING PEOPLE IN AMERICA."

To go from Hampton to Williamsburg was a two hours' transit from the teeming present to the restful but vocal past. Nowhere else that I have been has the flavor of antiquity been so well preserved as in Williamsburg. Not only do the old buildings remain, but the people there keep well the veneration for the old scenes, and the knowledge of old traditions which make the past live again. To be sure, we came to Williamsburg Station over the Chesapeake and Ohio R. R., and left it for our lodgings in an automobile; but as the keeper of our boarding-house jokingly remarked, "We are neither steam-het nor electric-lit." We slept on a four-post bedstead, having a "sacking-bottom" and a feather bed, in a room heated by a chunk stove; antiques confronted us on all sides, and our curiosity was added to that of hundreds of others by writings on the tiny window-panes, especially by this baffling inscription—"1796, Nov. 23, O fatal day!"

This boarding-house, the "Audrey," was built in 1710. It looked out on the "Palace Green," the "Palace" having been the Governor's residence at the north end of the long, narrow lot. Williamsburg, you remember, was the capital of Virginia from 1600 to 1779 and a very grand house was put up for this personal representative of the king. The "Palace" is gone now, and its site is hidden from view by a public school building, very commanding and substantial, but distressingly modern and out-of-place,—so said the old families of the town and we concurred. Gone, too, are the lines of Scotch lindens which originally shaded the two sides of the Green, and school-boys are tramping out the grass.

At the opposite end of the lot is a monument to the Confederate dead. We became quite accustomed to the manifestations of Southern loyalty to their heroes of the Civil War, and they were not obnoxious to us who looked at the sad struggle from a different view-point. Their tributes were so affectionate, and sincere, and may I say, religious. It did seem a little odd to find when we reached Richmond inscribed on Jefferson Davis's tombstone, "Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

But to return to the plan of the city of Williamsburg. Its two or three thousand residents are grouped, not too closely, along the short mile of the Duke of Gloucester Street, and its lesser avenues, many of whose names suggest British leanings and connections, such as England, Scotland, Ireland, Prince, Queen Streets.

The Duke of Gloucester Street is especially interesting because of its ninety feet of width, and its historic buildings. At its west end stands William and Mary College, and at the other used to stand the old House of Burgesses, where Patrick Henry opposed the Stamp Act, shouting out "Cæsar had his Brutus," and the rest of the passage school-boys used to love. Fires appear to have been very destructive in these parts, and the famous Capitol has been twice thus destroyed; only the foundation walls and a stone monument are now left. Two relics, however, are found at the Richmond Capitol, a very upright, high-backed chair whereon sat Peyton Randolph as speaker, when the Patrick Henry fireworks went off, and a very remarkable, towering stove, or "warming machine," which, perhaps, kept the burgesses outwardly glowing.

William and Mary College we had supposed was closed, or comparatively unimportant now, but we found there a company of eight hundred young men and women, and that it had a still larger student body in its extension course. The college has had three destructive fires, but has been rebuilt each time on the old foundations. Designed by Sir Christopher Wren, it reminded one of old Westtown. It seemed forgiving in the Virginians who suffered so much from the hostilities of the savages in the earliest days to have here, connected with the College at the Brafferton Building, the first permanent Indian School in America, established in 1723. It is not so used now.

Williamsburgers are very proud of their "Bruton Parish Church, Oldest Church in Constant Use in America." The first building was put up some time between 1632 and 1665. Hither came in fine array, on First-day mornings, along the Duke of Gloucester Street, the F. F. V.'s of the various decades, the Governors, members of the House of Burgesses, Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, the Randolphs and the Lees. And here came, too, the boys from the college, who were put up in the south gallery and looked in by the sexton. Patrick Henry's name carved on a railing suggests how some of them improved the shining hour.

A most important feature of our Williamsburg visit, however, is yet to be mentioned. It was this that gave us a very personal interest in the ancient town, and opened to us many of her secrets otherwise closed. It was nothing less than another dear old Westtown student—the "old" relates to Westtown—who was living in the Peyton Randolph house, with its great brass knocker, its wings and its hall running crosswise. A Northerner by birth, and education, she had the Southern arts of hospitality. Were strolling visitors ever more kindly entertained and transported! Even we ourselves seemed in process of being "reduced to complete friendliness by the Southern examples all about us" and by this one in particular. We feasted at her board, meeting there her interesting family and cultured townspeople; her husband most kindly lent himself to our enjoyment, and we traveled hither and thither over the town, seeing things, under their escort. We went down to the York River, so that we might contrast that beautiful blue stream with the yellow James, passing on the way through what had been a DuPont's war-time settlement of some twelve thousand men. At the time of our ride the houses and pipes etc., were being pulled down, dug up, and gotten rid of in order that the spot might regain its quiet, natural appearance—a striking evidence of how war wastes our resources.

And last to be related, our friends took us to Jamestown! That had been a dream of ours, but it had passed away. We were told at Hampton by a resident of Williamsburg that we could not get to Jamestown because of the mud. The spicy author of "We Discover the Old Dominion," who had accomplished that feat in an automobile, had given us vivid pictures of adventures in Virginia mud, and that at a later season of the year. So when our friends told us on the day of our arrival that we were to go to Jamestown on the morrow, we were truly surprised and delighted.

A grey day, and we were motoring past the College, past the Professors' houses, through the pine woods, across the open farm lands and by the salt marshes toward a ruined tower on an island in the James River. Seven miles they said, and we were to go and come and see the sights in four hours—a well-laid scheme, but the mud had something to say. Part of the road was sandy and part was clayey, and the clay had dried enough to be stiff. Yet in course of time before us rolled the noble river, miles across, while near its left bank lay the little island perhaps three miles long and one wide. It was connected with the mainland by a causeway, though formerly there had been a narrow isthmus. But the tides had washed that away, and were likely to do the same to the whole island, when the United States Government put up a strong sea-wall which effectually protects the place. The spot, however, where the first settlers landed is now buried under the yellow waters, while a lone cypress tree out in the current marks former earthy surroundings.

The Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities has done thorough work in these parts, and it is largely owing to them that so many relics remain. But the reminders of the past are not very numerous at Jamestown, and it takes a little knowledge of early history and a lively imagination to bring before one's mind the coming of the three ships in the spring of 1607, the log cabins and the fort, the erection of one church building after another to repair the waste of fire, the old State House when Jamestown was the capital of the colony, and the various miseries caused by famine, pestilence, sword and arbitrary governors—a gloomy and disheartening record. But here was the birth of the nation, and the Virginians point out with State pride that notwithstanding all the handicaps here was "the first church, the first wharf, the first glass factory, the first windmill, the first iron works, the first silk worms reared, the first wheat and tobacco raised, the first peaches grown, the first brick house, the first State House, and the first free school" in the English Colonies. A very readable and reliable book, "House-boating on Colonial Waterways," by Frank and Cortelle Hutchinson, published by L. C. Page & Co., puts these old times vividly before us.

Of course the old church tower with its three-foot walls, and its loop-holes which suggest another use than for worship, and the surrounding gravestones, are the centre of interest. But the foundations of the State House and other buildings dating back to 1664 or '5, and now protected by cement, the whole neatly enclosed, will be suggestive. Then there is a fine statue of John Smith and a towering monument put up by the Government.

Jamestown grew to be no great mart, the site was not wisely chosen; but Virginia was founded there, and we owe a great debt to her ideals and her men.

THE Christian does not use wordy prayer by his mouth; having learned to ask of the Lord what is requisite. In every place, therefore, not ostensibly and visibly to the multitude, he will pray. But while engaged in walking, in conversation, while in silence, while engaged in reading and in works according to reason, he in every mood prays. If he but form the thought in the secret chamber of his soul and call on the Father "with unspoken groanings," He is near and is at his side, while yet speaking.—CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA.

WE have been requested to print the following—a favorite poem of our late friend Joseph Elkinton, and often referred to by him.—EDS.

THE SILENCES OF LIFE.

The purple flushing of the western sky,
The stately progress of the sun toward even;
The holy hush that brings God's presence nigh;
The dusky woods in which the cooling shadows lie
When birds are still and nature to repose
Sinks quietly down; dews falling on the rose;
Mountains sublime in distance looming high;
The hand-shake given when sorrow is too deep for words;
The smile of friends when love surpasses speech;
Ah! the silences of life are mightier far
And higher lessons teach than all our noisy clamor.
Let us reap the bliss of those who keep themselves from strife.

—FREDERICK E. SNOW.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

LOYD GEORGE is said to regard his plan to get the nations to undertake no aggressive attack upon one another for a period of years to be the crux of the conference, after getting Russia in line and thus British trade restored.

Premier Facta of Italy, who was made permanent Chairman, said in part, "There are no longer enemies and friends, there are neither victors nor vanquished. There are only men of one nation and another who wish to unite all their energies to reach together a very noble end. We must first re-establish peaceful relations between the nations, that they may co-ordinate their national energies, which have been entirely destroyed by the war. . . . At Washington we saw the dark cloud of the Pacific vanish. At Genoa we must work for the peace of Europe."

THIS is the greatest gathering of European nations which has ever assembled on this continent, said Lloyd George at Genoa, and . . . the results of the Conference will be far-reaching in their effects, either for better or for worse, upon the destiny not merely of Europe, but of the whole world. . . .

What is the first need of Europe?—peace, a real peace. We propose to study the currency. Good. We propose to examine the question of exchange. That is also good. We propose to discuss transport and credit. That is also good. But unless peace is established and good-will among nations, all these discussions will be of no avail.

TEACHERS OPPOSE MILITARY TRAINING.—A nation-wide campaign against military training for High School boys has been started in Chicago by the headquarters of the American Federation of Teachers, for the following reasons:—

1. Because not even Germany deemed it advisable to maintain military training for school boys in time of peace.
2. Because military training is not an adequate substitute for physical training.
3. Because militarism should be discouraged, not encouraged.—World Friendship, Fourth Month, 1922.

A DOCTRINE THAT NEEDS KILLING.—Statesmen talk about fait accompli, or a thing done. They seem to believe in the doctrine that when once a thing has been done, nobody has any right to question them about it.

Thus a nation grabs either territory or rights belonging to another and weaker nation. If the other nations of the world can register their protest and prevent the actual accomplishment of the grab, well and good; but if they come too late, the thing is a fait accompli, and the grabber sits back in triumph and holds on to his spoils.

International morality is still rudimentary, you see.

How our thieves would rejoice if the doctrine of fait accompli were to be applied in society! The robber would rob and stoutly assert, with the gravity of a statesman, that the robbery was a fait accompli, and nobody had any right to question him.

This doctrine is from beneath. It is sure to land the world in new wars. It is time the Washington conference, or the League of Nations, or some other influential body dragged this abominable doctrine into the light of day and then buried it out of sight forever, so that nations might be charged with robbery and punished as well as individuals.—From The Christian Endeavor World.

A LECTURERS' Conference on Public Opinion and World Peace has been called by the International Lyceum and Chautauqua Association, of which Paul M. Pearson of Swarthmore is President, to be held at Chicago on the 13th, 14th and 15th of next Ninth Month. President Harding and other eminent speakers have promised to give addresses. The great work for world peace that can be done by the hundreds of lecturers who will be in attendance and who speak to literally millions of people in the course of the year can scarcely be estimated.

THE cost of our navy for the year (ending Sixth Month 30, 1922), according to Congressman Kelley, of the House Committee on Appropriations, was, in even numbers, $413,000,000. This includes the regular annual appropriation, deficiency and special acts. It is well to keep this figure in mind while Congress is making its appropriations for 1923, as it is natural to expect that the agreements of the Washington Conference will at once be reflected in our naval expenses, if the other nations involved are to be impressed with our good faith in the matter.

THE three European women who are speaking in this country under the auspices of Jane Addams's "Women's International League for Peace and Freedom" are to address a meeting at Fifteenth and Race Streets, Philadelphia, on the evening of Fifth Month 18th, at 7:30 o'clock, under the care of the Peace Committees of the two branches of Philadelphia Friends. The general topic is "Mutual Understanding Between Nations," to be presented by Annot Robinson of England, Thérèse Pottecher of France and Gertrud Baer of Germany, all of whom speak English well. All persons desiring to cultivate kindly feelings among the nations are earnestly invited to be present.

To the conscientious Friend, taking part in war is sin in God's sight; and sin to him is spiritual suicide.

In common with thousands of other earnest souls in all nations, Friends are looking forward with confidence to the coming of a time when international good-will and international justice will control in the relations of the nations to such an extent that an appeal to military force by a nation will be as much of a reproach to the nation taking such a step as is now the reproach which comes to a man who challenges to mortal combat in a duel a fellow-man who may have injured or insulted him. Even more than this, they look forward with confidence to the coming of a time when reproach will also come to a nation that meets a challenge of armed forces by mobilizing other armed forces, even as now he who accepts a challenge to mortal combat shares in the reproach visited upon him who makes it.

And as stating principles upon which the Friends believe reliance may surely be placed as the individual soul attempts to steer its course aright in this most troubled time, note these two, which if followed in the spirit of Christ and accompanied by the power which God is able to supply, Friends believe will lead into a life of the greatest service to humanity, viz.:—

1. Love and brotherly kindness and the actions which flow from them are more powerful in this world even as it is now, than fear and distrust and all like emotions and motives which physical force in any form can inspire.
2. Unless there are some who dare act now as all must act when the vision of righteousness seen by the few comes to be acknowledged as the truth by all—unless some can be found to do this, all possibility of our nation's rising to greater moral and spiritual heights forever disappears.

And if those who regard their visions of a better future as the greatest things they know, as ideals which must determine human actions even now before the ideals have come to realization—if such are told that dreams like these unfit them for the duties of the present world in which we live, let them remember as a sufficient answer these lines which express something of the hope, the consecration, the confidence and the abiding faith of the Friends:—

“Dreamers of dreams! We take the taunt with gladness,
Knowing that God, beyond the years you see,
Hath wrought the dreams that count with you for madness,
Into the substance of the life to be.”

ALLEN D. HOLE (1917).

REPRESENTATIVE MEETING.

The writer in a recent number of THE FRIEND who remarked on the small percentage of attendance at the Representative Meeting, will be gratified to learn that at its session on Fourth Month 21st, forty-eight members were present; all of the six recent appointees of the Yearly Meeting were in attendance.

Naturally, the business referred by the Yearly Meeting to its Representative body was taken up first; an important item was that in relation to suggested changes in the wording of the Fifth Query. There was a long and very serious discussion in regard to the manner of approach; there was some difference of opinion, some Friends urging that the query should continue to testify against certain harmful amusements, while others thought that it should more fully express our positive testimony as to the right use of leisure time in amusements and recreations, keeping in mind the importance of building up the spiritual life. It was felt that an influence on community called for an upholding of high standards.

It is expected that there will be a further consideration of this important subject at the Sixth Month meeting.

The matter referred by the Yearly Meeting jointly to the Representative Meeting and the Social Order Committee was placed in charge of a committee for its consideration, to report to a later session.

The Yearly Meeting Committee to visit subordinate meetings, with authority to appoint meetings, etc., was nominated by the Extension Committee as directed. The fifty-three names submitted, taken from our seven Quarterly Meetings, were now approved by the meeting; this action completes this important appointment, which it is hoped will give encouragement and strength, particularly to our smaller meetings.

There was expressed a desire that more of our younger members might be added to the Committee on Visitation. This matter was referred back to the Extension Committee for its care.

It was felt that there had been so much business which was expected to be transacted in the five days of Yearly Meeting week, that there was a sense of crowding out of a proper spiritual atmosphere; a Committee was appointed to take the whole subject of Yearly Meeting procedure under review, with the hope that undue pressure may be relieved in the future.

The session, which was long, was one of a rather unusual degree of expression of deep religious concern.

PRAYER is, to speak boldly, converse with God. Though whispering, consequently, and not opening the lips, we speak in silence, yet we cry inwardly. For God hears continually all inward converse. The complete Christian prays throughout his whole life, endeavoring by prayer to have fellowship with God. And briefly, having reached to this, he leaves behind him all that is of no service, as having now received the perfection of the man that acts by love.—CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA.

FOUR WEEKS' EXPERIENCE IN THE BRYN MAWR SUMMER SCHOOL FOR LABOR.

[The following is taken from an article in the Bryn Mawr Bulletin by Louise Brownell Saunders, describing the unique Summer School held at Bryn Mawr last summer. It whets one's appetite to hear more of this interesting experiment which has already attracted wide attention. We are indebted to Anna Cope Evans for the extracts.—Eds.]

My dearest ambition in 1893 undergraduate days was at some time to teach at Bryn Mawr. I saw friend after friend win the heights, while my own lines fell elsewhere, in another college, in a school, in years of parenthood and of teaching of every sort that is not collegiate, and the Bryn Mawr dream died away. So when an offer came to me to teach English, my own old subject, this summer, to girls of college age and in Bryn Mawr, my heart jumped. I was already engaged in other work for Sixth Month, so that to accept the whole offer of two months of teaching was impossible, but Bryn Mawr was kind and arranged for me to come for the second month of the school only. When I found that my newly-leased Sophomore daughter Silvia could make herself useful, too, and that my husband would be welcome with contributions of music and talks on his hobby, astronomy, we planned our summer about the school as a centre, and Seventh Month 15th saw me entering upon that earliest of my ambitions, meeting a class of my own in Bryn Mawr. It has proved one of the most extraordinary experiences of my life.

There were eighty-two students, all told, ten of these being “leaders in industry,” the rest rank and file. Four of them had “begun work” before they were twelve; the immense majority were at work by the time they were sixteen; only eleven of them had been in school after this age.

I found my task difficult and exciting in the highest degree. The class, with its calm, clear gaze that looked you through, suspicious, sensitive, challenging, armed with absolute candor when you failed to satisfy them, was the most stimulating labor I have ever met. As one of their “leaders” said, at our labor conference, “We’ve been duped so many times,” they are filled with a profound untrustfulness. Their coming had cost them so much. Though all held $200 scholarships, many of them had used their savings for railroad fare. Many had forfeited their jobs (oh, the risk in this year of unemployment!) to be absent for two months. One dark-eyed girl told me she had given up for those months sending her usual contribution to her family on the edge of Russia—“call that a sacrifice,” she said. Having made renouncements like these to come to Bryn Mawr, they cared almost terribly as to what they got, and were determined to get it or know why they failed to.

Nothing could be “put over,” no statement might be made unless they were ready to back it to the limit; all the acquired tricks of “effective” teaching of “private” classes, all dogmatic assurance, all glossiness, all bluffing dropped away of themselves, and you were left stripped of the equipment with which experience usually arms the teacher. You were left with just one thing between you and the class—absolute honesty on both sides. You had to be ready to have any statement questioned, any idea challenged, to give time unlimited to discussion, to questions, to opposing claims.

I heard more than one of the Summer School teaching staff say that they had been spoiled forever for ordinary college classes. All other teaching seems tame in comparison to teaching a group who care like this. A teacher cut his class, one day; the office was promptly mobbed to see when the lost hour might be made up. Does that sound like one of our college cuts?

My students were not satisfied with the material I had taken on, fatuously accounting myself fairly well prepared. Poetic language was of itself difficult for them; so were literary allusions. I came to using both poetry and prose as close as I could find to the language of every day.

Many of my students bought the forty-cent “Golden Treasures” we ordered into the Co-operative Bookstore; but the note of the actual present was what reached them most immediately. Even here, the subject matter they naturally took to was the all-embracing lovingness of a Hauptmann or a Whitman. Masfield's passionate personal quest of Beauty struck them as "selfish." Their class-consciousness, the religion of the unions, makes them impatient of anything narrowly individual. They want to learn, but they want to learn as fellow-workers in one class, not to move out of that class. "We want our teachers to realize," said one, "that we are workers, and shall remain so." They were an eternal lesson to me in their constant thought of others of their group, especially of others weaker, worse off, than themselves. And I think Whitman's vision of the true democracy, of the world-America—the America, literally, of all-the-nations, expressed to them more completely than did anything else we read together the ideal thought of man.

They also came to me with special demands. "May we have something of American literature?" they said—the spokesman of a large group was a Roumanian—"Our friends say to us, 'We know our own literature, Russian, Polish; what are the Americans doing, what have they written?'" I could not refuse a petition so utterly reasonable, so I set to work. But only those, who, like me, were of Les Jeunes of the nineties, know how much work is needed to fill the abysses of our ignorance concerning the product of the "American mind."

Or some of the students would ask for lists of books—of modern plays "worth reading;" in one case, of "books suitable for my little nephews between nine and thirteen, who have to live in so bad a part of Chicago." They are my sister's children; she has seven; my brother-in-law is a horse-shoer and for his profession has to live in a dreadful district; I want to give the children at least the right books."

One of them had brought Plato's Republic to ask to have certain passages explained, "which had bothered" her. "We Russians want to get from America," said one, "her system of education and her inventions; perhaps we could give her in exchange our enthusiasm for ideas."

Aside from their actual knowledge there was an immediacy to their experience that made one's own seem thin, artificial, tinkling. "Did you do nothing but sew labels on shirts for nine hours a day for five years?" I overheard one girl say to another. "How did you stand it?" "Well, I knew if I quit working I'd quit eating, and I never just saw my way clear to getting out of it," was the reply. That consciousness of having nothing but one's hold on a job between oneself and hunger—what a sharp edge it gives to life!

Have I made you see how preciously worth while those four weeks seemed? The girls themselves thought them worth while. When I looked for some of them to say good-bye on our last morning, I was told, "They've gone off into the woods to cry." Several of them left us, saying they were going to save and save for the coming year to pay for a scholarship for themselves for next summer, "if the school goes on;" others, still more characteristically, said good-bye; they should not try to come back at once, "not till lots of other girls have had a turn;" they intended to save and earn for that.

For my part, watching them go, with their affectionate assurances of what the weeks had taught them, I felt a certainty that no other four weeks had ever taught so much to me.

I came away from Bryn Mawr in Eighth Month a different person from the one who had gone there in Seventh Month. It is hard to describe just how different; I'm not sure that I altogether realize it myself. I know only that my reading has shifted into a new field of interests; my thinking looks further forward in hope for man and for what he will accomplish; I believe in a better possible life for him in the world than I did before, and I want more than anything to help it come, and to have our children help it come.

Indeed, the effect of this experience this summer is bound to be even deeper on my daughter Silvia than it is on me. And that brings me to my last plea for interest from you, fellow-alumne, in the new Summer School—my conviction of what it will mean to our beloved Bryn Mawr. If we can link it up with the present college life—with what the girls of this summer always called "the winter school;" if instead of a single Sophomore, a whole group of undergraduates could take part another summer in the school and experience something of what we did, I cannot think of anything, literally, not of anything, that would so add to the quality of the education that Bryn Mawr would be able to offer. Those younger girls, the new generation, would sense far more finely and rapidly than ever could I, the new thing that the Summer School represents—the possibility of knowledge made common to all, knowledge of books, ideas, thoughts, to be sure, but still more a knowledge of Man. It is a branch of knowledge in which America's lack of traditions is an actual advantage to her; the new venture can be made, the new friendship grasped with so much less hesitation than would be possible elsewhere. And if other Bryn Mawr graduates might, like Silvia, begin to count among their intimates gallant and shining spirits in this group that hitherto they have never had chance or time to meet, there seems no setting bounds to the vision they and these new friends might get in common—the vision of the Good Life made possible for all.

Wouldn't that do more than any other single thing that one can think of to accomplish the object of education—starting our children on the way to serving the future, setting their feet, to use Wells' beautiful phrase, on the Highroad That Goes On?

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

KIM'S SINS FLY OVER THE CHIP TOPS. (Retold from Everyland)—Such a strange name for a story! Even when we find that "Kim" lives in Korea, and that there a "Chip" means a house we do not understand it. For Korea is one of the places we have not known much about. But the Everyland magazine is trying to introduce us to the boys and girls in all parts of the world, so that we shall learn to think of them together, and as one great family—all the children of our Heavenly Father.

To know about poor little "Kim" and how he came to be so loaded down with "sins" we will have to understand the strange customs of the Korean New Year. You know we sometimes think the New Year is a time to "turn over a new leaf," as we say, to make a fresh start, and resolve to do better than we have done.

But the poor Koreans, with somewhat the same idea of doing better, believe in a bad old spirit called "Angwangi," who comes fluttering down from the upper air on New Year's Eve, bringing all sorts of sickness and evil with him. They put their shoes out at the doors of their houses and with them a sieve, for, strange to say, the sieve, they think, will keep the evil spirit from giving them his bad gifts. But poor little Kim had forgotten the sieve on the last New Year's day, and so the evil spirit had left the small-pox as a gift inside his shoes. And his father and mother had died of it, and little Kosiki, his sister, had her small yellow face all pitted with it. And they were so poor! Only one meal a day. Rice on the best days; and on other days the queerest roots and berries boiled up for dinner. But besides being poor, there were all Kim's sins. Or, to be exact, because of being poor. For Kim had gathered up these sins in the hope of making money. And that brings us to another strange custom of Korea.

At New Year's time the people who feel that they want to get rid of their sins, make what they call a "Cheyong," which is a straw image, and deep inside its body they hide a paper on which an account of their sins is written out, and put a few pieces of money beside it. Then when a poor beggar comes along, and calls to them, "Have you a cheyong?" he gets the image with the pieces of money inside, but (as they believe), he also carries away the sins.

So now we see how Kim got so many. The sins of "Butcher Big Bones" and "Weaver Whitegoods" and many more, and as the months of the New Year went by, the poor little fellow felt bowed down by them. And he grew thin and miserable-looking, and "as croos as two sticks." Something must be done. So he took the seven slips of paper that had been inside the seven "Cheyongs" and carried them to a certain Korean scholar in the town, to know the worst about himself. But when the wise man had read the whole list, he said to poor Kim, "I think it would be desirable for you to withdraw your presence from my honorable door, for who knows what evil influence you may sprinkle into the air." And he hustled the poor little fellow out into the street. He was not much of a comfort.

Next Kim tried the "mu-tang," or witch, who lived at the edge of the town, and she said it was not so hard to lose sins—"had he tried sinking them in a well, on a moonlight night, with a grain of rice for each sin?" How many sins had he?

Kim began counting them off on his fingers, but had only got as far as ten, when she too bade him to "Begone! Begone!", before he brought evil to her.

Just a week before the New Year came again, Kosiki, Kim's little sister, made the great suggestion. Rather timidly she made it, for you know girls are not of much account in Korea. Why not make a kite out of the papers with the list of sins, and let it fly away with them?

The very thing! Kim was much too poor to buy a kite, but he patched one up from bits of wood, and made its sides of the papers on which the sins were written, and one more on which he bribed a scholar to write for him: "These are the sins of me, Kim, thirteen years old, who lives in the end chip on the street of the Nine Green Ducklings."

At midnight Kim tip-toed out into the courtyard and carefully sent up his kite. Up and up and up it went until the string was wrenched clear out of Kim's hands. "They're gone," he muttered, "All gone!"

But what do you think? The very next morning in walked a strange man, and under his arm he carried—Kim's kite!

"Go away! go away!" gasped poor Kim. "I've lost those sins once. Take them away!"

"See here," said the visitor cheerfully, "I bring you good news. For this is no way to lose sins! About midnight I heard them come clattering down against my window-pane, and since there was an address on the kite, I hurried right over this morning to tell you that there's a God who forgives sins."

"Do tell!" gasped Kosiki.

"Do tell!" echoed Kim. "Actually a god who does that? Whatever can be his name? And where is his shrine? I'd do anything . . . go anywhere . . ."

"Men call Him 'The Friend of Sinners,' and you needn't go on any pilgrimage, my boy, for He's right here inside this chip with you—"

Kosiki looked, and Kim looked. But there was no idol to be seen anywhere. So the strange gentleman sat down and began inquiring in the most always-have-known-each-other-fashion about Kim's sins; weren't there a good many of them?

There were, Kim acknowledged, and talked for half an hour. After which the stranger talked for half an hour. Then Kim handled the stranger's Bible with grateful fingers. Marvellous! And Kosiki handled it—lovingly. Oh, too good to be true! To think of there being a Book specially for sinners, and a God who sent men all the long way from Mi-guk (America) to Korea to win sinners. Even sinners as far gone as Kim!

"Would you condescend to read once more those dearily precious words that speak straight to my heart?" asked Kim. So the missionary "condescended." And I think you will be glad to know that every single promise in that Bible verse has come true in Kim's life, because he accepted the sinner's God—

"Who forgiveth all thine iniquities;" (Not another sin did Kim ever float over the chip tops!)

"Who healeth all thy diseases;" (Ah, yes, in our mission hospital, you know).

"Who redeemeth thy life from destruction;" (No more dread of Angwangi, no more sieves or fires at sundown on New Year's Eve!)

"Who crowneth thee with loving-kindness and tender mercies;" (For didn't Kim go to our mission boarding school?)

"Who satisfieth thy mouth with good things;" (And didn't they nourish his starved little body?)

"So that thy youth is renewed like the eagle's."

And this boy is just one of ten thousand poor sinners all over Korea who want what Kim wanted—a Safe and a Happy New Year!

AMUSEMENTS—SAFE OR QUESTIONABLE.

At a recent session of the Representative Meeting, while the revision of the Fifth Query in the Philadelphia Book of Discipline, concerning the question of recreations and amusements was under discussion, the following extract from the London General Epistle for 1893 was read by the Chairman, George M. Warner:—

Fifty years ago, conformity to the spirit of the world showed itself among us chiefly in a too earnest devotion to the pursuits of business. While this is still a danger to many, there is a danger from an opposite quarter to which we feel it our duty to direct the attention of our members. We allude to the risk which they run of the dissipation of spiritual energy by an undue absorption in recreations and amusements. That neither the mind nor the soul shall be kept always on the stretch is one of the great laws of spiritual health; and we believe that we are doing our Father's will when we partake, at the right time and in the right way, of the enjoyments which He has placed within our reach. But we must all in our inmost hearts acknowledge that while there are recreations which are pure and elevating, which leave the soul fresh and strong, and ready for renewed communion with its Maker, there are others which either bring us perilously near to the edge of sin, or fail of the true purpose of recreation by leaving us jaded and weary, and which, in a way that it is difficult to explain to others, strike at the Divine life in our souls. The discipline of our Society, which at one time dealt much with the question of amusements, has now practically withdrawn from detailed criticism of this part of our conduct. . . . The responsibility which the Church has thus practically abandoned the individual must not fear to assume. He must faithfully ask himself the question, "Is this or that amusement, which the world calls harmless, really harmless to my own inner life? Does it, or does it not, hinder my communion with God and leave me with any disinclination for prayer, or disinclination for the service of Christ?"

THE ANNUAL WILLIAM PENN LECTURE.

[We regret that the whole of this masterly address cannot be read by all our subscribers through THE FRIEND. It is to be hoped that it will appear in pamphlet form later.—Eds.]

Rufus M. Jones, "an eminent historian of mysticism, a beloved minister in the Society of Friends, the heart and leader of the American Friends' Service Committee," as introduced by the Chairman, spoke, after the opening silence, to the eight hundred people who were meeting in the South Broad Street Theatre, First-day afternoon, Fourth Month 30th, on "Quakerism—A Way of Life." There were Friends present from all the Philadelphia meetings and a good sprinkling of non-Friends. This was the third annual public religious meeting sponsored by the Philadelphia Young Friends' Movement.

"There is no use talking about the Quaker way of life if it is only philanthropy," he said, "only a new theory, a new panacea. We must begin where the Quakers began. Their aim has always been to carry fresh, living springs of power into the lives of men. They have always kept away from dogma, from ceremonialism, from ecclesiasticism, and they have always centred on experience—the experience of God. Quakerism has always been a religion of experience.

"In the Friends' way of life, worship has always had a very great place. We try to make our meetings for worship occasions for meeting God; times when the real presence is felt and known . . . and, in order that the occasion may be rich and valuable, Friends gather in the hush and quiet and sit at first in silence and let God speak to the soul." Several early Friends were quoted attesting the value of silence at the beginning of meeting. "Most people in America to-day are afraid of silence."

"Another thing that is central in the Quaker way of life is the tremendous emphasis that is put upon the voice of God in the soul"—an august thing and worthy to be respected with awe.

"But after all, as the chairman of our meeting this afternoon has said, practice, practice is the great word; practice is the thing that matters." Numerous early Friends said this in clear terms. Many illustrations were given from the present-day Relief Missions of Friends where they are practicing faith in man and in the fatherly love of God, and where they are giving the contributions sent from people all over America who have faith and confidence.

"And finally, it is a central conviction of the Quakers that human persons like us, in our measure, can be revelations of the will and purpose and spirit of God in the world to other people." The meeting closed in silence.

AFTERMATH.

I walked upon the mountain, with heavenly flowers starred,
I lay upon green velvet, so smooth the springing ward,
I watched the white clouds sailing beneath an azure sky
And suddenly I heard music go wailing faintly by.

'Twas not the song of blackbird, of thrush nor singing lark,
But distant, fainter, finer: I could not choose but hark.
'Twas not the sound of breezes that whispered through the trees,
But softer, trainter, purer and sweeter far than these.

I sailed upon the ocean, where waves rolled swift and strong,
The white foam frothed and sparkled and drove the boat along,
The curved sail filled and belied with salt wind fresh and free
And suddenly I heard music, that called aloud to me.

'Twas not the rush of ether, so long and true and thin
That played among the rigging like the tensest violin;
'Twas not the cry of seagull's discordant harmony,
But deeper, truer, tragic, the sound that came to me.

I wandered through the woodland, where light and shadow played
Through silver tree trunks speckled and bluebells in the glade,
I walked in woods at even, where red the sunset glowed
And heard the strains of music, before me on the road.

'Twas not the sound of footsteps, that stirred the grassy steins
And shook the dew from bushes in falling showers of gems,
'Twas not the sound of creatures affrighted in their lair,
But music deep and stirring, that trembled on the air.

I knew the chords as voices that stirred my very soul;
Where'er I walked in darkness, I heard their thunder roll;
Where'er I walked in brightness, they filled the airy day,
Where'er I went through Nature, I could not get away.

I heard that sound at even; I heard its call at morn,
I hear it in the moonlight; it rustles through the corn.
I hear it on the mountain, I hear it in my bed;
The pean of the fallen and the children's cry for bread!

WEST VIRGINIA—A FIELD FOR FRIENDS.

There was once a missionary who went into a certain coal camp in West Virginia. He was a simple, devout man, devoted to his work. His church in this particular mining camp was a long railroad car, one end of which, with its benches, held his congregation, the other end was fitted up as kitchen and bedroom for his family. He had performed missionary work all over the United States with tremendous success.

But when he first arrived in this particular camp he made one mistake. He asked the coal mine owners to instal gas and electricity and water in his car. Immediately the entire camp of coal miners became suspicious. The company had befriended him; therefore he was a friend, a tool, of the company's; and therefore he was no friend of theirs. And they never got over this, and his work was greatly hampered because they looked upon him with suspicion.

However, in spite of this, he did a great work. For the children were not suspicious, and his wife taught the girls to sew, and he taught the boys to use tools. Neither the girls nor their mothers knew how to sew. But the girls were anxious to learn, and begged to work almost every minute.

This missionary found that the miners' wives not only did not know how to sew, but did not know how to cook. They lived literally with a can-opener. They spent their husbands' wages the very day they earned them. When their husbands had plenty of work they lived high, when there was no work at the mines they starved. With these women and with their husbands the missionary accomplished almost nothing. The men would stand out on their front porches and shoot off their revolvers one after another, on down the line, just for amusement. And when I visited the camp, a bunch of youngsters amused themselves by throwing rocks at the company windows. They were really no worse than any other boys; but instead of taking out their surplus energy on football, the only thing they could think of was to break company windows.

Eleven other missionaries were sent to neighboring camps. They were secretly financed by the mine operators. The miners suspected this and would have nothing to do with them.

That is the really fundamental problem in West Virginia—the problem which is behind the starvation conditions and the martial law and the semi-civil war. The greatest need in West Virginia is education. But the miners are suspicious of education, of anything which comes from the outside world, unless they are sure that it comes from a friendly source. And they will continue to be suspicious. They are native-born and have lived in these mountains for a hundred years.

And right here is where we Friends have a great field—a field which we alone can fill. We are about to undertake relief work in West Virginia. We are undertaking this work in the face of severe opposition, in the face of the fact that we know we shall be criticized. But we are undertaking it because we believe that women and children should not suffer whether their husbands and parents happen to be coal miners or Germans or Bolsheviks. In undertaking this work we shall drive an entering wedge—we shall gain the confidence of these mountaineers. And once having gained their confidence, how great the opportunities for service!

FAITH is power toward salvation and energy toward eternal life.

That deepest assent by which we live is faith.

Now faith is the ear of the soul.

Faith is the visual faculty of the soul.

Faith is the foundation of the august knowledge of the truth. Faith must not be inert and alone, but accompanied with investigations.

Faith, if it is the voluntary assent of the soul, is still the doer of good things, the foundation of right conduct.—CLEM-ENT OF ALEXANDRIA.

THE BALTIMORE CONFERENCE.

The two hundredth and fiftieth anniversary of the "setting up" of Baltimore Yearly Meeting was duly celebrated from the fourth to the seventh inst., as advertised in THE FRIEND a few weeks ago.

It has been impossible to prepare for the issue of this week a review of the interesting programme offered during these four days, but we expect to give next week an account of the various features, and, as opportunity offers, we hope to publish many of the papers and addresses presented at the different sessions.

In the scope of the plan of the conference, the admirable working out of the details of a very diversified programme, in the wide range of representation from the Yearly Meetings and in the courtesy and unstinted hospitality extended by Baltimore Friends to the strangers within their gates, we believe no gathering of Friends in the history of the Society in America has equalled this.

When the time came for our departure on First-day afternoon, our leave-taking was a fair repetition of that farewell under the oaks on the shore of West River two hundred and fifty years ago, the occasion which had been the real drawing chord that had brought us together. Of this, however, we will write a week hence.

We trust that the occasion may prove to be one of historical interest and importance, a date to which, in the future, we shall revert, as one that marked the beginning of a clearer understanding of the problems that confront the Society today, and a deepening of our faith in the possibility, that under the Master's ordering and in His time, our work for Him shall be more constructive, more far-reaching, and all-embracing, and hence more potential for good than it has been in the recent past.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING.—Philadelphia was the earliest of the Fifth Month Quarterly Meetings, holding its sittings on the first and second of the month. In the gathering of Ministers and Elders on Second-day, besides the usual routine business, there was only one item of general interest. Haverford Monthly Meeting proposed that Rayner W. Kelsey be acknowledged a Minister of the Gospel, which was unconditionally approved. Some Friends were interested to learn what may not have been generally known before, that he had been recognized as a Minister in another Yearly Meeting before he took up work as a professor of history at Haverford College, and became a member of this Yearly Meeting.

In the Quarterly Meeting on Third-day after an impressive hour of worship, the meeting was engaged in the consideration of various questions, chiefly those suggested by the minutes of the late Yearly Meeting. Several members of the "Visitation Committee" were in attendance and received a cordial welcome.

The subject of "Birthright Membership" came up for consideration, but did not take deep hold on the meeting. A casual visitor would infer that the general feeling was in favor of the existing disciplinary provisions.

A proposition from the Philadelphia Federation of Churches that Friends of the city meetings co-operate with them in an effort for the uplift of the community aroused deep interest. All felt that there was a great work to be done. In the area south of Girard Avenue and east of Broad Street there is an enormous "unchurched" community. In the discussion which followed, the statement was made if we understood aright that only two families of Friends continued to reside in that area. Some divergence of views appeared to prevail. Many Friends felt that we were already doing as much as could reasonably be expected,—others that while the organizations already existing received such scant support, it would be useless for us to enter into other engagements. The subject will receive further consideration.

While these and other matters occupied the attention of the meeting, one mind at least, wandered into fields quite remote from what the Clerks were recording. The 453 adult male members of the Quarterly Meeting were represented by a scant 60, and the 511 adult females by a scant 100. A similar or even lower proportion will attend all the meetings for discipline throughout the year. The query naturally arises—Why do not more of our members attend these gatherings, and add their voices and influence and sympathy in the conduct of the affairs of the Society?

ABINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING was held on the afternoon of Fifth Month 4th in Germantown. A number of the Yearly Meeting Visitation Committee were present, a welcome to these friends was voiced by the Clerk, and others who spoke of being thankful for the presence among us both of those who gave to us their messages vocally and those who were the silent burden-bearers.

"What do we more than others?" were the words which first broke the time of silent worship, followed by an earnest appeal that we should not be satisfied by what we have known of God, but that, for love of Him, we should give more love, more strength, more time, more time especially to come nearer to Him. May we not then be sure that more and more opportunity will open to us and we will always be doing increasingly that which is to His honor.

Wm. Bishop spoke more at length on "They that are whole have no need of a Physician, but they that are sick"—and—"I am not sent save to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Are we of those who are well? or sick? was his query. He compared the attitudes of men's minds in Christ's day to those of today, and said the Church is the successor of the chosen. Many men are still calling on the name of the Lord, but recognize Him not! He came with a new covenant; it is each individual who believes and sees Him, who becomes a part of the church, and who comes to Him who has the power to keep and to save from sin. Christ brought a loving invitation—no promise that man shall be saved and go on in sin. We lack vision to see that we belong to God. Our existence is for Him and He ordains us to receive His power—to go forth and tell of His love—to be successors to the disciples who received Him. It is for each to answer for himself, the Lord came to save the lost.

This subject of the individual was taken up by the next speaker. God gives to each a separate training, fitting him for the place He has for him to fill. It is not for men to judge one another, but to rejoice in the knowledge of God by being faithful to that He gives to do.

After three vocal prayers the meeting was open for business. First brief but well-chosen selections from the Yearly Meeting Minutes were read, reviving some of the principal exercises of that meeting. In the words of the Clerk, "these manifest a noteworthy drawing together of various bodies of Friends, both on this continent and abroad, with a forthreaching of our own body, not only to Friends but to the great non-Christian world, in a united missionary spirit, not forgetting our own smaller meetings and isolated members. May we pray for consecration and ability to enter these open doors."

"A communication from Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting was [next] read upon the subject of the Philadelphia Federation of Churches, which has suggested that Friends should join in their work for the religious and moral welfare of the city. This meeting expressed itself as favoring the concern, and appointed a committee to join the committee appointed by Philadelphia Meeting in planning such work."

A letter from Margaret Rhoads from Japan was of interest—the first received in response to the letter sent from the late Yearly Meeting to those of its members working in love for others at a distance from their homes.

After the remainder of the business had been transacted supper was served, and in the evening to those who could remain, Lloyd Balderston gave a most unusual and enlightening picture of the Japanese and their life and outstanding characteristics, and the changes coming from their intercourse with the western ideas.

CORRESPONDENCE.

S. S. China, mid-Pacific.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

Having just crossed the line that divides Occident from Orient our thoughts turn back to you whom we have left, and forward to those to whom we go. Not that the 180th meridian makes any difference, for we couldn't see it and we're on the same blue, white-capped ocean we were sailing a few hours ago. But the last day (Third Month 30, 1922) the fact that we now see the sun about seventeen hours ahead of you people back in America instead of after you makes it very real to us that something has happened. We have passed from the far West to the far East—and all in a moment!

So our thoughts go back to you of the west and our hearts are filled with love and thanksgiving. We feel a deep love for you who have loved us, and gratitude for all your kindnesses, taking us into your homes and providing for us. We think of you especially in these days when Philadelphia Yearly Meeting is in progress, and pray that God's hand be present through all the sessions to guide and bless.

Our thoughts leap forward to Japan and the ones we expect to see there shortly, and our hearts are filled again with love and hope as we look forward to a time of service for the Master. We are thinking especially of the Japan Yearly Meeting, too, which is to meet Fourth Month 1st to 4th, while we are still on the ocean. May the same guiding and blessing hand be present there as in Philadelphia.

How small the world is and how infinite the love of God! Here we are in a vast ocean, and you people back in America and those over in Japan seem so close to us—drawn together by the one Hand in spite of the dividing line. And yet we are made sensible that what we know of the tender leadings of that Hand are but a very small part of all His interests and love.

We have been enjoying a rather rough voyage, but have kept fairly comfortable. Our dear little Virginia—now a little over four months—has kept very well, and her broad smiles have kept us cheered up when the rockings of the deep and other discomforts have seemed hard to bear!

God bless you all back across the 180th meridian. Remember us of the Far East.

Lovingly,

MADELINE and HERBERT V. NICHOLSON.

WHY A YOUTH NUMBER?

This Young Friends' Number, it may be observed, is chiefly about the idea of Youth and Youth movements. It may be felt that this is too much; that it is preposterous to have a Young Friends' Number, but for that number to engage itself in the study of Youth is senseless and unendurable egotism.

However, there are some reasons for such a number. First, and most germane, Quakerism is a Youth movement. It was founded by the youthful George Fox leading the other youthful seekers, and the heart of that message belongs to Youth. It is a movement of revolution against falsehood and sham, a movement of daring and adventure. Such a movement can be carried on only by those who have the suppleness of youth and youth's freedom from the thralldom of possessions.

But we hold no brief against older Friends. Indeed, there is no satisfactory definition of an "Older Friend," unless it be that the individual in question desires to be called so.

The distinction between young—and old—Friends is not clearly marked. We are all aware of the difficulties and injustices which arise from the use of the chronological standard which has been arbitrarily chosen in default of a better. It is impossible to divide people spiritually on a chronological basis.

The best available classification of young and old Friends is on the basis of their outlook on life, for this is an index of spiritual age. The person who is looking entirely into the future is youth epitomized, and he who is looking entirely to the past is the culmination of age. But none of us is at either extreme. We are all Januses scattered along the road between. The ratio of our forward looks over our backward glances gives a real measure of our youth. But such a measure is entirely subjective. We must depend on the estimate which each individual makes of himself for the means of classifying him. Thus every one places himself, and the chronological age doesn't matter.

If a man undertakes his life work at eighty, he is young, and if he has accomplished everything and exhausted the sources of pleasure in the world at forty-six, he is old. However, it will naturally occur that most people who are under thirty-five are mostly looking forward, and this is the vindication of the arbitrary standard that happens to have been chosen.

Yet because this is the region at which the flame of youth glows most fiercely, we cannot disregard the other embers all along the line. All Friends are Young Friends so far as the youth element is in them. All are in this degree a part of the Young Friends' Movement, pledged to move the world, and all are each in his degree responsible for that movement.

No one is exempt from us except the one who voluntarily withdraws. The rules of the game of life are arduous, but the ranks are open. If anyone feels that he is a Young Friend, let him enter into fellowship with Young Friends. We need older people who feel that they are what they are: members of the Young Friends' Movement in proportion to the youth that still remains in them.

H. E. Y., JR.

EXTRACTS FROM ADDRESS GIVEN AT JORDANS, 1920.

They were very youthful—that central group at Jerusalem, scarcely a grey head among them. They had followed a youthful Leader, who with splendid trust had committed to these young people the working out of a world-wide revolution, and the establishment of a new order. To us the same Leader offers to-day, with the same generous confidence, a commission scarcely less far-reaching. It is to the young that Christ always turns in any world emergency. Himself the least conventional of Leaders He has no use for those who are in a rut and who fear to strike out new lines of service. Will you help Him to save the world?

We are to-day face to face with the amazing fact, for which there is abundant evidence, that men of many nations are looking wistfully, as if for their last chance of salvation, to our little Society, for light and healing. The fact is utterly humbling; it would be overwhelming but for this, that where God sounds the trumpet call, there the era of the incredible is close at hand. Have we the courage, the devotion, the imagination to take up the challenge?

Jesus was, of course, no Quietist. He led, and still leads, the greatest and most arduous "offensive" in human history. It was in His method He was utterly original. We can never reconcile animosities or adjust social and international misunderstandings by dealing only with external conditions. There is no final solution of our problems which is not in terms of personal understanding and reconciliation.

This deeper work is pre-eminently that to which Friends are called. When you have secured their full rights for all, you have not solved the great human problem. It is to the heart we Friends must appeal; our service must be first and foremost spiritual and prophetic. It is for us to testify to the real presence of God in life, and above all so to live that we shall in some measure reveal a living God to those around us. We are to interpret religion to them in terms of love and friendship, for the real cry of the human heart is not for higher wages, but for a God whom it can understand and love, the same God who is seeking to express Himself in the lives of the humblest of His children.

Social and international hatreds and antipathies died out in those who were drawn into His friendship. And only He can reconcile Capital and Labor, and break down the barrier which divides East from West. We are to follow His lead; to make it our ambition not only to act, but to be like Him. We are to cultivate His friendship as our most prized possession. We all know the effect of close companionship. By some mysterious process we become moulded more and more into the semblance of our friend. It was when Jesus was praying, as Luke tells us, that the fashion of His countenance was altered, and He shone with Divine radiance. We, too, as we behold with unveiled face the glory of the Lord are to be changed into the same image.

Therefore, first give your own selves to the Lord, and then attack with confidence the problems of the day.

WILLIAM LITTLEBOY.

QUAKERISM.

Occasionally the Society of Friends is called upon to explain its foundation beliefs so as to be readily understood by strangers. Rufus M. Jones gave just such an explanation on the afternoon of Fourth Month 30th, under the auspices of the Friends' Advancement Committee.

It was indeed a beautiful day outside and everyone of the thousand in the audience paid a compliment to the speaker and his subject by being present indoors. Dr. Jones well repaid attendance.

Quoting the "gloomy dean" of St. Paul's, he referred to those who considered this life as one long, dismal conjugation of the verb to eat—both passive and active. Such a view was not shared by the speaker. He granted that too much of life was consecrated to materialism—especially are we in America given to speedy living, refreshing ourselves spiritually on superficial half-truths. It is imperative that we forsake "the characteristics of the river Platte which is one thousand miles long, two miles wide and four inches deep," rather must we recover that "sense of eternity in the midst of time, that faith in the invisible."

Quakerism as a guide-post to such spiritual prosperity is no mere theory, no new panacea—its task is difficult, namely, to "carry fresh living springs of power into the lives of men." Quakerism is the religion of experience. It was this religion of experience that George Fox rediscovered, calling men to that real internal religion that is founded on God. "There is one, Jesus Christ, who can speak to thy condition."

The second cardinal point made clear was the Quaker manner of worship. How is it that so much stress is laid on the method of silence? Surely, to allow an occasion for meeting God, a time of real presence, not merely a pause between past commonplaces and future commonplaces. Dr. Jones was favored with one of his happiest similes when he likened the pause of meeting to the period when a ship rests bound in a lock, a time of apparent inactivity, but a time when the vessel is slowly lifted up to proceed on a higher level, a better plane.

The emphasis that Friends place upon a tender conscience was enlarged upon as the third distinctive fact of Quaker belief. One often stumbles upon one's conscience much as the little boy who "discovered something inside himself that he couldn't do what he wanted to with." Quakers have always revered the sensitive conscience that reveals God's yes and no; that "great, august ground swell on the soul," which demands much wholesome cultivation.

Finally, the acts of life must bear witness to sound faith. If one cannot act out the fundamentals of one's faith, one has done nothing. Indeed, the remarks of Oliver Cromwell are exceedingly appropriate when he asked the church warden who were the twelve silver saints placed about the church. After an explanation, Cromwell ordered them hauled down, melted up, cast into silver coins and put immediately into circulation. Similarly the Quaker view of life should not be merely theory, vision and faith, but should develop into a sense of a great commission to do something. "Our saints must be put in circulation."

There were several other testimonies touched upon, such as belief in the direct communion with God, faith in man, Friends' interest in redemptive prison administration, and the important testimony against war. In describing our positive views of this important matter, Dr. Jones aptly referred to some of the work carried on in Europe under the auspices of the Friends' Service Committee, of which he is active chairman.

His remarks were concluded by calling attention to the revelations of God through men. "God breaks through in revelation, supremely in Christ, then to those who follow Christ."

YOUNG FRIENDS IN OUR YEARLY MEETING.

The Youth Movement in our Yearly Meeting is the Young Friends' Committee, or rather the Young Friends' Committee is the heart and core of the Youth Movement. It had its beginnings at the Student Conference at Eagles Mere in 1915. The fifteen Young Friends, who attended that Conference, laid a train which led to a meeting held in Philadelphia on Eleventh Month 26, 1915. This meeting is the first one recorded in our Minute Book. The movement seems to have grown from a desire for spiritual fellowship and mutual strength.

Probably a knowledge of the existing organization is more important to us now than a survey of the intervening stages of development or of the concrete things the Committee has sponsored, such as the Westtown Conferences, pilgrimages to country meetings, special meetings for Young Friends at Thanksgiving, Christmas and Yearly Meeting times, vocational conferences for the Students at Westtown, and the sending of delegates to the Young Friends' Conference at Earlham. The Young Friends' Committee, which is its own Executive body, is made up of officers, representatives from local groups, chairmen of standing committees, and members-at-large. All young Friends in the Yearly Meeting have opportunity to vote for the officers, local groups elect their representatives, and a special nominating Committee appoints the chairmen of committees and members-at-large. Each one of these persons is appointed for one year. There may be and are re-appointments, but the Committee is a new committee each year. Frequently it happens that this executive body is composed almost entirely of new members. There must, of course, be a steady normal advance of younger people with the active work and older people out of it.

The fact that it was the Young Friends' Committee that inaugurated the Children's Meeting, held during Yearly Meeting week of this year, has real significance.

As to purpose, our committee could adopt almost word for word the statement of English Young Friends which appears in this issue. Our Committee, too, "exists to act as an advisory and consultative body for local groups—to co-ordinate and help wherever young Friends are attempting to put their Quakerism into practice." One of the phrases of the statement from England comes very near to describing the aim and the achievement, in so far as achievement exists, of our movement. This phrase speaks of the rediscovery of the value of spiritual fellowship. Anyone who has been in close touch with our committee will testify to the value and reality of this experience. Anyone who has been in close touch with our committee, we say, and immediately we come up against the fact that many young Friends lack contacts with the office or with any person actively engaged in the work. Representatives of local groups wonder if they truly represent the group behind them. The organization is loosely bound together, the current strong in mid stream is scarcely a ripple at the far edges. And yet every young Friend in the Yearly Meeting counts. Just as every drop of water counts in lifting the level in the lock, so each of us counts in the effectiveness of our committee.

Perhaps there is a certain similarity between the Young Committee and the meeting for Ministers and Elders. Each is a group of leaders representative of others of like interests and experience. Each is able, as a group, to articulate the needs of the group and of the Society, to speak with a certain authority, which scattered individuals cannot have. Each group seeks for the Society of which it is part, not so much specific results as a deepening of spiritual life.

YOUNG FRIENDS IN THE FIVE YEARS' MEETING.

The Executive Committee of the Young Friends' Board of the Five Years' Meeting has during the five-year period closing this autumn conceived its work as an integral part of the whole Young Friends' Movement. So in responding to the request of the editors of the Young Friends' number of the Friend for a brief account of the Five-Years' Meeting Young Friends' work, I will almost of necessity be expressing the story in terms of the whole movement.

Ten years ago Young Friends were thinking much about leadership by individual Friends, old and young. Today my judgment is that they are thinking less and less of individual leadership and more and more of the leadership—I hesitate to say of God, for that has been said so often when only half meant, and I hesitate to say of the Spirit for that has been dogmatized—but if the reader will take either phrase and meditate on what such leadership would in reality mean, I willingly use either.

A teacher, a social worker and a writer, have recently expressed to me great concern at the cynicism among young people with whom they have contact. If one believes that the elders and trusted leaders of these young people recently and bitterly misled them, one needs no further explanation of the cynicism. I was asked whether I felt Young Friends were cynical and I replied, "No." I do not think that young Friends as a whole are cynical and I think the reason is this. Among them there is in varying degree an independence of human leadership because of a greater dependence on leadership of the Spirit. To the degree that Young Friends do achieve this leadership of the Spirit they are saved from this withering cynicism and tremendous creative energy is freed, energy which I think will be used in the building of a society which Jesus in another day called the Kingdom of Heaven on earth.

My opinion as to the attitude of Young Friends in regard to leadership may explain to a degree why the Young Friends' Board has worked through whatever channel was open to it in various parts of the country instead of promoting any particular organization. It explains the Young Friends' General Conference, which I believe is the greatest contribution which the Young Friends' Board of the Five Years' Meeting has made to the Young Friends' movement. It explains our vocational guidance work, carried on in the schools and colleges, in which we believe that our task is to help young people find what their job is rather than to persuade them to take up a certain line of work. Our co-operation with the Service Committee in getting together Young Friends and opportunities for friendly service in our own country in which a very encouraging start has been made, is being carried on in the same spirit and I think will mean much to Young Friends and to the world they live in.

The formation of a Friends' teachers' fellowship is one of the most important pieces of Young Friends' work which is going on. There are now close to one thousand Friend teachers listed. A committee of their own choosing acts as a sub-committee of the Young Friends' Board Executive Committee. The detail of the work is carried on in the Young Friends' office in Richmond. Another important sub-committee of the Young Friends' Board Executive Committee is the Human Relations Committee, with subdivisions on the social problems of race, industry and farm. Their task is to stimulate thought among the unthinking and to give counsel to the thinking on these vital problems.

What I have said about human leadership and its relation to all our work may fairly raise the question: What is or should be the relation of the more experienced to the less experienced, and the older to the younger? The answer is, "friendship." The Executive Committee of the Young Friends' Board has constantly kept before it the thought, "Every Friend, no matter of what age, should be a friend to some one younger or less experienced than himself." PAUL J. FURNAS.

THE ENGLISH YOUNG FRIENDS' MOVEMENT.

What do we mean by the Young Friends' Movement? What is its scope, its function, its aim? What does it mean for those within it, for the Society of which it is an integral part, for the larger world? It is the purpose of this article to attempt an answer to these difficult questions.

To define a Movement is always difficult. The very word implies flux, change, spirit, rather than anything tangible and therefore easily described. Perhaps the best we can say is that the Young Friends' Movement comprises all those younger members of the Society who feel consciously the privileges and responsibilities of membership, and who have adopted a loose form of organization through which to express the things that they feel and think.

EARLY HISTORY.—To understand the Movement today it is necessary to know something of its history. Roughly speaking, its roots are in what we may call "the modern Quaker Movement." This was the Movement, following the Evangelical revival, which re-discovered many elements in essential Quakerism that had been lost, or at least obscured, during that phase. More than that, the root Quaker conception of the Inward Light was reinforced and amplified by the new knowledge acquired by the Biblical student, the scientist and the psychologist.

BEFORE SWANWICK.—Perhaps the most significant thing in this new Movement was the re-discovery of the value of spiritual fellowship; that is to say, a fellowship shared upon the deepest plane of experience. This spiritual fellowship, so marked a feature of early Quaker history, now became the dominant thing in the life of a group of young Friends whose main purpose was to deepen the spiritual life of small groups here and there, and so to deepen by contagion the life of the Meetings for Worship, the power-house of Quaker activity.

For some years prior to 1911, this work amongst small groups proceeded, but in 1911 the time arrived for the Movement to become self-conscious, and at a large Conference held at Swanwick, the responsibilities of the new life that was flowing were faced, and a National Committee was appointed to hold together and to build up the Movement.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE WAR.—From Swanwick until the outbreak of the war in 1914, the work continued much on the same lines. Little was put in the Movement shop windows, as it were, and the question was often heard "What is the Young Friends' Committee doing?" Nevertheless, the work of increasing the circle of those who had found a new meaning in group fellowship and personal dedication was going on, and only at the distance of years was the effect to be seen. Whatever view may be held as to the faithfulness of Friends to their principles throughout the war period, the pacifist stand of the Society, and in particular of many prominent young Friends, which opened up possibilities of Quaker service in Europe and elsewhere, was in no small degree attributable to the quiet but fundamental work that had been going on in the Young Friends' Movement during the preceding years.

It is difficult, even now, to appreciate the fundamental character of the changes in thought that have resulted from the war, changes which are still going on. Friends, in common with other people, underwent something of a mental and spiritual revolution. I think that this revolution was accentuated in the case of younger Friends for two reasons. Firstly, the responsibility suddenly thrown upon youth, was far greater proportionately than that shouldered by those who were not faced so acutely with the problem of National Service. Secondly, the comparatively unformed and plastic mind of youth can absorb new ideas more readily than those whose habits of thought have become largely determined. These two factors taken together, no doubt, to a large extent account for the more apparent differences of opinions and outlook between older and younger people, and for the mutual criticism heard, not among Friends only, but characteristic of a widespread state of mind. It is surely something to be faced and overcome in a mutual spirit of give and take. It is true to say that many Friends, both older and younger, are alive to this need.

THE NEW COMMITTEE.—The Post-war situation in the Society was in many respects different from the pre-war situation. It is to the great credit of the Young Friends' Committee, which had so faithfully struggled on during the transition period, that they recognized this and left the whole field clear for the new generation of younger Friends to decide whether there was need for the continuation of the Movement in any organized form. It was decided that there had never been a greater need. There was still the necessity for drawing younger Friends into a conscious fellowship that would strengthen and deepen the lives of individuals and equip them to play their part in the life of the Society.

FUTURE OF THE MOVEMENT.—Another note was sounded at Jordans, 1920. The phrases "increase your contacts" and "get out into politics" (using the term in its widest sense), may be said to focus much that was discovered in conference. The intensive work of the pre-war days was good and essential. Coupled with that work must now go hand-in-hand the task of rubbing shoulders with men and women, far and near, outside the narrow limits of the Society. It was also clear that a religious body has other duties to perform than to enunciate ideals. Many great issues, both social and international, must needs be faced corporately, and immediate principles of action formulated by the patient and unprejudiced pooling of facts and ideas. This is an ambitious task. But the fusion of religious and political activity is surely the true line of development, if the right spirit is to be imparted to local, national and world government. No one is more conscious of the difficulties than those present members of the Movement who see this. They are anxious to bring this point of view to bear upon the thought of the Society, and they aim to overcome through the machinery of the Movement some of the barriers of time and circumstance which have necessarily limited the impact of the younger spirit and thought upon the Society's life and activity. If in any large measure these aims are to be achieved, they will demand the whole-hearted co-operation of all those who are younger (there are far too few sharing in the work of the Movement), and they will need also the co-operation and sympathetic understanding of older Friends.

THE ENGLISH YOUNG FRIENDS' COMMITTEE.

The inauguration of The Young Quaker provides an opportunity for reviewing the work of the Young Friends' Movement, and of the Young Friends' Committee.

At the very outset it should be understood that the Committee is simply a means to an end. It is young Friends as a whole who must actually carry the message, and if they fail, however active the Central Committee is, it cannot take their place. Our Committee exists to co-ordinate and to help wherever young Friends are attempting to put their Quakerism into practice.

The Committee endeavors to draw all young Friends into the fellowship of the whole Movement, and to develop a vital group consciousness, although it does not attempt to initiate purely local activities. There is no gulf, however, between the Central Committee and local groups of young Friends. The larger groups appoint their own representatives on the Committee; smaller groups of even only a few young Friends, are linked up by correspondents; and more, we hope, will be done through the medium of The Young Quaker.

The work of the Committee lies in two main directions: first, to act as an advisory and consultative body for local groups, and second, to initiate and carry through activities of a national character.

Consideration is given from time to time to problems affecting young Friends or the Society as a whole. Thus we have discussed birthright membership, and on this subject made recommendations to Yearly Meeting; the situation arising at the beginning of the coal strike, and its root causes; the modern international outlook of Quakerism; the missionary work abroad of the Society, and the challenge which has been issued young Friends in this matter. By sending a digest of conclusions to local correspondents, the Committee has endeavored to help young Friends to face modern problems and seek their Christian solution.

It is clear that a committee of twenty, meeting not more than four times a year, cannot itself be an executive body. When suggestions for definite activities are made, they are carried out, after discussion and approval by the whole Committee, by small sub-committees. Thus there is a sub-committee planning work among young people, and arousing their interest in the deeper things of life through visits of the Pilgrims to the schools and through camps, and in other ways; another arranging tramps of parties of young Friends in country districts so as to meet with isolated Friends and make contacts with sympathetic people and present the Quaker message at every opportunity; another considering the contribution of young Friends to the International service of the Society; while yet other sub-committees are concerned with the running of this journal and with arrangements for the forthcoming Manchester Conference. The Committee also sent last summer a deputation to meet with young Friends in Ireland in their time of difficulty, and arranged for others to meet with young Germans near Lake Constance.

It would be possible to give further details of our work, but the ideal which is its driving force is not, of course, merely to enter into activities, however good, but to help young Friends to appreciate the best in Quakerism, and to fill them with a burning desire to bring to an ever-widening circle a knowledge of the deepest things of life, so far as they have been revealed to us.

THE YOUNG FRIENDS' MOVEMENT.

FIFTEENTH AND RACE STREETS.

The members of the Young Friends' Movement believe that the Society of Friends has a real work to do here and now. We believe, also, that for the Society to do this work—to put their message across—young people are needed, as workers, in the various activities of the Society. We aim, therefore, to interest young people and to help them to find their places in Friendly activities. Our program for the year just closing, follows. We have little more than touched some of the lines of work mentioned and in none have we gone as deeply as we have desired, but this program has been our goal and toward it we have worked.

GERMAN YOUTH-MOVEMENT.

I have been asked to write about the youth-movement in Germany. Can you write about what a "stream" is? Can you find a formula for life in its whole complexity, its thriving, blooming, ripening and decay?

To write about the German Youth-Movement means the confession of an innermost experience for which words are likely to fail; words that are really able to transmit the passion and the depth of the experience to you, that think and feel on such a different basis of life.

I am not concerned here to inform you about the facts, which are a result of something fundamental, that drives these young men and women to do new things. (May I refer you for these facts to the article of Bruno Lasker of the 12-31-21 issue of the "Survey"?)

There seems to me to be only one phrase that may attempt to be a synonymous phrase for essential characteristics of this driving power, this longing for intensity or tension of life: Eros. These young people want to drink from the springs of life and I would that you could grasp the feeling behind this word "life," without referring it to any concrete facts or associated thoughts.

Such facts and thoughts develop when this thirst meets with the given personal qualities of its bearer and his circumstances of living. Out of these incidental differences this power bears manifold fruits, and yet brings forth one spiritual type in thousands.

The answer to satisfy the seeking of these souls is an answer given by thinking and feeling, more or less influenced by material conditions and the spiritual atmosphere, which both are quite apt to create destructive opponents of themselves. Their numerous shades, combined with the varying depth and correctness of thinking and with personal qualities, help to increase the number of conceptions of the contents of real life.

Its form is already more or less determined by the existing desire, which calls for truthfulness and responsibility, for unfaltering thought and uncurbed feeling, because every seeker carries the heavy responsibility for the outcome of his struggle. This fundamental idea of self-responsibility and opposition to spiritual authorities is the only main feature that may be called democratic.

Responsibility and honesty in word and action can only be attained by hard, mostly self-educational work. It fits him who honestly tries to find the right idea and to shape his life in accordance with it. The desire to shape life after an idea and not to accommodate it to existing facts constitutes the main difference between age and youth, both of which have nothing to do with the number of years.

Though the scope and the variety are great, some ideas are leading the majority of these young people. A part of most pedagogical outlines is the requirement of the caretaking of the human body. They want to abolish the old-established idea that the body is inferior to the spirit, and accept the terms "body and spirit" only as a hypothesis for scientific work, but not as an expression of an actual discrepancy, which might justify a different valuation. For many of the young folks the Greek ideal of the harmoniously developed personality is one aim, and they feel the responsibility for the care of their minds and bodies equally heavy. This idea is a courageous counteraction against the very intellectual training offered by German schools. The Greek example has been interpreted in an effective way by one of the first of the leaders: Gustav Wynecken. Many heavy charges are raised against him, but he was the first who defended the revolutionary idea that youth is not only a preparative stage of the outgrown person, but that it has its own value and culture. He has taught us the meaning of the Greek Eros, as the creative and constructive force in man, which is in no sense limited to sex relations.

There are a few on the opposite side who acknowledge that; but there are many who only see what seems to them most fatal trespassing of the social marriage laws. They cannot understand that honesty may require the breaking away from all conventionality, that does not truly express the feeling that many do not care to affirm the holiest promise of their life to a state or a church, whose authority they do not acknowledge. All these consistent men and women are condemned together with the comparatively few, who refuse to promise anything and shirk any lasting responsibility.

It is not only the love between man and woman that seeks and strives for new forms, it is also the love between mates in spirit and fellow-workers that aims for a true expression. We find all shades of fellowships from the loosely-gathered band, that sings and plays and reads up to the strictest organization that strives to equip its members by rationalizing their lives for political leadership in a platonic, that is, hierarchical state.

If we endeavor to put up any system at all, we can distinguish those who try to bring fresh life to the old political parties, in which they establish young people's groups; others, having nothing to do with these present organizations try to preach a new world and a new life; for instance in communistic settlements on a Bolshevikic as well as on a Christian basis. Among these the absolute pacifists are to be found, while there is some pacifistic spirit in many political groups. A third very large group consists of those who either do not believe in any development of the world or of those who believe that progress can only be brought forth by the perception of personality.

It is not the membership in any one organized group that makes young people bearers of this movement. It is the spirit that burns in their hearts and makes them wonder over themselves and the meaning of life, that feel a call, which may justly be named a religious one, to seek for truth. It is only natural that the idea, which is set up as a guidance, often satisfies personal likings or talents. But egoism cannot be called the stirring motive, because there are many ready for material sacrifices. But a general tendency prevails to stick to fundamental ideas once conceived and never to question them again. Discussion is a widely spread habit among these young folks, but it tends more to defend principles, not to be shaken, and to argue about consequences and consistency.

The practical everyday life is the bitterest enemy of an intense and truthful life, and not many do escape the danger of being merged by it when the earning of the daily bread, so difficult in the present Germany, drags them down. As only a few programs require systematic training of unlenient will and character, but rather seek the finding of new forms for a new life, not very many are able to retain the passion for their ideals in their later lives. But the outsider necessarily asks, whether all these beautiful forces are wasted in a temporary influence on individuals?

We must try to comfort ourselves with the hope that the ardent truthfulness and consistency of those who are left as only bearers of their message, will become a stirring power in public life, whose needs are burning in our souls.

CZECHOSLOVAKIAN STUDENTS' RENAISSANCE MOVEMENT.

[The writer of this article, one of the five here mentioned, is a classmate of mine. When asked to write about their movement, she very willingly and gladly did so. If there is any one thing which will bring about a truer, finer internationalism it is the spirit of Christian fellowship between students of different lands. Let us hope that the spirit of this paper may grow daily stronger and richer.]

FAITH BORTON.]

There are many very well-known facts about the material conditions of the European students during and even after war. A Czechoslovakian student from the University of Prague certainly was not any lucky exception and was obliged to go through all the struggling that brought us the great war.

Every Czechoslovakian student thankfully appreciated the generosity and Christian spirit of love of our American fellow-students, which made it possible not only to save our health, but to save many of our students from actual death from starvation.

But the war and especially the nearest post-war time was a cause of another suffering, more dangerous than the material struggles, which perhaps is not as much known about here.

The spiritual life of the Czechoslovakian students was near to death, selfishness seemed to me to take place forever, in our student bodies the true brotherly love and feeling of helpfulness for each other seemed to be lost.

It looked so that the faith and hope would have been disappeared as we students. There was no kindness to each other, no understanding for other peoples' difficulties at all. In order to get the piece of bread, the students did not seem to have any time to stop and think about their religion and spiritual life.

In the second year of our new-born Czechoslovakian republic the curve of the moral depression among the students seemed to reach its maximum.

The birthday of Dr. Thomas O. Masaryk, the president of the Czechoslovakian Republic, is the real beginning of the reaction among the students, it is a day where a new idea of a new, reborn life sprang out, it is the origin of the Czechoslovakian Movement.

In an address to a deputation of students the President said: "I wish that we might have in all public positions men and women capable of observing critically without personal littleness. The co-operation of such citizens can alone secure for us a successful development. I have always looked upon the ideals of humanity and democracy as an aspect of eternity, which makes us humble and strengthens our moral responsibility."

There was only a very small group of students (boys and girls) who at the same minute decided not to hesitate any moment longer and begin to seek the truth and go the way, as the leader of our nation expressed. This small group came in contact with Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. American Secretaries, who with the great generosity were ready at once to help us.

I do not want to speak today about the financial help, but about a more important one, about the help that counts most.

Our American friends were the first ones, whose merit it is, that the Czechoslovakian student of today understands the right meaning of the word Christian and Christianity.

They enabled the small group of students to meet and to listen for two days to Dr. J. R. Mott and to some other American spiritual leaders, who are visiting Czechoslovakia at this time.

The small group invited their friends and it grew larger with an increasing interest and problems, that the striking personality of Dr. J. R. Mott involved.

May, 1920, is a historical month for the Czechoslovakian Students' Renaissance Movement, as the first month of the movement as an organization, but also the month that everyone of us, who attended the conference held in an old historical castle, considers it as the time where we "changed our life."

J. R. Mott, with the majestic equilibrium of his soul, his nearness to his God, influenced many of us that we decided to think about our religion, about our relation to other people, about our relation to the eternity.

First steps were made these days to set up the definite purpose and religious basis for the new-born organization with the enthusiastic help from J. R. Mott, D. A. Davis, C. V. Hibbard, H. L. Henroid, and also from our leading Universities' professors, who have welcomed the idea with a great understanding and hope for future fruits.

We find us ready to express our religious feeling in the form, that we will try to "live the life of good and truth."

About two weeks later we met in the historical place again, having Sherwood Eddy with us for ten days.

To me, personally, this conference is one of the greatest impressions that I have ever lived through.

We came together, different kinds of students. Most of us, who got the first influence from J. R. Mott, were now expecting answers to new arisen problems. Few of us, who called themselves religious, but whose religion was dead and selfish, because of lack of applications to our human life, and a few others, who came from curiosity to see what will come out.

I never will be able to forget the lovely spring mornings, when we used to meet together in the old castle's hall, listening to our leader, Sherwood Eddy, who was reading and explaining the New Testament. (There were many of us who even did not read it before.) The whole, most charming personality of Sherwood Eddy was just full of radiation of his strong belief and thankfulness to his God for every little flower in the garden that gave us its odor, for every little bird that was pleasing us with his songs.

And thus, I did not even realize how it happened, but suddenly we all felt that Christ was brought near to us and we all, united now, pledged ourselves and to our movement, that we will follow the teaching of Jesus Christ, that we will live our religion and solve our life's problems according to his teaching and example.

I believe we have found our God these days. Later in the evenings, when all, sitting around Sherwood Eddy, were discussing the manifestation of eternal God. It was not necessary to discuss, just stop a moment—and listen—look at the evening sky full of stars—and we all felt that the God is near.

Immediately after this inspiring conference, the Czechoslovakian Students' Renaissance Movement was ready to show that its enthusiasm will bear fruits.

Weekly gatherings were established, not only for studying the Bible, but the teachings of Jan Hus, Comenius, and other religious leaders of the world.

Large student service was organized with the course for practical sociology. Contact with the Red Cross and other social service organizations was established, where the members of the Czechoslovakian Students' Renaissance Movement found themselves very useful.

Helpful student information bureau, rooming department, care of the sick students, friendly relations between students and workmen, were also the result of the sincere effort to try to live our religion.

A few months later, the Junior movement was created among the High School students in order to get a thorough preparation for the membership of the University Movement.

The number of members of the Cz. S. R. M. is growing very rapidly, although the number of regular members is very limited. Everybody, who wants to be one becomes first a member of the discussion groups and then, if he proves that he will live in the spirit of the movement, may become a regular member.

Since the real beginning the members realize, that the similar needs for Christian leadership are arising also among the students of other nationalities and they do not therefore miss any opportunity to come into contact with them in order to be the first things of the Christian internationalism.

Just now, the vice-president of the Cz. S. R. M., senior of Vassar College is representing the movement in China at the World's Student Christian Federation Conference in Peking, where the Movement will be definitely affiliated to the largest student organization of the world.

During the past two years of its life, the Cz. S. R. M. went through many steps of its development.

Through the intensive study and development of our religious life, the movement was able to set up the definite religious basis at the last summer conference as follows:

"We associate ourselves in a common work on a religious basis for the regeneration of man, which shall manifest itself through love, through the longing after the knowledge of truth, and through the endeavor to do good. Those of us who strive after regeneration in the spirit of Christ may become regular members of the movement."

Five members of the Cz. S. R. M. are having the honor to be the students of Vassar College for two last years. They came to America to learn to know the Christian spirit of the American students, to tell them about our religious ideals and desires for good, truth and love, to unite themselves with them for reaching the greatest of the greatest, the divine eternity.

VASSAR, '22.

COAL.

On the first of last month the public was informed of the 1922 coal strike. At that time the general reaction was rather apathetic for several reasons. In the first place, non-union miners were considered entirely able to supply the reduced present demand. In the second place, the strength of the limited mine workers of America was if anything underestimated.

The official reports represented the country's reserve stock, principally located in consumers' storage piles, as 52,500,000 net tons on Third Month 31, 1922. On Fourth Month 1, 1922, the pile had mounted to sixty-three million tons. A tidy parcel of coal for the ordinary consumer, but a quantity hardly sufficient to last the United States forty to fifty days. This reserve stock will in all probability determine the outcome of the strike. A word of explanation is required.

The coal business of the United States is divided into two separate groups. Anthracite coal, which is restricted to mining areas of Northeastern Pennsylvania, and bituminous coal, which is found in twenty out of forty-eight states of the Union. By far the most important group is bituminous, with its largest producing fields in Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, Kentucky, Alabama, Indiana and Illinois. The comparative figures are, roughly, ten to one. Of the 10,784,000 tons of coal produced the week ending Third Month 18, 1922, the anthracite coal mines produced over 1,907,000 net tons. Bituminous coal is used all over the States and Canada, not only as a domestic fuel but as the precious stuff that makes steam for almost all industry. This coal is in a very true sense a corner-stone of our civilization. Anthracite, on the other hand, is practically confined to domestic use and for consumption in restricted areas, such as the New England States and Eastern Pennsylvania. Anthracite is so limited that its producers have advanced the argument of a semi-luxury, pointing out that it should be bought at a fancy figure. They have had their way during the winters of 1919-20-21-22. Whether it will be so during the next decade is uncertain.

There is another important difference between these two coal regions. The operators in the anthracite fields are relatively few and well associated. A few large producers dominate the production and prices and policies of hard coal. Due to this condition, the anthracite producers have been able to retard the decline of hard coal prices during the last twelve months. Further, the miners in the hard coal regions are practically all unionized. Hence, strikes in the hard coal fields are usually long and bitterly contested on both sides.

In the soft coal regions neither of these conditions maintains, when we consider the country as a whole. The operators owning several mines, scattered across the country, naturally supply widely different markets, have little contact with each other, maintain a very loose association, even in times of direct need. During normal times they are all competing for the market, which extends from coast to coast. Here again we see the reason why much of the bituminous coal during 1921 sold below the cost of production. Contrary to popular impression coal, soft coal, the nation's fuel, has not been high during the last year. From the point of view of industrial economics it has been too low. That, however, is another story.

Finally, the miners in the soft coal fields vary from ultra-radical, syndicalist groups in the coal fields of Illinois to the non-union fields of central Pennsylvania, although most of the major mining groups are represented in the United Mine Workers of America. The present strike has been called, but the combined forces of the United Mine Workers of America, acting in concert with the anthracite miners, whose two years' wage agreements expired at twelve o'clock midnight, Third Month 31, 1922.

One might readily ask if there has been any genuine effort to avert this strike. The answer is yes and no.

The Government endeavored to bring about a conference last fall, at which meeting both miners and operators were invited to sit around the magic green cloth table and as diplomats, settle their mutual problems. The mine-owners at that time agreed to confer, but the Union chiefs felt that they needed the instructions of the Indianapolis Convention back of them before they could speak with authority. The government fell between two stools.

Later the miners held their convention and published what might be considered the maximum terms, much like the generous concessions published as possible peace terms by the contestants in the recent Great War. The mine operators have evidently taken these terms very seriously, especially a small group from Western Pennsylvania, and have declined to meet the miners in any conference of adjustment, claiming that no court or conference can be fair where conclusions are foregone. There are minor exceptions to this attitude in local communities, but in the main this position is maintained. This stand of the operators may prove to be an error, as they obligated themselves as did the Union to meet in an inter-state joint conference prior to Fourth Month 1st.

The opinion of the Government is that the miners, although they declined a conference at a specific time, have not declined to confer, whereas the operators as a group have refused to fulfil an obligation previously entered into.

The contention is rather technical and both sides are inclined to stand on ceremony until the sixty-three millions of tons of coal in storage dwindles away. The sinister part of it is that a current feeling exists amongst many operators that now is the time to crush the unions and force them back to work on their conditions. Prices are coming down. There is less demand for coal and they claim the miners have got to recognize these economic facts. Naturally the miners are reluctant, but after all, the operators argue, the old way is the only way. When a man is hungry he will work. Starvation is the only treatment for the limited mine workers of America. The operators consequently have been rather pleased over the strike.

The Union leaders have sensed this and they, too, have been reasonably content for a strike for they feel that the only way for the Union to win members and show its real strength is on the battle-field.

To return to the coal pile. As long as the operators see a big stock of mined coal, which now exists, above ground, they will be very slow about a settlement, even at low wages, as it would leave this high-priced coal on the market. This coal must be consumed first, or putting it another way, about ten weeks at the present rate of consumption must roll around before a settlement will be interesting. The Union sees no glory in accepting lower wages too quickly, even though such wages may be inevitable. Then, too, the owners may run short of coal and, to meet the public demand, the market price will soar, giving more money to labor and the chance of a high wage scale. This will not only keep the union leaders themselves in office but will justify the union, so everyone has an eye on the sixty-three million tons—the nation's storage. It is the weather vane of the situation and will probably be the first indicator of blue sky in the coal regions. H. W. E.

HER GARDEN.

Her tulips lift their cups of pink and gold
To greet the noon-day sun.
In her "wild garden" shy sweet buds unfold
And blossom, one by one.

Her hyacinths shed perfume from each bell
That hangs within their store,
But she, who knew and loved them all so well,
She comes no more.

But far beyond all we can see or know;
Beyond our mortal sight,
She, who so loved earth's beauty here below,
Walks now in radiant light.

And in her little garden's narrow round
Our memories make sweet
The places where she knelt to till the ground,
The paths that knew her feet.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

MISSIONARY OR PIRATE! (SAMUEL ARMSTRONG).—On and on the great roller came, with its sweep of a thousand miles across the mighty Pacific, on towards the white shores of lovely Honolulu, and ever close behind its broken crest a string of dark heads bobbed in and out of the water. Higher and higher it reared its wall of green marble, hung for a moment in a threatening curve, then broke in booming thunder. For a second or two the heads were lost in the tumbling mass of churning water—then suddenly one after another they shot out, each one lying close to a surf plank, as the great wave raced up the beach in a rushing swirl of foam.

In shallow water the pace slackened, and plank under arm, the boys scrambled to their feet. Then it could be seen that among the dark heads was a fair one, and a body that despite its tan gleamed whitely amongst the brown skins of the South Sea Islanders.

A little naked savage he looked as he laughingly swept the salt-drenched hair from his eyes, and well he might, for born and brought up in the South Seas, there was nothing the boys of the Islands could do which Sam Armstrong, the missionary's son, could not do as well—or better. Whether it were surfing or fish-spearing, peak-climbing or tracking through the mountain forests, swimming in the cool basin of some great waterfall or handling a sailing-boat among the reefs and breakers of the island coast, Sam and his younger brother were the acknowledged leaders of their brown companions.

Sometimes the two boys would pay a visit to their brother Baxter's cattle ranch at Waimanalo, across the Island. That meant an early start on their ponies, bare-footed, bare-headed, dressed only in home-made suits of coarse blue denim, whose bands of bright and faded blue showed where the tucks had been let out to serve the lengthening limbs. Away they went through the wonderful tropical foliage, climbing the side of a great volcanic mountain. Ere long they could hear the thunder of falling waters, and soon they reached the Kapena Falls. There the horses were tied up, and one after the other the boys jumped from the cliff of the falls forty feet into the cool depths below. Then, after a swim, on and up,—till in some shady spot they halted for lunch. The island lay at their feet gleaming in green and gold, while all around the deep blue sea rose to the level of their eyes, till it seemed like a great blue saucer. They would lie and laze, and then drop down to Waimanalo, where their brother's ranch lay shut in between the mountains and the sea.

There, there was always plenty to do. Best of all they liked to help brand the young cattle. Armed with their lassos they would jump into the pen. With a deft throw one would lasso the horns of a young steer, and another his hind legs, while a third threw him over and branded him. Then with a touch the lassos were loosened, the steer scrambled bellowing to his feet, and there was a wild scamper to the fence to escape his fury.

The one day in the week that Sam Armstrong did not like was First-day, for then feet had to be cramped in boots and clothes worn that must not be soiled, and there were so many classes and services to attend.

But in the service in the great church at Kawaiohau there was always something to interest him—the natives coming in with their pet dogs under their arms, the King and the nobility walking in in the squeakiest boots they could buy! There was even the possibility of a dog fight, when frantic church officials would poke about after the combatants with long sticks, while the Hawaiian congregation sat with the most solemn expression on their faces.

The sermons were long and often Sam's eyes would wander to the gleaming sunlight outside and he would think of tomorrow's picnic, but quite as often he would find himself admiring the way his father held the attention of that gathering of over two thousand brown islanders. For his merry-eyed, clever father was Sam's hero.

Then there was school, irksome at first to his outdoor-loving nature, but where he learned not only to work with his head, but with his hands, too. The school had been his father's idea for training the indolent Hawaiians to respect labor. Many a time did the boys weary of hoeing their melon patches, but there was no getting out of it while the light lasted. Not till their anxious eyes could count seven stars in the sky might they leave off.

It was a wonderful boyhood through which he grew up, until at twenty years old Sam Armstrong was a man who would always be a leader of his fellows. Standing above middle height, broad-shouldered, with a mass of light brown hair and a pair of piercing blue eyes, he gave the impression of "getting there every time." He could turn his hand to anything. Not only one of the best scholars in the college, he was a teacher also. He edited the local newspaper. He could build a house or make a boat. Suddenly at the end of it all there came a cloud. Just before he was to leave Honolulu to go to college in America his father was thrown from his horse and killed.

Almost immediately afterwards Sam Armstrong sailed. "What are you going to be?" a friend asked him one day. Like a flash came the answer: "Missionary or pirate!"

Hardly had Armstrong reached America when the great Civil War between the North and South broke out. Never having lived in America, Armstrong did not feel much interest in the war, and for two years kept out of it, but as soon as he had taken his degree, he felt compelled to throw in his lot with those who were fighting on the side of the slaves. "So he joined the Northern Army. "Not that I have learned to love the negroes," he said, "but I think they ought to be free."

FRIENDS IN POLAND.—The Friends have developed their program of agricultural reconstruction in five selected districts of Poland. In the district along the Stochod, 300 horses are now at work, with the necessary number of ploughs and cultivators, breaking up the ground for spring planting. Seed is also ready for distribution, both garden seed, seed potatoes and field seed.

These horses were secured on loan from the Polish army last autumn in return for care over the winter. Negotiations are now under way for buying them and reselling on easy payments to the peasants, thus placing the horses where they are most needed, instead of letting them go, as they otherwise would, to the highest bidder who can pay cash, without regard to need.

As organized by the Friends, this gives a relatively inexpensive and effective form of relief and reconstruction. A village is notified that the horses are ready to work on their land and they send at once enough peasants to drive the animals over. One man in the employ of the Friends accompanies each column of twenty-six horses as supervisor. He sees that they are established in the places already agreed on, and authorizes their use each day by the families to which they have been assigned. Each needy family with a male head is allowed the use of a team long enough to plough about three acres of land; but before the man does his own ploughing, he must plough for one of the widows of the village in return for the use of the horses.

When the ploughing is done, seed is distributed. Eighteen thousand families are being supplied during Fourth Month with garden seeds alone. Five thousand spades are also being distributed this month. The districts in which the Friends are working, which comprise five selected centres of need along the old battle lines, are expected to be by fall in relatively self-supporting condition. But there are vast stretches of territory yet unhelped; the Friends estimate that they are meeting only five per cent. of the need, and they are the only foreign relief agency doing agricultural reconstruction in East Poland.

The Polish government is, however, taking increasing interest in the situation. At a recent meeting of local officials from East Poland, called by the ministry for the repatriation of Polish refugees, the method adopted by the Friends in distributing horses was warmly commended, and the project of using in the same way several thousand horses received as part of the German reparations was favorably discussed.

During the winter, cottage industries were organized, by the loan of looms to families of good weavers who have lost all their household possessions. But as soon as spring approaches, all attention turns towards the land; for the first thought of the peasant, on getting home, is not, "Where shall I find a house to live in, now that my own is burned?" but "How shall I get my land ploughed?" He will live contentedly through the winter in any kind of dugout, if only he has prospects of a harvest that will start his family again towards self-support.

The desire of the peasant to stand on his own feet makes it possible for a little relief to go a long way. When gifts are supplied, all who can pay even a trifle for them are required to do so, and this money is used again to extend the number of agricultural implements in the district.

Great excitement in the village of Wojmica attended the arrival of the first shipment of 150 sheep brought in by the Friends' Mission, as part of their plan for reconstructing this war-ruined district in East Poland. The Starostas from neighboring villages, for which Wojmica is the railway centre, came down in force to get the sheep allotted to their village, and for a time the snowy roads were a mass of tangled fleecy animals, which mean the return of an industry which once flourished in this district, but which had been so injured by the war that only two sheep were left in the entire circuit of fifteen villages.

PUBLIC MEETING ON WEST VIRGINIA MINERS' NEEDS.—A public meeting on the subject of "Personality and Coal" will be held on Third-day evening, Fifth Month 23, at 7-45 o'clock, at the Twelfth Street Meeting-house, when the subject of the needs of the children of the miners in the coal fields of West Virginia will be presented. Drew Pearson will speak on "The Need of the Miners in West Virginia," and Walter H. Abell will speak on "Human Factors in the Coal Strike." Both of these Friends made personal surveys of the situation in West Virginia under the auspices of the Service Committee.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING.—Concord Quarterly Meeting was held on the 8th and 9th. The Meeting of Ministers and Elders after the usual Meeting for Worship answered the three queries and then through a minute from Lansdowne Meeting discussed with considerable freedom the wisdom of expanding the meeting's representation by including the Overseers.

Some expressed themselves as satisfied with the present plan and urged that the functions of Elders and Overseers were so different there was a lack of appropriateness in making the combination. Reference was made to the plan that had been tried more than once of holding conferences for ministers, elders and overseers. It was interesting to note how many viewpoints the question could command. We were reminded that a great majority of Friends' meetings elsewhere had discarded our plan years ago and now held what they styled "Meetings on Ministry and Oversight." The Meeting did not lose sight of the fact that the whole subject is of disciplinary character and that our action could be nothing more than suggestive. A large committee was appointed to consider the matter, gain all the light it could, and eventually report a judgment to the Quarterly Meeting proper.

The meeting on Third-day was well attended. Two members of the Visitation Committee of the Yearly Meeting were acceptably present. They and several of our own members had a part in the vocal services of the meeting. An aged Friend remarked near the close of the meeting that he had attended many sittings of Concord Quarterly Meeting, but he did not recall any in which the spirit of Truth had been more triumphant. The business meeting was also an unusually interesting one. The Visitation Committee of the Quarterly Meeting, consisting of twenty or more members, offered a very lively report. They had met seven times since their appointment last Eighth Month, mostly at one of the smaller meetings, and various interests of the meetings had been reviewed by them. They have in prospect the holding of some appointed meetings on First-day afternoons in neighborhoods where few or no Friends now reside, but where years ago there were several families of Friends. There are six or more such communities within the compass of the Quarterly Meeting.

The hour for holding these meetings revealed the fact that half of our meetings are now convening on standard time and the others on advanced time; this led to the reasonable suggestion that the secretary's office should collate the facts concerning the hour of holding all our meetings during the summer and furnish lists to those who request them.

Frances Tatum Rhoads stated that it was the prospect of the Conference Committee to hold a two-session conference early in the autumn, one session to be devoted to the consideration of the religious training of children and the other to be devoted to the consideration of the ministry, the meetings to be after the plan of the one held at Fourth and Arch Streets last winter, this Conference, however, to be open to all the membership and an especial appeal to be made to the younger members to attend.

The question of birthright and associate membership was introduced as an item referred to us by the Yearly Meeting, and though one or more suggestions were offered whereby the matter might receive consideration, it did not seem to interest the meeting at large and a minute to that effect was adopted.

Not so another matter introduced by Thomas K. Brown. The proposition that some plan be devised whereby the West-town family (many of them members of this Quarterly Meeting), could attend it with regularity, brought out almost unanimous approval of the suggestion. It was left with a well-selected committee to work over the problem with the school authorities, including the committee and the faculty. The suggested plan would call for at least one session of the Quarterly Meeting being held at the School each year. We await with no little interest the conclusion they shall reach.

A STATEMENT in a recent number of THE FRIEND that a frame meeting-house at Easton, Md., in which William Penn is known to have preached is the oldest frame building now standing in the United States has been challenged. At Plymouth, Mass., the Crowe House, 1664, and the Harlow House, 1677; at Duxbury, Mass., there is the Miles Standish House, 1666, and the John Alden House, also claiming a very early date. There is an old frame house in St. Augustine, Florida that is probably of a much earlier date than any of the above. It is to be said, however, that few of the "oldest houses" can establish their exact building dates by such authentic evidence as that offered by the Easton Meeting House.—From the Historical Society Bulletin.

SALE OF FOREIGN EMBROIDERIES.—A sale of foreign handwork and embroideries will be held under the auspices of the Woman's Work Committee of the American Friends' Service Committee in the Young Friends' Auditorium, at Fifteenth and Cherry Streets, on Fourth-day, Fifth Month 24th, from two until seven P. M.

This most excellent handicraft and embroidery work has been secured through the Units in Austria, Poland, Russia, Germany and France; and practically all are of the finest possible work and texture. The proceeds from this sale will be sent back to aid the impoverished people who did the work. Because of the low rate of foreign exchange the people who are doing this work are living on practically the value of three and four dollars a month, and so the proceeds from the sale of their work will be of immense value to them.

The work includes many useful as well as handsome articles, and all Friends are asked to bear it in mind, realizing the tremendous aid they will be giving to helpless middle-class people in Europe, and at the same time obtaining purchases of great value, especially for gifts.

BURLINGTON AND BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING will be held at Burlington, N. J., Third day, Fifth Month 30th, at 10.30 A. M., (Standard Time). Meeting for Ministers and Elders will be held in the Mercer Street House, Trenton, N. J., Second-day, Fifth Month 29th, at 10.30 A. M. (Daylight Saving Time).

A MEETING FOR DIVINE WORSHIP is to be held in Friends' Meeting-house at Marshallton, Pa., on First-day, Fifth Month 21st, at two o'clock (Standard Time). An invitation to attend is extended to all interested. ISAAC EVANS.

For "THE FRIEND."

CAN we do better than conform our teaching and practise to the Christian standard held by the mother of Charles Wesley? "Whatever weakens your reason, impairs the tenderness of your conscience, obscures your sense of God, or takes off the relish of spiritual things—that thing is sin to you, however innocent it may be in itself."—Furnished by Eleanor R. Elkins.

THE TEMPTATIONS OF AGE.

"I have often heard the temptations of youth spoken of," said a dear "Quaker saint" to the writer, years ago, "but age has its peculiar temptations also, and not so much is said about them."

She did not specify any—that was not her way—such faith had she in the "lessons of life," and in their being set for us by the Great Teacher, as we are able to bear them. She knew that some day I should learn for myself about the "temptations of age."

What are they?

An Old Testament writer has indicated one of them for us in the words: "Say not that the former days were better than these."

We have all had the experience, at some time or other, of an interesting but fatiguing journey. A delayed train, a long dusty ride, an overcharge in the hotel bill, a break-down of the automobile—any of these things seems of great moment at the time.

But six months or a year passes, and they are all forgotten, while the sunset across the lake, the visit to some historic spot, the meeting with a congenial fellow-traveler, will make that journey a bright spot in our memories.

Just so the long-past childhood, "seen through memory's sunset air," appears filled with precious things, and brings tender thoughts of the dear home, and the meeting with the men and women to whom we looked up as our ideals of strength and sweetness.

A middle-aged man, discussing our late Yearly Meeting, spoke of the row of "gallery Friends" whom he recalled as the leaders in his boyhood. His own uncle was one of them.

"What a group of men they were!" he said. Yet he himself is no unworthy successor.

His uncle was, in his day, a "succorer of many" with both spiritual and material aid. But it was never given to him to feed the little children of another land, left hungry by years of ruthless war, and learning to associate the name "Quaker" with all that means help and strength. This the nephew has done. And, though his hat and coat do not distinguish him from the men who work with him, through his busy days, they feel none the less his allegiance to the same Master whom his uncle so long and faithfully served.

And doubtless in time, to his own nephews, he will seem, as years of "ripening" make their impress on his character, just such a man as his uncle now seems to him.

For so the strong characters which have influenced our formative years must always stand above others in our backward view, and it is hard to find their counterparts in the men and women with whom we are living—

"We faintly struggle,—they in glory shine, Yet all are one in Thee; for all are Thine."

As with the people so with the things associated with our earlier years. The flowers our mothers cherished—the books our fathers read aloud on winter evenings—and many other things, precious through association. Are there any like them? How can we help over-valuing them?

To refer again to the "Quaker saint" who spoke of the temptations of age. Once when the question of cutting down some trees on her homestead acres was being discussed, she said to her son: "Leave them a little longer. I have seen the winter sun set behind them so many years!" Yet she did not let her love of the past shut her away from sympathy with the present. Realizing the "temptation" she was enabled to resist it.

To some natures another temptation that comes with years is to doubt one's ability to bear patiently and cheerfully the limitation caused by failing strength and curtailed activity. Yet many of these have found that doubts which shadowed the pathway before them have been like the lions which "Christian" in "The Pilgrim's Progress" saw before him on either side of his road, but "when he came near to them he saw that they were chained, and could in no wise come at him." And such doubting souls have been able to say of their Heavenly Guide:

"Better hath He been, for years
Than thy fears."

If then, some of the temptations of youth come through over-confidence, and those of age through a lack of confidence, and a spirit of doubt, doubt that the present time can be as good, and as full of all that makes for good as was the past—doubt that the Grace which has so far sustained will be with them to the very end—how much we need to keep together in spirit.

How much our young people can do for us! They who have known less than we of loss and disappointment, who expect a good work to succeed if undertaken in a right spirit, and do not have their expectations tinged with doubt. They to whom such wonderful opportunities for service are opening, and for whom we so earnestly long that they may choose the best, and let nothing less do. How we need their hopeful outlook to help us in what service remains for us.

And what can we do for them?

Perhaps some of us found an answer in the incident related in the Memorial of Samuel Emlen, when he said to the anxious teacher, seeking advice about her pupil—"Love him a little more!" Perhaps an attitude of love and trust toward our younger Friends can be our best defense against a spirit of doubt and criticism—the "temptations of age."

GERTRUDE ROBERTS SHERER.

Quaker education lost one of its most experienced and efficient workers in the removal by death at her home in Worcester, Massachusetts, on Third Month 17th, of Gertrude Roberts Sherer, for over two years the Superintendent of the Elementary Schools under the care of the Committee on Education of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

She was born of Quaker parentage on a New Hampshire farm, and as a young girl moved with her parents to North Dakota, where they lived as pioneers on a large wheat farm. She prepared for teaching by graduation from the State Normal School, at Moorhead, Minnesota. After a few years of teaching in public elementary schools, she returned to New England. Completing her preparation for college by a year in the Worcester High School, she entered Smith College, where she graduated. Some years later she received her Master's degree from Stanford University.

For eleven years she taught English at Friends' Select School, resigning the position at the time of her marriage. A little later she became Principal of the Friends' School in Lansdowne, where she served two years. She then devoted two years to graduate study in California and at Columbia University, which served as special preparation for the work which she undertook for the schools of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. She was one of the most highly gifted and best trained teachers in the Society of Friends.

AN APPRECIATION.

One longs to be a master poet to write in heroic measure and for all time of a life so crowned with beauty as was hers. No record of fact, no reciting of the many varied and interesting events of her life of less than fifty years, can in any sense portray the richness and charm, the wealth and power, the brilliancy and generosity of her nature. All this loveliness of spirit, this power of mind appeared and reappeared in even more wonderful fashion through her long illness. There was a radiance of spirit in her that shone forth even as in the rainbow hues which she so loved.

When I saw her six weeks before her passing, I found her calm and heroic after months of great suffering and physical weakness. She recognized the meaning of it all, knew that her strength was rapidly going, was conscious of the onslaught of the fearful disease. Yet though her body must succumb her spirit was unconquerable. Her fetters became her very wings of freedom. "I am so afraid I shall think too much about my body," she said one morning after a night of weariness. She greeted each day with a smiling face, asking only that she might serve some one. "Every teacher," she wrote to her teachers, "must have as her motto, 'Not to be ministered unto, but to minister.'" "I have but two ambitions, one to serve you more, and the other to serve you better." How brave was her example! Not until the last few weeks of her life did she indulge in the luxury of a nurse, and then only when her friends insisted. She would have no easy road for herself. To the end she found richness of life not in ease but in service. "To him that loveth nothing is difficult, nothing impossible, because love is stronger than death." Already, to us who watched her in those last weeks, she seemed a citizen of eternity.

She loved human companionship, yet she knew little of it in the last year of her life. But though she could not see her friends face to face, she wrote constantly to them all through her illness as long as she could hold a pen. To one friend she writes, "From thy richness of heart and mind thee pours out encouragement upon my poverty of spirit and I find myself the possessor of untold wealth, of priceless treasures. Weakness and weariness of flesh do not make me forget thy encompassing love."

Her love for order and harmony was almost a part of her religion. It was characteristic of her that the quality she most appreciated in her nurse was the ability to keep her room in order, and to arrange artistically the flowers which surrounded her. When her voice was even too weak to whisper, she smiled at the roses that were brought to her side and with her eyes followed the vase until it was placed in the one best spot in the room. And this love of order was more than external, it had its roots in the very fibre of her being and pervaded all her work from the dusting of a room to the writing of a great theme.

In questions of religious practice she was no doubt often misunderstood. Her life of the spirit conformed to no other human spirit, to no prescribed creed or ritual. She was impatient with any narrow interpretation of Christianity. She had no unity with pettiness of thought. Yet deep in her spirit was the constant and continual appeal to the Eternal. "I have thought over this question for days," she once said at a time when she must choose between housekeeping and teaching, "and not until this morning did the way become clear." Then having seen the light she went about her task in quietness and confidence. She pleaded, even in her last days, that a young man in his college work should lay deep hold of such studies as would open up to him a rich and full life of the spirit. "Don't let him just accept what his professors say; let him read and study a psychology so deep and broad and true with its biological foundation, that it squares with life."

Loving life as she did, it was an evidence of her deep religious faith that through her most trying illness there was never any complaint, or murmur or expression of disappointment. "I have been surprised that the days went so quickly for me," she said, "and that I have been so happy." She loved the warm brown earth, the rich colors of the sunset clouds, the green expanse of meadow, the breath of violets—and pansies, lilacs and roses, the waving fields of wheat, the russet tints of autumn, the outline of the trees in winter, the bare bleak hills, the deep beauty hidden in human eyes, and hair and faces, the laughter of little children and all their happy ways. She luxuriated in life as she watched it unfolding and developing, eager to her very end to serve, to give, to love and not to withhold, rejoicing in every expression of affection of her friends, appreciative of every attention, serene, courageous, energetic, patient. Surely this spirit, undimayed and unconquerable in its strength, already in the midst of time was living its eternal life. No need to question the immortality of the spirit when such a witness is given. "I have come that ye might have abundant life," was in her fulfilled. "It is inevitable," writes one of her friends, "that a spirit like hers should render eternal service. Her body interfered, as it interferes with all of us, with the freedom and perfection of the service of her spirit. When the physical limitations are removed, what boundless possibilities for such a spirit!"

Although appreciation of her friends, their abilities, gifts and graces was one of the strong qualities of her generous nature, yet in judging of her own powers she was most modest and reticent. To those who knew her best she seemed to be able to do everything. Hand and soul worked as one, nor were there ever any idle moments. From furnishing a house to making a dress, from writing a thoughtful paper to the knitting of a baby blanket, all her work was done in thorough and painstaking fashion. The words which she applied to another this winter most truly belong to her:

"So others shall take patience, labor, to their hearts and hands
From thy hand, and thy heart, and thy brave cheer."

OLIVE ROBBINS HAVILAND.

THE BALTIMORE CONFERENCE.

The prospect of a half week with Friends in Baltimore had been a pleasant one, but the realization of the treat in store for us overreached all that the most sanguine had pictured.

My special companions numbered three; through the kind generosity of one of the number we found ourselves in his roomy car leaving West Chester, Pa., near two o'clock on the afternoon of the fourth. Six o'clock saw us comfortably housed and at the supper table in the dining hall of the Park Avenue Meeting-house. The run of eighty miles had been made over a perfect road, through scenery always attractive, and at this season when the dogwood, wild azalea, and Judas trees crowded one another on every wooded hillside, it was particularly fair.

As our visit was associated with matters purely Friendly, it was not unnatural that I should make a record of the Meeting-houses of Friends close by the route we followed. The two meeting-houses in our own town were soon followed by the two at Birmingham, then the one at Parkerville, and a mile beyond, old Kennett, associated in story with Bayard Taylor's widely-read and once popular book, then the two at Kennett Square, the two at New Garden, and the three at West Grove we passed in quick succession.

Next the little meeting-house at Penn's Grove and a few miles further on that in Oxford, and only a mile or so outside the borough the Little Elk Meeting-house. In a few minutes we crossed the Mason and Dixon state line and passed almost in sight of the old Nottingham Meeting-house—at one time known as the Brick Meeting-house—with a post office of the same name. About this old house clusters more of Quaker interest than about any we were to see. Close by is the home of John Churchman, of whom some one who has the right to speak, says: "The timid, shrinking, trembling walk with God of a confirmed quietist is everywhere in evidence in his Journal. . . . a man as tender in spirit as John Woolman, and who undoubtedly in a profound degree influenced the latter."

Here, too, in the snug and substantial, if small, brick house, John Churchman held pleasant converse with those saintly men who came from far and near to gain his advice. Among them the widely-traveled and highly-gifted Samuel Fothergill, Samuel Emlen, the seer, the three Pemberton brothers, from Philadelphia, and doubtless scores of others.

But to resume our story. Near at hand was the other Nottingham and a short distance off our route the house at Colora. On a rise just beyond the Octoraro Creek we saw the little frame chapel, where union services are occasionally held, and which marks the site of a small Friends' Meeting-house, where the Preston family and their neighbors used to worship. We were now near the Friendly centres of Eastland and Penn Hill, and a few miles further on were following down the Conowingo to the Susquehanna River, where on the hilltop just beyond we passed close by the two houses at Darlington. Only a few miles beyond and a little to the north of our road, is the meeting-house at Falston, associated with the interesting story of Wm. Amos; and again a few miles were covered when a fork to the right would have taken us to Gunpowder Meeting-house.

Had we turned from the high road we were following and gone back a few miles either to the north or south at many places along the way, we would have found other Friends' Meeting-houses which would have considerably increased our count.

The call that took us toward Baltimore was, as is already known to most who follow this narrative, the celebration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of Baltimore Yearly Meeting.

The opening session of the Conference found a large company of visitors and residents of the city in the assembly hall. There were, I am told, twenty different Yearly Meetings represented, most of them by accredited delegates. On the raised or gallery benches sat a few Friends who were to take part in the programme and beside them three dignitaries of other churches, who brought greetings from their respective bodies to this notable assemblage.

After a period of reverent silence a touching appeal was made, that all that should be said and done during the sessions of the Conference might be for the furtherance of righteousness (a fitting opening to what was to follow); the first to be introduced to the audience was a representative of the Catholic church in the city, who brought greetings from Archbishop Curley in a letter which was read, reciting "that in Maryland with its religious toleration and beneficial laws, the undisputed work of Catholics, the Quakers found a haven and a sanctuary." History bears out this statement as was alluded to many times. The letter closes, "I can only hope and pray that the good feeling begot centuries ago between the Friends and the Catholics will continue, thus setting the world an example of charity and tolerance which is Christlike."

Hugh Birckhead, of the Episcopal church followed; he claimed for himself direct descent from an ancestor, Christopher Birckhead, whose home on the Choptank River had, two hundred and fifty years ago, been a welcome refuge to George Fox, and in his house a meeting had been appointed. His address was an honest but in no degree a fulsome portrayal of some Quaker traits of character. He said in part: "Quakers in Maryland had maintained themselves because they were, in the first place, of the best English stock; like all Americans they had been sifted by the Atlantic Ocean and of necessity had the qualities of courage, enterprise and faith; and they had developed to high degree that peculiarly American trait of adventure which led them to undertake much and suffer everything for the cause near their hearts. Their great service, aside from material benefactions known of all men, had been that they had taught thoughtful Americans the value of silence. They had taken to themselves the admonition, 'Be still, and know that I am God.'"

Time would not permit for all the sects in Baltimore to be represented on the platform. These two were selected on account of the historic associations dating back to 1672, when the Catholic Calverts welcomed the Quakers to their new-made homes and gave them the one friendly greeting they had thus far received on American soil. However, that all should be included, the expedient was suggested that L. W. McCreary, Executive Secretary of the Baltimore Federation of Churches, should speak for them all. He was very happy in what he had to say, including in his address the following: "In this modern warfare, that we disguise under the name of competition, Christians and non-Christians alike trample on the rights of others in their mad rush for position and wealth. In the midst of this confusion, somewhat like the calm in the centre of a cyclone, moves the Society of Friends, reminding us of the better way. The world would have us think that God has said: 'Be strenuous and know that I am God,' but the Friends still insist on the Biblical expression, 'Be still, and know that I am God.' Wordsworth was right when he said:

The world is too much with us; late and soon
Getting and spending we lay waste our powers.

For one I thank God for a people in this day who, when so much thought is given to outward display, are not ashamed to live plainly and simply."

The main address of the evening was given by Elizabeth B. Emmott, representative from London Yearly Meeting; her subject, "The Founding of Quakerism," gave ample scope for a scholarly presentation of the story of Seventeenth Century Friends, and it received such at her hands. This is one of the papers we hope to publish, at least in part, in a future issue.

Night found the visitors all comfortably provided for, the delegates and many others in the homes of Friends in the city, while others were cared for in two large rooms attached to the meeting-house.

The programme for Sixth-day morning included a long automobile ride, visiting the main places of interest in the city, and including Druid Hill and adjoining parks. We were out from ten to twelve in little parties of four and six, in private cars belonging to members of the meetings.

At noon the delegates were all expected at the new Homewood meeting-house on N. Charles Street, for lunch. In the beautiful committee-rooms to the rear of the main meeting-room, an informal reception was held, when everybody was expected to meet everybody and establish a common basis of comradeship. This was easily done, and the company from this time on became as one large family at home on some anniversary occasion.

The Homewood Meeting-house, one may say in passing, is the last word on Friends' meeting-houses. It is probably the latest built of all the large meeting-houses in America. It is severely plain in its outlines, everything seems to harmonize and suggest simplicity of taste. The atmosphere of the place invites to retirement, though it fronts on one of the most fashionable driveways in the city.

The exercises for the afternoon included first, greetings from the appointed delegates, when representatives of these groups, to the number of ten or more, were ranged along the gallery, and we heard from one after another the messages of greeting from the body at home. London naturally headed the list, and we marched across the continent, one after another, some with remarks a little spicy, others more sombre, till either by speech or presence or letter, we had run the gamut and the little group of Friends in far-off Vancouver ended the list. To some of us this feature of the programme meant much more than a mere greeting, it seemed to carry with it something of a promise for the future—that as we gathered up the story of the past and wove it into the life of the present, there seemed an honest expectation that the future had something in store for our branch of the church of which this gathering was a token.

Frederick J. Libby, of Washington, D. C., closed the afternoon's exercises with an address on "Our Duty to the People."

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

But get the truth once uttered, and 'tis like
A star new-born that drops into its place;
And which, once circling in its placid round,
Not all the tumult of the earth can shake.

—JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

ADVERTISING PROHIBITION.—The outstanding feature in the movement toward the complete suppression of the liquor traffic is the studied effort to discredit Prohibition. This has been going on for many years, but with diminishing effect. The writer remembers well when, less than twenty years ago, it was deemed inadvisable to spell Prohibition with a capital P, even in the columns of THE FRIEND. He remembers the "Facts and Fallacies" advertisement, that ran for months in the Philadelphia Ledger and other papers, and how few and vague were the facts and how many and vague were the fallacies. But in spite of scorn and misrepresentation Prohibition has become a Constitutional law in the United States and in some other countries also. The truth found utterance gradually. It finds utterance still, and do you think that "all the tumult of the earth can shake it?" But the campaign of vilification and falsehood continues at the same time, a campaign such as we have never known before throughout the circuit of the globe. Prohibition seems to be something more now than a theory indulged in by a "bunch of cranks" here in America. (Long-haired men and short-haired women, they were styled). It is advertised gratuitously by the opposition (unwittingly, of course) in every land on earth. Manufacturers of Scotch Whiskey are shouting in half page print to the citizens of Bombay and Calcutta and Ceylon "INDIA BEWARE." Hear what they say, "While pretending to be dry, Pussyfoot Johnson's country is importing thousands of cases of whiskey. Pussyfoot is being financed by men who have full cellars and will go short of nothing. They think you may, perhaps, work harder and make more money for them if you are deprived of the stimulants that they enjoy themselves." What splendid publicity for that fearless expositor of facts and champion of Prohibition, William E. Johnson! What a splendid suggestion to those oppressed Hindoos that men are less easily fatigued when they abstain from whiskey! What conclusive evidence of the mortal fear of those distillers and purveyors of mischief and misery lest the example of the United States be followed by other nations! How contemptible that falsehood about the men and women who stood back of W. E. Johnson!

From another advertisement, also from India, we read, "Do not take your directions from a country that talks prohibition and recommends prohibition, but drinks while it talks." It seems that we have some reputation as believing in prohibition, even if not credited with practising it! The same advertiser says that their goods are on sale in America, "if you know your way about." Thus "by evil report and good report, as deceivers and yet true," the much maligned Prohibitionists are being heard everywhere.

THE MOVEMENT IN MANY LANDS.—From the International Record, edited by Guy Hayler, President of the World Prohibition Federation, we gather many interesting facts regarding the progress of prohibition sentiment and legislation in other countries than our own. The development of thought seems to follow closely the experience of this country. First, agitation and moral suasion; next, various forms of "regulation" and license until the people come to see the absurdity of trying to govern wrong instead of suppress it; then the demand for the right to vote on the question, legislating it out of districts where public sentiment is against it (local option); and finally national prohibition and adequate measures to enforce the law in the hands of public officials who will do their duty.

AUSTRIA AND GERMANY are in the first stage of the movement. The President of the Austrian Republic has declared himself a total abstainer and desirous of aiding the temperance cause. He deplores the waste of money for intoxicants when so many of the people are in dire need of the necessities of life. The Chief of Police of Vienna is greatly impressed with the importance of the drink problem. He says that crowded saloons mean abundance of crime. In Germany the growth and activity of the Temperance forces since the war has so alarmed the brewing interests that an Anti-Prohibition League has been formed to counteract the demand for Local Option.

BELGIUM clings to the past, but lecturers from other countries are finding an increasing openness to hear the subject discussed in Universities and among bodies of students.

BERMUDA.—The Parliament has passed a special law to prevent smuggling liquors into the United States.

BULGARIA has forty or more Students' Temperance Unions working under the approval of the Minister of Education. Up-to-date liquor saloons in twenty or more villages have been abolished and there is talk of the possibility of some towns going "dry."

BRAZIL has gotten so far as to prohibit the sale of intoxicants to persons under twenty-one years of age.

CHILE has a President who by word and act has set a fine idea before the people. He declared publicly that alcoholism is undermining the life of the nation and advised others to uproot their vineyards and plant the ground in walnuts as he had done.

CANADA.—The effort to substitute Government-controlled liquor shops in place of the present Prohibition law was defeated by a narrow majority. The present law allows of the manufacture of liquors (granted by the Parliament of Great Britain) but endeavors to regulate or prevent the sale.

DENMARK has laid a Local Option Bill before its Senate. The Conservative Party has announced its intention of proposing to repeal the war-time restrictions. The International Anti-Alcohol Congress has been invited by the Danish Government to meet next year in Copenhagen.

FRANCE, like Germany, is agitated because of Prohibition in America. All kinds of misrepresentation may be found in French papers, such as the statement that the ban on liquor was lifted in Colorado for thirty days in order to combat an epidemic of fever. However, our distinguished Dr. W. W. Keen, of Philadelphia, says that he found that most of the French surgeons were total abstainers, and that what he said to them in favor of Prohibition was very well received.

HOLLAND has been fighting for a "Direct Vote" (Local Option) measure. The bill passed the Second Chamber by a vote of 39 to 29, but was rejected by the Senate 18 to 17. Here, too, the reports from America were rather fantastic. The state of Ohio was charged with having 50,000 distilleries and 100,000 breweries, more than twenty-five times the total number of either nuisance in this entire country before Prohibition came and closed nearly all of them. It was stated that never before had New York City been in such a state of intoxication as last New Year's Eve. The New York Times had already reported the same evening as "The driest and dearest in the history of the city."

ICELAND, under Prohibition since 1912, has been, under economic pressure of Spain, driven to the question of admitting the importation of Spanish wines. Our latest information does not indicate what the result may be, but the issue had been appealed to the League of Nations as a vicious attempt on the part of a stronger nation to coerce a weaker nation.

IN POLAND the Diet passed a law prohibiting the manufacture of beer containing more than two-and-one-half per cent. alcohol, and limiting the drinking places to one for every 2500 population.

INDIA is not asleep. Several of the Independent States have adopted Prohibition. Nepal has had it for two years and has made the law permanent. Limbri has adopted such a law, but the British authorities have permitted the opening of several liquor shops and a brewery just across the State boundary and this of course causes trouble. Bhavnagar adopted Prohibition three years ago, but arranged that each year one-third of the liquor shops be closed, so that the full operation of the law would be delayed until last year. The law went into full effect Eleventh Month 1, 1921. Hyderabad, the largest State in India, population 13,500,000, has a modified form of Prohibition. All revenue from the traffic has been abolished and steps taken to secure its ultimate extinction. Two other states are similarly situated. India, but not Great Britain, has what we call Local Option, the right to vote itself dry. Under the advice of her great native leader, Ghandi, many have adopted total abstinence. It remains to be seen what will be the final attitude of British interests.

SWITZERLAND.—The citizens enjoy the right of Constitutional Initiative. In other words, if 50,000 male citizens propose an amendment to the Constitution, it must be submitted to popular vote. In this way the beverage, absinthe, was submitted to vote in 1908 and prohibited. Last year an Initiative was launched to obtain for municipalities the right to prohibit the sale and manufacture of distilled liquor. There were 146,000 voters who signed the appeal. Naturally the liquor interests are alarmed, but the question is before the Parliament and a vote must be taken not later than next year. Both sides are organizing for a strenuous campaign. Both facts and falsehoods about America will be in great demand.

SWEDEN has decided to submit controversial questions to a vote of the people, so that here, too, a vote on Prohibition may be expected soon.

NORWAY has a form of Prohibition now, and we may add, is likely to have the substance not many years hence. "Fourteen per cent." is not likely to satisfy either the drinking man or the prohibitionist very long, even though the money-maker may think it altogether lovely.

THE WHITE MAN'S CURSE threatens every land. It is certainly the White Man's duty to lead the struggling people in their endeavor to wipe it out. To America they all are looking for proof of the wisdom and possibility of Prohibition. Shame and disgrace will be ours, if in their eyes the light of high resolve is dimmed or if we trail in the dust the golden hopes of men.

BUT WHAT CAN I DO?—This is the natural and sensible question. It calls for a sensible and serious reply, for there is no one of us that does not at some time or in some place count for much. Business people in active life count for much all the time in proportion to the number and nature of their contacts with others. First of all let us be centres of hopefulness. Let us cling to the belief that "Right the day will win." Let no man hear us doubt. In the second place, let us not be carried about by every newspaper headline or cynical speaker that seems to discredit our cause. When an individual lies to us and we find him out, we question his veracity at once. If he does so twice, we classify him and thereafter question everything he tells us. Why not so with the public press? Why not so with the people who are in one way or another interested in the continuance of the liquor business? In the third place, let us gather some well-established facts and use them to spike falsehoods and misrepresentations. What does the opposition want most to accomplish right now, and right here in America? First, they want to make people think that Prohibition is unenforceable. That is the big task for them, not only here but in every land. Their leaders are not stupid. They are malicious. They rejoice in every successful infraction of the law. They are the last people in the land to want the law to be given a fair trial. They are adroit. They will help elect a reputable candidate and persuade him that it is expedient to "license" saloons to sell "vinous, spirituous, malt and other liquors containing less than one-half of one per cent. alcohol." And then they will declare to the public that behind the screened apartments of these "licensed" saloons all kinds of intoxicating liquors are being sold, and that "You can't stop it." They make the enforcement of the law as difficult as possible and then rejoice in its violation. Why? Because if it can be enforced, their case is lost. Its benefits are apparent in proportion to the measure of its observance. Let us say to honest questioners, We have marriage laws that are violated shamefully, but who wants them repealed? Or who goes about declaring "The law is unenforceable, it should be abolished or made of no effect?" This Prohibition Law is being enforced more and more successfully all the time. The Volstead Act is a sensible measure. No modification is desirable if Prohibition is what we want. Let us remember that there have been 10,000 convictions (not simply indictments) during the past nine months for infractions of the Eighteenth Amendment. Let us remember that in dollars and cents the Commissioner of Enforcement is turning over to the Government as much or more through fines and confiscations as the entire cost of his Department. Let us not be deceived by statements about negligible advantages, increase in crime, etc. There has not been an increase in crime over five years ago. Prohibition has reduced insanity and drunkenness. Get the facts about New York City. Prohibition, even partially enforced, is working wonders in reducing vagrancy and disorder and increasing bank deposits. "Let no man deceive you with vain words."

There are some honest doubters for whom we must have regard and be tender. Their doubts arise from ignorance. They think, perhaps, that evil can be "regulated," or made economically productive. Such persons, if honest, can be won to our side by patience and information rightly applied.

Ours is the future grand and great,
The long appeal of Truth to time.

SUNSET IN MONTANA.

O'er plains and hills and stretches bare,
And valleys where they fall,
The sun is smiling to his rest,
And glory covers all.
The plains are crowned with icy snow,
For miles their sheen is bright,
The hills stand brown and—sentinel
To watch through coming night.

The snows blush deep with radiance
Reflected from the skies,
Ablaze with banners, many-hued,
As daylight pales and dies,
A conflagration in the heavens,
Deep seas of flame and gold,
Sandbars in stretches, green and gray,
From purpling mists unfold.

No pen can tell. No artist paint,
Nor lyre sweet and low,
Can sing the story as it is,
When twilights come and go.
The young moon hangs in vault of blue,
The stars in millions meet;
And we, poor human mites, with souls
Must worship at His feet.

Creator of the sun and moon,
Of stars and radiance bright,
Of hill and plain and valley dim,
Lord of all power and might,
Tune our poor harps to sing Thy praise,
In rapturous melody;
Thou who hast made earth beautiful,
What must Thy Heaven be!

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

MISSIONARY OR PIRATE?

For a year he was an officer of white troops; then in 1863 the Northern government adopted the plan of arming the Negroes. The idea at once appealed to Armstrong, and the fact that the Southern leaders had promised no quarter and no rights of war to the colored troops and their officers, was only a further spur to his plans. After a very difficult test, he was appointed Lieutenant-Colonel of a colored regiment. "The African is before the world," he wrote to a friend, "all mankind watching whether he will show himself equal to his opportunity—that is to be a man. They are too noble for slaves. I gladly lend myself to the experiment."

How he loved them, Armstrong thought. Once he had served them as a duty, now there was nothing in the world he would rather be than an officer of colored troops. He had believed in them and they had justified his belief. In smartness, discipline and courage, they had proved themselves the equal of any troops, and the Ninth—Armstrong's regiment—was the crack regiment of the colored line.

After one battle a truce was declared to pick up the wounded, and Armstrong found himself discussing the war with three Southern commanders. "I cannot see," said one of them, "why you are fighting to force the Union on an unwilling people."

"The Union is nothing to me," Armstrong replied; "I see only four million slaves!"

Armstrong leaned on the ship's rail and looked out over the calm waters of the Mexican Gulf. He was tired of inactivity. It was 1865 and the Civil War was at an end, but his regiment had been sent on an uninteresting expedition to Mexico.

The sails of the troopship barely moved, and in the still evening air the plaintive singing of Negro melodies came up clearly from the foremast—

They look like men, they look like men,
They look like men of war.

The voices turned Armstrong's thoughts to the people he had learned to love. "Poor souls, what will become of them?" he asked himself.

Four million colored people suddenly brought out of slavery into freedom, hardly any of them able to write or knowing a skilled trade, always accustomed to do only what they were told—and now thrown on their own resources! It was hard to know what would become of them. Many of them believed that the government that had set them free would find them all work and food.

And yet, Armstrong thought, they were so lovable and so ready to follow a good leader. Then another thought came to him. What was he going to do himself now that the war was over?

The sun was setting across the sea, flinging a path of gold to the ship. Sunset across the sea! It reminded him of his boyhood days in Honolulu. How far away they appeared! Those twenty years seemed nothing like so long as the last few years had been. His thoughts went off in dreams of those old days, the day when he and his brother had found a new waterfall and had scrambled round its basin till they got behind it, the day when his father had had to interrupt his sermon to stop a fight between them, the school days at Oahu College, when he had learned not only to study, but to toil.

Suddenly a vision came to him born out of all his thoughts. The Negroes, himself, his Hawaiian school!

He knew now what he wanted to do. He would try to do for the Negroes what his father had done for the South Sea Islanders in his school. He would teach them to be free men.

The sun dipped and sank in a golden sea, and night fell with the suddenness of the tropics, blotting out the crimson splendors of the sky—but never again did that splendid vision fade from the heart of Samuel Armstrong.

The Director of the newly-formed Freedmen's Bureau took the card which his clerk handed to him. "General Armstrong," he read. In another minute, he had risen to shake hands with his visitor. He had heard of the ability of this absurdly young General, and as he looked at the square shoulders and keen eye and alert vigor of the man before him, he understood it.

"I want to do something for the Negroes," Armstrong began. "Have you a job for me?"

The Director paused, then said: "There are ten thousand refugees at Hampton, and we cannot manage them. No one has had any success in keeping them straight. General Howard thinks you might try it."

It was settled at once, and in a short time Armstrong found himself superintending the relief of the bewildered and almost destitute Negroes.

Then the chance of his life came. It was decided to open an industrial school for the Negroes at Hampton, and he was asked to be the Principal. He accepted. "It is my life-work," he said.

Very quickly the Hampton Institute grew—new schools, new classes, more and more teachers, and yet always more scholars applying than could be taken in. And the life and soul of everything was Samuel Armstrong, working from morning till night amongst his pupils, or rushing from one end of America to another, to win help and enthusiasm for his college.

"I may not see the results," he wrote to a friend, "but the fun of life is in action, not in result. It's a man's work. I wonder so few men have taken it up."

But Armstrong was happiest of all when he sat by the fire—side at Hampton surrounded by the students who loved and worshipped him.

"Whatever you can do," he said to them one evening, "do it as well as you can. Never despair. Once a woodchuck was chased by a fox, and it came to a tree. Now a woodchuck can't climb trees. But that woodchuck had to climb or die! So it climbed!" A smile ran round the fire-lit faces and the keen voice went on: "Do the best you can for the world. That is what Hampton stands to teach us—how to love, how to labor, how to teach others."—ARTHUR P. SHEPHERD, in Everland. Selected by F. T. Rhoads.

WHAT IS FAITH IN THE DEITY OF CHRIST?

A recent issue of the Interpreter contains a thoughtful article on the ethical meaning of faith in the deity of Christ, by C. F. Russell, who has just been elected Hulsean Lecturer. Intellectual assent to a proposition seems to him to have little value in comparison with ethical allegiance to a person or an ideal. There is, he is sure, an orthodox belief in the Deity of Christ which is barren and cold. Such orthodoxy has no value in his eyes. For him faith in the Incarnation is an acknowledgment that love—such love as the life of Jesus exhibited—is the essence of the nature of God. In making this acknowledgment he gives his assent to the absolute demand that love makes upon his own obedience. In an eloquent passage he asks:—

"Who is it that believes today in the Divinity of Christ? Is it not the man whose whole soul goes out in unreserved acceptance of the supremacy of love? Such a definition would include many who do not assume the name of Christian; many who, because they stumble at the creeds, would feel, and might even be told, that they had no place at a Christian eucharist; many who within the last few years have fought and died for an ideal, for the love of country, for the love of comrades, and yet have stood resolutely outside the churches. Can we doubt that such men acknowledge the Divinity of Christ in the only way in which He would Himself wish such acknowledgment to be made the test of discipleship? The majesty of love has them in thrall.

"There is a negative side to our conclusion as well. However loudly and clearly a man may recite the creed, he does not really believe this great doctrine of the faith if he does not consciously accept the supremacy of love, whether as revealing the nature of God or as constituting the ideal and principle of true human life. The man who honestly thinks that in the last resort force is mightier than love, whether it be in the affairs of individual men or of nations, does not believe in the Divinity of Christ. The man who deliberately values wealth above opportunity of service, whether for himself or for his friends, does not believe in the Divinity of Christ. In a word, we deny that He is Divine whenever we set anything save love on the throne of the universe or of the individual heart.

"The practical question is not, How did God become man? nor is it, Is Jesus Christ God? It is, What is God like? For the Christian, Jesus Christ is the answer to that question. Here both Traditionalists and Modernists are in absolute agreement. Is not that enough? St. Philip is recorded to have said, 'Shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us.' And Christ replied, 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father.' Why should the Traditionalist demand more from the Modernist than sufficed an Apostle?—Reprinted at the Suggestion of WM. LITTLEBY.

HOLDING festival, then, in our whole life, persuaded that God is altogether on every side present, we cultivate our fields, praising; we sail the sea, hymning; in all the rest of our conversation we conduct ourselves according to rule. The complete Christian then is very closely allied to God, being at once grave and cheerful in all things—grave on account of the bent of his soul towards the Divinity, and cheerful on account of his consideration of the blessings of humanity which God hath given us.—CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

At the annual meeting of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, held in Philadelphia on the 12th and 13th inst., "America and the Rehabilitation of Europe" was the subject for discussion, and as might have been expected a considerable variety and some very sharp divergences of opinion were expressed. Finance, Reparations and Russia were naturally the questions most in the forefront.

A readjustment and stabilization of exchange values was shown to be essential to relieve the uncertainty of present-day business and to restore the free interchange of trade which is necessary for the distribution of work between the nations. To-day, so-called vanquished countries have the advantage of being able to compete with the so-called victors and neutrals because the punitive measures used against this first group have so lowered the values of their currency that their labor is working for a substantially lower return in world market values. The revision of Reparation demands to a basis possible of fulfillment is urgently needed and then must follow the practice of economy by all countries, which must largely be achieved through the reduction of armaments both on sea and on land.

As might be expected not all the speakers were ready either to reduce the burden of the German reparation debt or to insist that France reduce her armed forces on land. Such speakers as objected seemed to have a fear of German revenge through aid from Russia or lack of good faith in the German intentions to do their best to settle if a possible figure were arrived at. It was encouraging, however, to note that these views were held only by a minority.

But there was more difference of opinion on the question of the recognition of the present Russian Government. A war of credit or nations to collect their debts unless America aided in the restoration of Russian credit by recognition, was the fear of Paxton Hibben. But to certain of the speakers such recognition cannot be given because they feel a real danger to the world in recognizing a government based on communistic theories. English Walling's attempt to show organized labor as opposed to Russian recognition was too much for the sense of humor of the English, French and German women who are here to speak in the interest of peace. His view is the official view of the American Federation of Labor. Recent expressions from local groups of A. F. of L. members over the country were shown by a speaker from the floor to be not in accord with the pronouncement of the National organization. Annot Robinson of England and Thérèse Pottecher-Arnould of France, had no doubt that organized labor in their countries favored prompt recognition. Such a statement from the German visitor was not needed.

It was generally conceded that American help is needed for the rehabilitation of Europe, although at least one speaker felt that there was no question of Europe's recovery without it—that would, however, require more time. The moral support of America in a League of Nations, its presence at discussions and important conferences, and the cancellation of our debts from Europe, provided European countries would do certain things to put their own house in order, and the extension of substantial credits by us to Europe for rehabilitation purposes were dwelt upon at considerable length.

Many seemed to feel that we were wise to stay away from Genoa, although the opinion was expressed that the failure of Genoa, if it fails, will be chargeable to our lack of support. Some favored and some opposed our cancelling war debts. Representative John Jacob Rogers of Massachusetts carefully reviewed the possibilities of financial assistance and showed that the only financial aid likely was such private loans as might be secured through a building up of American confidence in European credit. He showed that our foreign investments this year during the first three-and-a-half months averaged $100,000,000 a month. For any other form of financial assistance America is not ready and is not soon likely to be, was his view.

Huston Thompson, Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, advocated an international Trade Commission as an effective method of greatly reducing commercial friction between countries. It would seem that such a commission might do much to help raise the business standard of the world and indeed might in time develop in a way that would help to adjust commercial rivalries. There is certainly a big field for American co-operation through its moral influence as such a commission.

Annot Robinson of England showed more clearly than any other speaker the extent to which the subject affected the life and blood of the people of Europe. The future of these peoples can best be advanced by insuring them peace. The burden of taxation which is being carried by them may be reduced by radical reductions in armaments. With so many distressing symptoms of unrest in the world, it is clearly the duty of all to bend themselves to the subject of helping one another; and nations must stand ready to help other nations to get on a basis on which life may have in it more of hope and joy for peoples in one's own country as well as in another. Let us all face the problems with a sense of responsibility, for all must share a responsibility for a world situation which cannot be escaped by feeling that it belongs to one or several nations or one or several men.

After attending the session of this meeting one has a feeling that there is a great hope in the earnest way in which many men are striving to find the solutions to present-day world problems.

THE FAMINE IN RUSSIA.

To Friends has come another opportunity to carry our message of love to the destitute and the despairing. Famine in Russia opens to us a field for our brotherly service that we cannot ignore. In the face of this great need, our sympathy and willingness to sacrifice fail, we have ceased to follow Christ's way of life.

The great plague of Russia is upon her people, hunger, from which they and their fathers before them have never been able to escape. In Ninth Month hundreds were dying of starvation and thousands were stoically awaiting death. Anna Haines brings a tale of horror such as we associate with other times. At every railway station and every landing stage on the Volga she saw the camps of the peasants who had fled from their homes before the famine. They lived as best they could—eating indescribable food, cutting meat from their dead animals, and making bread from powdered grass, leaves and horses' hoofs. Scurvy, cholera and malaria attacked them. They huddled in the street corners and died there. Their orphaned children ran wild with neither friends nor relatives to take them in. They begged incessantly for "just a bit of bread," which no one could give them. Everywhere were dead horses and scrapped farm machinery, more precious than human life to the peasant. The children's homes were filled with wailing babies for whom there was no milk—only grass bread and meat, no bedcovers, no soap, no medicine. All the nurses were sick with malaria and dysentery. There was a nightly gathering of corpses for burial in a common grave, as in the days of plague. Death was everywhere. Children were being sent to the districts where there was food, in an effort to save their lives. The old men said, "We do not care about ourselves, we shall die soon anyway, but we do not want our villages to die, and even the young people cannot eat this winter unless you help them."

Even as he starved, the peasant was putting into the ground the seed wheat which the Government was sending him. He puts the seed of his village before his own life and plants the seed that next year the living may reap a harvest. Are we to show less love for our fellow-men than these simple peasants? We are not asked to give life, only a part of our abundance.

We ask you to arouse the members of your meeting to a realization of this need. We also go further and ask you to appeal to the people of your community and urge them with hearts freed from prejudice to respond to this distant but appealing cry for help. Though the task of giving is not today a light one, yet each can give something. Pledges for small amounts are to be accepted. A dollar a month is the difference between life and death to a Russian. Food is the greatest need, but clothing is also needed, and soap and medicine.

Through meetings, through personal appeals, through every channel open to us, it must be brought home to the American people that it lies in their power to save hundreds of thousands from death by starvation and disease. We must act at once. Each day's delay brings death to untold numbers. Russia is looking to us for aid and we must not fail her. Surely this is the way in which Christ calls us to His service:

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

[This paper has been adapted from a circular issued not long since by a body of Friends abroad.—Eds.]

NOW THEN CHILDREN.

There are hungry children in Russia who are crying for your help. What will you do for them? We cannot realize in this country how terribly they are suffering. Famine is a thing unknown to American boys and girls, but it is not the first time that it has afflicted the people of Russia. Probably you all know how alarmed we were in this country when the droughts lasted so long that the farmers feared that the crops would all be ruined. In Russia it was so much worse than here that millions of people are starving.

In this country the farmers have methods of irrigation which partly helped to save the crops from the heat; but Russian farmers depend largely on the snow for giving the ground the necessary moisture. Did you know that two-thirds of the moisture required in Russia comes from snow, and only one-third from rain? Well, just think what it meant, when, instead of the country being under snow for a large part of the year, the sun streamed down and parched the land!

It would not have been so bad in ordinary times, with all the people working hard, and with the usual free exchange of goods with other countries; but do not forget that Russia has been at war ever since 1914, and it has been but a short time since fighting has stopped. That means that very little was being produced; all the energy of the people—whether they wished it or not—was used up in fighting.

We may think that very foolish and very wrong; but it is no use having thoughts like that when people are starving. Our first thought should be: How can we help them? Men and women working for the Friends tell heart-breaking stories of the suffering of old and young—of little children so weak and hungry that they do not even cry, but wait quietly for death.

They have had a quarter-pound of bread a day, and what do you think it is made of? Nothing but dried leaves, a few acorns, sunflower seeds and dirt. It is horrible to look at, to taste and to smell, and of course it has very little value as food. I could tell you many terrible stories about the famine—stories which would make you unhappy—but instead of doing that, I will tell you what is being done to help and how you can help, and in helping will come happiness.

Friends have had workers in Russia ever since Second Month, 1920, where they have been doing all they can to help the institutions for children. In Moscow alone they have been feeding 16,000 children, and large quantities of milk, fats, medicines, clothing, rice, etc., have been distributed among the people who needed it most. The Russian Government has established splendid institutions for the care of children, and when parents are too poor to keep their children at home, they take them to these institutions, where they are looked after—educated, clothed and fed. Many of them are situated in beautiful forest surroundings; they have kind and clever teachers and doctors and nurses, but food and clothing and medicines are terribly lacking.

We have been collecting money with which we purchase food, and medicines, and clothes, and they go out to the starving and half-naked people of Russia as fast as ships can take them. Will you not also help in this work by giving some of your pocket money and persuading your friends to do the same?

Another way in which you can help is by knitting and making-up garments at home, or in sewing and knitting circles. Remember that all clothes, so long as they are quite clean and ready for immediate use, will be most valuable. Boots of all sizes, shoes and stockings, bed-linen, blankets, rugs, old curtains, which could be used for covering—in fact, any good, clean material will be useful, and should be sent to the Warehouse.

Now, then, once more you have a chance to show that American boys and girls will always respond to a call for their help, no matter where it comes from. We depend on you, and we know we shall not be disappointed.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

CALN QUARTERLY MEETING.—It was with a feeling of pleasure at the promise of a soul-satisfying feast that we viewed the well-filled gallery benches at Caln Quarterly Meeting, held at Coatesville, Fifth Month 12, 1922.

Sometimes there have been many vacant places in these gallery seats, and to some of us this has been a matter of sadness and regret. But, with the presence of some of the Visitation Committee, as well as of other visiting Friends, we felt that our meeting was a particularly blessed one.

The keynote of the whole meeting, voiced in various ways by our visitors, was one of helpful sympathy with us in our problems and difficulties, and of encouragement for us in our efforts and aspirations.

After Edward Binns had appeared most earnestly in supplication, Annette Greene Vay spoke of our duty in helping to carry out the prayer, "Thy Kingdom come." This should be our first duty, even ahead of seemingly important household and other cares.

Paul Maier most urgently called our attention to our duties to those not in membership with us, and who might perhaps desire to worship with us in our way, but who misunderstand our not proselyting, and who think they are not welcome among us.

After several other Friends had given their messages, the business of the meeting was taken up. Some extracts from the Yearly Meeting Minutes were read, and there was some discussion on the question of birthright membership. Several expressed opinions, but the general sentiment appeared to be that this Quarterly Meeting did not care to go on record at this time as advocating any change in our customs in regard to this matter.

Several voiced the feeling that the presence of the Visitation Committee had been very acceptable, and a cordial invitation was extended to them to mingle further with us.

A. W. D.

WESTERN QUARTERLY MEETING.—Western Quarterly Meeting was held Fifth Month 19th at West Grove on Standard Time. Heavy rain in the early morning may have prevented some from attending. A solemn silence soon spread over the assembly which continued for a considerable time. It was broken by a member of the Yearly Meeting Visitation Committee, who referred feelingly to the situation of Job, who, when he ceased considering his own case and prayed for his friends, found relief from his own condition; there was an application in situations today, where in service for others we gain strength ourselves.

We were reminded of a faith that overcomes the world, also of a lesser faith which is overcome by the world; to which class do we belong? There were other messages to edification.

In the business session, considerable time was occupied in reading from the Minutes of the late Yearly Meeting, the Clerk referring particularly to matters which affected this section of the Church.

Appreciation was expressed in having present members of the Yearly Meeting Committee on Visitation. Friends who were appointed a year ago to co-operate with the Extension Committee were asked to enlarge the scope of their work so as to include association and co-operation with the Visiting Committee. It is earnestly hoped that a renewal of interest in our small meetings for worship may be one of the outcomes of the newly appointed Yearly Meeting Committee.

After luncheon a good-sized audience again assembled in the meeting-room to listen to Alfred C. Garrett whose main topic was Bible reading in the family; he referred to the general apathy on the part of the Protestant churches in general towards religious teaching; Friends were perhaps not more lax than other denominations though the latter seem to expect us to be examples in the matter of family worship and Bible reading.

Alfred C. Garrett said that one of the principal features in Bible reading was a period of silent devotion before engaging in the reading; he suggested practical methods by which children are made a part of this wholesome practice; this is an important feature. There was some general discussion, after which Friends separated.

Surely, any one if asked, would have responded that it was good to have attended Western Quarterly Meeting to-day.

THE RECORDING OF MINISTERS.

On a warm, drowsy First-day afternoon at Westtown, nearly twenty years ago, the boys and girls, coming into meeting, noticed in the gallery a Friend from West Chester, whose stern exterior and rather brusque manner failed signally in concealing the Christian kindness that flowed so strong beneath. The meeting settled into silence, with the song of the thrushes, down in the South Woods, coming in through the open windows. Suddenly, silently, Thomas Whitson stood up and then thundered forth his opening sentence, which few of those who heard him are ever likely to forget: "There's Thomas Whitson! Now we may expect a sermon!" He went on, of course, to explain how this thought had doubtless been in the minds of many of us as we entered the room and saw a stranger sitting there. Of course it had been. Our meetings were practically always silent, unless visitors were present. Then he showed us how this was not what ought to be occupying our minds, that we were there to worship, not to hear preaching, and that our waiting ought to be upon the Lord, and not simply for some one to speak.

Just so far as we come to lean upon those who are looked upon as ministers in our meetings, to that degree do our meetings fail of attaining the true spirit of worship for which they were established. Our religion becomes, to that extent at least, something which we relegate to others to attend to for us. We have forthwith the essential condition for germinating the conception of a special, priestly group and the distinction of "clergy" and "laity."

Many are realizing this strongly these days, and when the subject of worship and ministry is discussed, the advisability of ceasing to "record" ministers is often suggested. We know that in many Quarterly Meetings in England the practice has been discontinued, and that more recently the Race Street meetings have united in giving it up. Many are calling in question what to them appears undemocratic and inconsistent, without always giving evidence that they understand clearly just what it is they are condemning.

In that treasure-trove of curious information, Michener's "Retrospect of Early Quakerism," it is evident from various extracts from early eighteenth-century minute-books that the "recommending" of ministers was originally something quite different from what it has since become. Young ministers in the outlying meetings, feeling that they would profit by being able to attend the meetings of ministers and elders in Philadelphia, would apply to their meetings for credentials, so that, when they appeared in the city, unknown perhaps to any of the older and more experienced Friends whose help and counsel they were seeking, they might be admitted to the "school of the prophets" without demur or any feeling that they were intruding where they had no right. Whether this practice was abused is not clear, but little by little the initiative shifted over to the meeting itself and the "recording" became what it is to-day, the acknowledgment of the meeting's belief in the bestowal of a gift.

That is all it is, yet it is something so easily misunderstood. It acknowledges a supposed "gift in the ministry," nothing more. It carries with it nothing in the nature of "ordination," but serves simply as the meeting's confirmation of one's own deepest conviction, giving the person concerned the encouragement and backing of his friends in what to him is a most sacred and serious work. Those who have known the value and help of a "minute" from one's meeting, when traveling in communities or countries where one is a stranger, will readily perceive that the practice of acknowledging ministers simplifies distinctly the exceedingly delicate task of granting or withholding such certificates. And the holding of a separate meeting of ministers and elders ought not to be looked upon as an exclusive gathering of persons of superior piety (which the unfortunate expression "select meeting" undoubtedly connotes in many minds), but rather as a time when difficulties or problems, often of a very personal and intimate sort, can be faced and gone over by those to whom the ministry in our meetings is a matter of special concern, in a manner quite impossible during an open business meeting.

If the meeting or its members attach any more importance than that to the practice of acknowledging ministers, it is a grave mistake. If the recording of ministers tends to create a special class, the fault lies elsewhere than in the simple act of acknowledging a gift.

We tend to exaggerate the importance of this act, and we exaggerate the significance of the "gallery." Surely it is unnecessary to point out that the origin of a gallery arose from a consideration of purely practical convenience: it is easier to speak and easier to listen when the speaker faces his audience and is raised a little above them. No one should attach one bit more importance to the gallery than that.

It is the fashion to-day to declaim against galleries as undemocratic; if you could know the feelings of some of those who sit in them, you would not cherish such ideas long! The only practical substitute is the arrangement of the seats in a meeting-house in the form of a hollow square. But this doesn't do away with a "gallery bench"! Someone has to close the meeting, and soon the particular bench upon which that Friend sits (with the person beside him, whose hand he shakes) comes to acquire the same false sacredness that existed before. I've seen this tried out, and I know how it works.

As long as we have galleries in our meeting-houses (and changing the interior architecture would be a costly process in our older structures), we must have those who are willing to go and sit in them. Nothing to me is more discouraging, on entering a meeting, than to sit facing an array of empty or nearly empty gallery benches. It looks somehow as if the life of the meeting were ebbing rapidly away, even when in reality this may not be the case at all. But do not attach any importance to those seats. To a true Friend, it makes not the slightest difference where he sits.

Finally, don't attach too much importance to the recording of ministers. One reason why this tends to be the case is that it is practically the one active gift to be acknowledged. (The gift of eldership goes so hand-in-hand with the ministry that in this connection I am not separating them.) Here lies a solution of the problem. The late William Charles Braithwaite, in an admirable discussion of this subject in a recent number of Friends' Quarterly Examiner, proposed a far more general acknowledging and recording of other spiritual gifts in a meeting. He pleaded not for abolishing the system of recording ministers, not for a democracy secured by a "levelling-down" to the dead-line of the congregation, but for one obtained by a process of "levelling-up." We are all "select members," for each has his special gift. W. C. Braithwaite writes:

"... We are told in the Book of Discipline [of London Yearly Meeting] 'to consider how far the varied needs of the congregation are met by a corresponding variety in the vocal ministry, so that young and old, instructed and uneducated, may be alike edified by means of a due exercise of a diversity of spiritual gifts.' This implies much more than an interest in the ministry in our meetings for worship, it implies a readiness to encourage and promote anything that makes for the improvement of congregational life or the expression of our message to others. . . . You may say that I am deserting my subject of the recording of ministers. I am only broadening it to mean the recognition of all forms of ministry, the recognition of spiritual gifts, and, unless we have this deep need clearly in our minds as the substance of the whole question, I think our discussion will be only a titling of mint and anise and cummin and as likely as not to lead to false conclusions. This recognition is a question of atmosphere and proper cultivation of gifts by suitable arrangements corresponding to the varied conditions and spiritual soil found in the different meetings. . . ."

This point of view, rightly understood, will help decidedly, I believe, to clear up our problem.

THE NEGRO POPULATION IN THE UNITED STATES.

Now that the World War is a thing of the past and our people are living in their more usual manner, it is interesting to note the situation of the 10,463,000 colored people in the United States.

We are familiar with their great war time migration to the North due to ill treatment in the South, and to the boll weevil, which destroyed the Southern crops, and to the large opportunity for work in the Northern cities and in the Northern industrial plants. In what condition has the war left them? Where are they now located?

The Negroes are not increasing as rapidly as the white people. Their increase in this country during the past ten years was a little over six per cent. The per cent. of increase among the white people during the same time has been sixteen per cent. in spite of the fact that during the war, migration from abroad was almost entirely stopped and that some of our foreign population migrated to Europe.

These facts, however, are not more interesting than is the movement of the Negro population. In this country in 1860 seven and seven-tenths of the colored people lived in our Northern States, in comparison with fourteen and eight-tenths, or nearly twice as many, in 1920. In other words, at the present time 1,550,000 of the 10,463,000 colored people live in the North. This condition is made still more clear as we study the situation in detail. For example, during the years 1910-20, the colored population of some of the Southern States actually decreased. The decrease of the colored population in Delaware during the ten years was 846; in Kentucky, 25,718; in Tennessee, 21,330; in Alabama, 7630; in Mississippi, 74,303, and in Arkansas, 13,617; while in all of these States the white population actually increased from eight to eighteen per cent. In none of the other Southern States, excepting West Virginia, which is not altogether Southern, and which is a mining State, did the Negro population increase more than nine and four-tenths, while in these same States the white population increased from twelve to forty-five per cent.

In contrast with this there have been rapid increases in colored population in the States of the North. For example, in New York State, the increase during the ten years which we have been considering has been from 134,000 to 198,000; in Pennsylvania from 194,000 to 284,000, in Ohio, from 111,000 to 185,000, in Illinois from 109,000 to 182,000 and in Michigan from 15,000 to 60,000, or to estimate this increase by percentage, the increases have been in the five states mentioned, forty-eight, forty-six, sixty-seven, sixty-seven and three hundred. These are the states with the largest increase, but others show a similar tendency.

The meaning of these figures seems to be fairly clear, namely, that there has been a tendency for the colored population to decrease in the Southern States in proportion to the white population, but to increase rapidly in the North. Peoples move so slowly and developments are so gradual that it is impossible to tell what the future will be, but it looks as if in future time, the question of the colored people will no longer be a peculiarly Southern question, but that it will be distributed over all of the United States. Of course, this change will be slow, and there may be reversals to this tendency, but present indications point in this way. Although this may seem to many in the North to present difficulties, and although we may wonder as to the effect on our own neighborhoods of an increased colored population, yet it is evident, when considered from the broad point of view, that a people such as the colored people who are not increasing as rapidly as the whites will present fewer difficulties in the future to our country as a whole if they are distributed so that there is not an overwhelming proportion in certain communities. Their voting strength in many states will enable them to defend their rights, which in some places the white politicians seem to be so ready to take away from them, and, on the other hand, they will not present in other places such a large proportion of ignorant and purchasable votes that those, who are seeking to improve the evils of corrupt political machinery, despair partly on account of them. We may be sure, also, that as the colored population comes into contact gradually in different places with a constantly superior school system and with other surroundings, that are better than it usually has at the present time, it will improve.

It has been said that the movement of the Negro from the South, is partly because he is not succeeding as a farmer. A study of the United States Census of 1920, however, does not seem to confirm this. If, for example, we take into account the increase of acreage of farms from 1910-20 which are operated by colored farmers, we find that the Negro acreage has increased, while the white acreage has decreased, in the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Louisiana. Only in Florida, Mississippi, Arkansas and Oklahoma has the acreage of colored farmers decreased while the acreage of the white farmers has increased. There has been a decrease in the acreage of both colored and white farmers in Delaware, Maryland, Georgia, Kentucky, Tennessee and Alabama, while in Texas there has been an increase for both groups.

When we consider the percentage of increase of white and colored farmers during these ten years we find that the relationships which we have just noted in acreage are not very different. In North Carolina, South Carolina, Arkansas and Texas there is some slight increase in the percentage of the colored farmers as compared with the white. In Florida, Alabama, Mississippi and Oklahoma the increase is in favor of the whites. In the other Southern States there is very little change in the relative percentages.

It is probably not because they have been particularly unsuccessful as farmers that the drift of the colored people has been to the North and to the cities. Their drift toward the cities has not been materially different from that of the white population, and it has probably been because of increase of industrial opportunity, and because of educational and other advantages especially when contrasted with their ill treatment in certain sections of the South. We have in the North, at the present time, the largest Negro city populations in the world. The largest Negro population among the cities of the South is in New Orleans with approximately 100,000; the next is Birmingham, with 70,000. In contrast to this the Negro population of New York City is 152,000, Philadelphia, 134,000, Washington 100,000, Chicago 100,000 and Baltimore 108,000.

To those who see in this only social and economic significance, it is interesting, but to others it has significance that is even deeper. It seems as one considers the development of the movements of peoples and nations over the whole world and the gradual increase in civilization and in moral standards and religious ideals from the time before there was history until the present time, a natural part of God's plan for the development of all of his peoples and for teaching them to live in closer harmony with each other.

JAPANESE NOTES.

Tokyo Address, 30 Kouncho Mita Shiba, Tokyo.
BIZENMACHI, Mito, Japan.
Third Month 17, 1922.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

Just before packing away the Edison-Dick Mimeograph, for moving to Tokyo I want to write you another letter. I would like to sit down and write to each and all of you with a pen, so that you might feel a more personal touch with us, but you can readily see how many hours of work that would entail. So please consider this just as personal and informal as you can.

Since this letter is to go to some of the members of our Philadelphia Mission Board, I wish to say in the beginning how much we have appreciated this mimeograph. It would have been quite impossible to carry on the correspondence we have without it. It does such good work and is so little trouble, too, that it is a joy to work with it. I said we are thankful because not only our household but all members of the Mission have access to it. Rosamond Clark has done two large pieces of work on it for other members of the Mission. We are suggesting that the machine be installed in Rosamond's room, with her typewriter and other office equipment which we have and which can be assembled for her.

For the past month and more we have been quite busy with farewell parties. You know how famous the Japanese are for this sort of thing. It is difficult to tell how much of this is due to custom and how much is really meant. But as long as the "foreigner" does not know he may assume that it is meant and feel good correspondingly. We had to give some of these parties, too, and I am sure we did not do it because of any subjection to Japanese social custom. We wanted to express, in even a small way, our appreciation of the extraordinary kind treatment we have received while in Mito. Our dinners fell into five general groups: dinners or entertainments for business men and officials who attend the "Mito Social Club," for teachers of the Mito Junior College, for teachers of the Middle Schools in Mito, for various groups of Young Men, such as members of the city and Junior College of Y. M. C. A.'s, the "Friendly Inn" (Yuai Ryo), Friends' Dormitory boys and others and for members of the local Friends' Meeting with whom we have had special contact. Just now many of these people are inviting us out to dinners, so considerable time is consumed in simply "being Friends."

Just recently we had the good fortune to have Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin and wife with us. They came to Mito for a special meeting, or three meetings, with members of the Japan Yearly Meeting of Friends. We concentrated efforts on this occasion, making rather a large event for the Friends here. We had a special dinner at the city Auditorium which was attended by the Governor, Mayor, President of the Chamber of Commerce, heads of banks and other officials, teachers and business men. Christian workers and evangelists were also present. The Provincial Government paid for more than half of the expenses and generally aided in giving Dr. Hodgkin a good hearing. His address here was a straightforward appeal for the abolitionists' position regarding International Peace and the abolition of war. On the same evening he spoke on Christianity and Social Reconstruction at the Friends' Meeting house. The house was full and the audience most attentive. The following day was given to Friends' work and principles, with the exception of the evening session, which was given over to a moving picture show on Social Welfare, conducted by the Provincial Government.

We leave Mito with regret, but have no question that it is the right thing to do, since there is no money to go ahead with the plans we had for this place, and there is provision for such work in Tokyo. Also we will be able to help in the immediate problem of finding and training workers for out-stations in Friends' Centres. We hope our new residence and the dormitory will be done by the middle of the autumn term of school.

With sincere regards and best wishes for you all, I am,
THOMAS E. JONES.

IDEALS AND PURPOSES.

The first purpose of the Yuai Ryo is that of Fellowship. Every effort is made to keep the size and character of the dormitory such as to contribute to the largest measure of fellowship. With present equipment it is considered impossible to accommodate more than ten students and maintain this ideal of brotherhood.

There is no designated head executive committee or other administrative body in the dormitory. The entire group freely discuss and determine all matters concerning the general welfare. Matters of attitude and policy are usually determined in informal social meetings held around "hibachi" or table, after supper each evening. A unanimity of opinion is sought in all decisions.

A foreigner has general supervision of the dormitory and consults with the members in all matters that affect policy and general welfare of the group. His place is not that of a ruler, however, but an associate. He plays, eats, sleeps and generally lives with the students as far as the desire and his time permit. In every way he tries to become one of them and they one with him in living the highest and fullest life together.

The members of Yuai Ryo recognize that our first desire is to become good students, and to maintain a high standard of scholarship. Therefore no one wishes to interfere with the study hours of others. Our motto in this matter is "To Be Considerate of Others."

All members of Yuai Ryo believe play is a valuable asset in our life together. Besides a play hour each evening after supper, we devote Seventh-day evening each week to some sort of recreation.

The members of Yuai Ryo believe religion has a place in the lives of students. They approach the study of Christianity and all other religions with an open mind, willing to be lead by the truth into the acceptance of God as the guide and ruler of their lives.

THE PRESENCE OF GOD.

Lines written by a Conscientious Objector in Pentonville.

No loneliness in solitude;
No thronging in the crowd;
No terror in the darkness,
No blindness in the glare;
No wasting in the wilderness;
No fretting at the eall,
No dreariness in waiting,
No drudgery in toil;
No dull despair in poverty,
No pompous pride in wealth;
No treacherous doubt in weakness,
No vanity in power;
No boasting in the pride of life,
No haunting in its gloom,
No mocking in its laughter,
Nor bitterness in death.

THE BALTIMORE CONFERENCE.

The entertainment planned for the evening was novel to many of us. The Maryland Casualty Co. had generously offered the loan of their large assembly hall, comfortably seating 1200 people, and here was given a pageant illustrative of a dozen scenes in the life of the Society of Friends. If you or I had been asked to select the twelve events in Quaker history for this programme, I fancy our lists would not have been identical with the one presented. All would, however, probably have included the opening and the closing pictures. The first, George Fox, a youth of striking personality and presence, the centre of a group of attentive listeners drawn from among the ordinary men and women of his time, for the other we would surely all have chosen to portray some feature of the work in France, Germany or Russia, under the Friends' Service Committee. Every seat was taken in the hall and probably not a few citizens of Baltimore, who knew very little of the Society of Friends, went home with a clearer picture of what we stand for, and I fancy many of them felt an interest awakened by the pamphlets and folders which were distributed at the exit doors.

Seventh-day was the red letter day of the Conference.

Is there anything more attractive than to find yourself one of a party of congenial friends bound for an all day's cruise with a worth-while object ahead of you? This was what our good hosts had planned for our enjoyment and every feature worked out most completely.

Some miles below Annapolis, on the west shore of the Chesapeake, the West River, after many windings, finds its exit into the bay. This river mouth was our Mecca. A hamlet of a few scattered houses, close to the shore, and a country road leading back a mile to a low knoll shaded by red oaks, were about all that many of us would have noticed had not our appetites been whetted by what we had recently read, and had not those well-posted in local geography shared their knowledge with us.

We shall always recall with peculiar satisfaction the pleasant conversations we had on that boat ride, first with this group of six or seven, and then with that, but the landing-place once reached, the real Quaker history that had called us to Baltimore began to unfold. George Fox devotes much less than one page in the two volume Cambridge Edition of his Journal to the event we were now celebrating. His own words modernized will tell the story. He had been six weeks in the voyage from Jamaica. The passage had been so boisterous that they "admired the Providence of God who preserved them."

The first Quaker missionary to Maryland was an ancestor of the Friend with whom I had come to Baltimore. Josiah Coale and Thomas Thurston are names with which the historian must wrestle if he gives an honest picture of those early days. They were both in the colony years before George Fox, and to their pioneering work is due the fact that there was a meeting gathered in the Fourth Month, 1672, to greet Fox and his companions as they came to land at the mouth of West River.

Other Friends had traveled up and down the coast, stopping at the settlements in the various colonies, and had done much to encourage the religious zeal of the people already quickened by the labors of Coale and Thurston, but there were two who claim special prominence, they were John Burnyeat and William Edmundson, men as different in type as possible for men to be, each at this time about forty years old, both having been ministers of the Gospel for the past fifteen years. To this group of three, now all in Maryland, Fox, Burnyeat and Edmundson is largely due the open-mindedness of the authorities toward the Friends; for with their coming there had been a change of attitude, harshness giving place to kindly treatment.

This is virtually all that George Fox says in his Journal of the meeting in question. "Here we found John Burnyeat, intending shortly to sail for England; but on our arrival he altered his purpose, and joined us in the Lord's service. He had appointed a general meeting for all the Friends in the province of Maryland, that he might see them together, and take his leave of them before he departed out of the country. It was so ordered by the good providence of God, that we landed just in time to reach that meeting, by which means we had a very seasonable opportunity of taking the Friends of the province together.

"A very large meeting this was, and it held four days, to which, besides Friends, came many other people, several of whom were of considerable quality in the world's account. There were five or six justices of the peace, the speaker of their assembly, one of their council, and others of note, who seemed well satisfied with the meeting. After the public meetings were over, the men's and women's meetings began, wherein I opened to Friends the service thereof, to their great satisfaction."

Again to return to our narrative. Most of the four hundred and twenty-five who had come down the bay on this excursion, both hosts and guests of the occasion, were soon ashore and the long line of pedestrians called the astonished natives to the doorways of the little frame cottages. A walk of a mile brought us to the first bit of raised ground we had come to and here to the right on a wooded knoll, a fence inclosing about an acre, there was a graveyard, the only evidence left of that great day so long ago, when the whole countryside turned out and swelled the company to many hundred. We had no speech-making under the trees, there had been a recent rain, the ground was damp, and benches and chairs could not have been provided without great effort.

We planted an oak sapling, brought from a nearby plantation, rambled among the marked graves and allowed our thoughts to picture, as best we could, the scene when Fox and his comrades preached to the great crowds that must have circled about them. I fancy the impression this little scene has made upon most of us will be the most indelible of all that we saw or heard. In its loneliness and poverty, there was a charm that nothing else in the whole programme afforded; to one, at least, it was the feature that would have been most missed, if omitted.

But while there were no addresses given here, the programme included a meeting, and we traveled back to the little town, where, in a hall that crowded to its limit two hundred found seats, and the rest either stood or went back to the boat, we listened to two scholarly addresses: "The Founding and Development of Quakerism in Maryland," by Lucy M. Thurston, of Baltimore, and "The Influence of Friends on Colonial Life," by Elbert Russell, of Philadelphia. These addresses, as also those that preceded them on the previous days and those that were to follow on the morrow, we trust will all be published. The ride up the bay in the evening light was restful and altogether pleasant and the day closed with nothing to mar its completeness.

On First-day large congregations gathered in the meeting-houses and to borrow language used by George Fox, two hundred and fifty years before, "Truth reigned and Friends were greatly refreshed." In the afternoon, Governor Sproul, of Pennsylvania and Jesse H. Holmes, of Swarthmore, both addressed the Conference and in the evening the programme was brought to a fitting close in an address by Rufus M. Jones, of Haverford, "The Message of Christ to the World of Today."

It would be unfair to extend the limits of this paper to include even a remark on these three addresses. The Conference was over. It had been an inspiration to all of us, I trust. Our little party was soon turned homeward, and as we passed in rapid succession the places we had seen on our way down, our thoughts, during the pauses of our pleasant conversation, may have turned to the past Quaker history of the country through which we were traveling, where we were passing on the average a Friends' meeting-house in every three miles of the way. There will be no moral added, but the simple statement of a fact that had our route been to the Lancaster Pike from Philadelphia, or up the Schuylkill Valley, or directly north from City Hall or had we crossed the Delaware and chosen any of three or more routes in New Jersey, we would have repeated in good degree what we had found on the road between West Chester and Baltimore.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

TURNERS OF THE OLDEST CHEEK.—[Our attention has been called to the article in The Survey from which we have made the extracts which follow.—Eds.]

It is only ten miles by the sign-posts, twenty minutes by the watch, from the railway station to one of the Huterisch colonies. But sign-posts and watches are not the truest standards for measuring space and time, and many a one who has traveled that ten-mile stretch of road knows that he has sped five thousand miles eastward, and four hundred years backward, and that the end of the journey left him not in the valley of the Jim in South Dakota, but in some valley of the Inn or Isar, in a hamlet of the early fifteen hundreds.

Perhaps one of the oldest communist societies in existence, during the four hundred years since they left the home they shared with Jacob Huter in the Tyrol, the Huterisch people have never deviated from the pattern he set. Their houses are still built as they built them then. Their clothes are still made in the same fashion. Even the details of each day's routine have changed but little. They are distinctly not of the Twentieth Century, not of America. And yet the words "old-fashioned" and "foreign" in no way describe them. It is rather the thought of timelessness, of the fundamentally universal, that I associate with them—the thought that the old masters bring to us in their pictures belonging to no time or place, but to all times and places. The girls, dressed like their mothers, quaint little women in long, full skirts and aprons, with folded handkerchiefs covering their hair, which is primly parted over such pretty faces as I have seldom seen.

I have come to know them well, and have marveled to see how wrong an impression could go forth of so kindly and so deeply Christian a people. Fifty years they have lived in America, patterning their manner of life after that of the earliest Christian disciples, holding their possessions in common. Progressive in the use of modern machinery, they have diligently developed some of the finest farm lands in America.

Yet they have been so quiet and unobtrusive that we were not aware of their presence until, during the war, they were brought before the courts, fined, imprisoned, and at last, by these things, forced to begin upon another exile. After four centuries of seeking they have not yet found the country where they may freely insist that it is a sin to fight. After seeing how much we had misunderstood this people, I grew eager to read their history carefully. I remember the one condition the teacher laid down before he lent me the book of their old records. He said:

"In this book you will find that we passed through many hardships, and sometimes there were tortures. There are some of these which I should not wish you to read or to tell any one about, lest they should think we were nourishing a spirit of bitterness or hatred against those among whom we have lived."

I have found many chronicles of the first two hundred and fifty years of their wanderings, but only the most meager details as to the hundred years' sojourn in Russia. I knew there were those still alive in the colony who were twenty or thirty years old when they left Russia, and I urged some of the younger men, who could understand the speech of their elders as I could not, to gather up their recollections for me. I said I would come out for two weeks in the winter when their work was least pressing if they would let me board with them. When I asked the pastor, who is also the "boss" of the colony, for permission to come, he said:

"Yes, if we are still here."

"But will you not surely be here?" I asked.

"We are waiting most intently for permission to enter Canada, and if the permission comes, we shall go at once. You know a part of our colony went during the war, and our families are greatly broken up. Other colonies went in a body."

I remembered how they had been dragged to court and accused of following a "black book," and that when this book was ordered to be translated so that all might see the blackness of its contents these were found to consist of "Thou shalt not kill," "Resist not evil," "If thine enemy hunger, feed him," and "If he smite thee on the one cheek, turn to him the other also." Black doctrines, indeed, and quoted from a dangerous Leader. I remembered that they had been accused of being not a religious, but a business organization, of being stingy and unpatriotic because they had not bought Liberty Bonds, although they had offered money to the government generously for anything except war. I remembered how the young man who piloted me to the door had been put in prison for his faith and that another had lost his life there because he refused to carry out military orders. Although the pastor said not one word of harshness or blame, I did not wonder that they wanted to go, but I told him how intensely I hoped they would not do so. When America adopts a non-militaristic policy the country will find a new reserve of strength in these and like people who here in the Middle West have stood even to the point of death for that which the rest of us are just beginning to see.

It was in 1520 that the Huterisch church had its beginning. Luther had led the movement of church reform, but there were those who felt that he did not go far enough, and who wished to return still farther toward the primitive simplicity of the apostolic church. These people were called Anabaptists, and there were some forty sects of them, each differing slightly from the others in the way it felt its ideals should be expressed. The feeling that the shedding of blood in battle was directly against the principles of Jesus characterized several of the Anabaptist sects. Because of this they met the most violent opposition, equally from Catholics, Lutherans and Calvinists, and especially from government officials. Within the first five years of their history a thousand of them had been put to death in the little section of Europe which marks the birthplace of the Huterisch church, and includes a part of Switzerland, of southern Suabia, Bavaria and the Tyrol. I smile when people speak of the Huterisch folks as slackers and cowards in war. Soldiering meant at least a chance of life for them—if they died, perhaps a speedy and easy death. This they refused, although refusal meant certain death to them—a death of such torture that one may not describe what they suffered. The men after slow torture were burned at the stake. The women were drowned in sacks in the rivers and lakes.

After the awful persecution of those early years the people ran higher and thither into exile. A large band of them fled to Moravia, and because of the extreme dangers surrounding them adopted the communistic form of life, just as the early disciples had done. Jacob, by whose name the church has always been known, became their greatest leader. He was afterward burned at the stake, in the year 1536.

AT QUARTERLY MEETING IN OHIO.

The morning of Fifth Month 13th found many of us at Quarterly Meeting in Salem, Ohio. Perhaps there was, in many minds, as we came from the four or more different neighborhoods, some shadow of discouragement. As we settled into the silence of a Friends' Meeting, along with the duties and the privileges of the present hour, I was made to remember, in love, many who formerly met with us, who have gone to their eternal home.

There was brought to my remembrance, too, many who still live in distant places; and however pleasant may be their present surroundings and however they now feel themselves to be in their proper places, they yet remember us, and some of them send greetings of interest and concern to us at times, and many of these, I am sure, want to hear what our Quarterly Meeting was like today, what concerns arose and how it compared with the meetings we used to attend in the years long gone.

The first speaker was Max I. Reich, who has a minute for service among Friends in Ohio. He quoted "What is man that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man that thou visitest him?" "Man is a veiled mystery," a "spiritual being in the clay tabernacle." "The man that survives death is spiritual." "Created in the beginning in the same way as the creeping things of earth, we have in us the pull of the beastly nature, and the angelic, the Christlike impulse after heavenly treasures."

"When the prodigal, in the far country, sustained the animal part with the hucks among swine, there came to him the Christlike resolve, 'I will arise, and go to my father.'" "'Created a little lower than the angels', man was given the capacity to understand, to enjoy, to look up and adore." A deep analysis of man's nature was followed by his concern for us that we fulfil man's higher destiny. "Jesus came glorifying God the Father, where he had dishonored him," "It is the beast in us that ought to be crucified."

"It is the angelic life, the Christ life that ought to be nourished and built up in us."

Rachel E. Cope followed with an exhortation that we dwell near to Him who is our God and our father's God; reminding us that we should "work while it is called today, for the night cometh, wherein no man can work."

Esther Fowler arose with the words, "Blessed are they who do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." In the course of her earnest appeal for right and for truth she said, "The one thing needful, is to live according to the will of our Father in Heaven."

Ellwood B. Conrad began with "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." He also quoted, "He that heareth these sayings of mine" and brought into vivid contrast the works of the foolish man who built upon the sand, and the wise man who digged deep and built his house upon a rock, and when the floods came and beat upon his building it fell not, because it was founded upon a rock. He said, "The best thing that ever happened to me was when I gave up to serve the living God, and I felt a call to extend His blessed invitation, 'Come unto Me.'"

Cyrus Cooper knelt in an earnest supplication that Divine blessing be ours, and that we patiently seek after durable riches and righteousness.

The concluding exercise of this solemn and favored meeting was when the partitions were about to be lowered, Max I. Reich revived the language, "Behold, I set before thee an open door," and in a very few well-chosen words he pointed his hearers to Christ, the Door. The meeting for business, which followed, did not develop much that was new or unusual, but I especially remember it because of the appointment of a committee to assist the clerk of the meeting to prepare and forward to our Senators from Ohio, and to two of our Representatives in Congress, a letter of encouragement and commendation for the part they had each one taken on the important subject of law enforcement, and also for the expression of unity and encouragement for the visiting Friends from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL NOTES.

On a recent Seventh-day a meeting of the Pennsylvania Forestry Association was held at the School. About thirty were in attendance, including Joseph T. Rothrock of West Chester, and Henry S. Drinker, formerly President of Lehigh University. After visiting the Painter arboretum near Lima in the forenoon, the members of the Association had lunch at the Farm-house, where their business meeting was held. In the afternoon they inspected the Westtown arboretum east of the soccer field, set out an evergreen tree at the edge of the woods, and also visited the pine setting and the orchards.

The School was recently privileged to have a visit from the three representatives of the Women's International League of Peace and Freedom now in this country: Gertrud Baer of Germany, Annot Robinson of England and Thérèse Pottecher-Arnould of France. They took supper at the Farm-house, spoke to the School for a half hour in the Library, and then hurried on to a later meeting in West Chester.

The children from "The Shelter" at Cheyney, with their teachers and several of the Committee in charge, recently had an afternoon picnic at the Lake-house.

Once a week during this term the School partakes of a "Russian supper," consisting only of soup and brown bread. The difference in cost between this and the regular meal otherwise given is to be contributed to the work of the Service Committee in Russia. It will probably amount to nearly two hundred dollars in the course of the term.

The following have been chosen to read essays at the Commencement exercises Sixth Month 14th:—Hugh Borton, of Moorestown, William F. Satterthwait, of Burmont, Marion H. Cowperthwaite of Haddonfield, Marion Rhoads of Wilmington, with Edward S. Wood of Riverton as Valedictorian.

The Athenian and Brightonian Literary Societies have given public programs on recent Seventh-day evenings, the former presenting scenes taken from our Quaker History, the latter acting out scenes taken from the writings of Mark Twain.

The following, because of high scholastic attainment, have recently been elected members of the Cum Laude Society, an honor society in secondary schools, corresponding to the Phi Beta Kappa of the colleges—Edward S. Wood of Riverton and Charles R. Tatnall of Wilmington. In connection with their admission to the society, and the presentation of their "key," Richard M. Gummere of William Penn Charter School made a brief address.

The School base-ball team has had a successful season thus far, having defeated by rather large scores Wilmington Friends' School, Swarthmore Preparatory, Chestnut Hill and Williamson School. Our track team won in a good dual meet with Williamson School. Our tennis team lost its first match to Hill School, but won from Wilmington Friends.

THREE "PUBLISHERS OF TRUTH."

Those who were present at the large meeting held in the house at Fifteenth and Race Streets, Philadelphia, on the evening of Fifth Month 18th, had the pleasure of hearing and seeing three notable women, who are traveling and speaking in the interests of world Peace—Thérèse Pottecher-Arnould of France; Gertrud Baer of Germany and Annot Robinson of England. All three are connected with the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, and are working to unite the women of the world for Internationalism and universal Peace.

It is a tribute to their work that a group of men who heard them speak in Boston lately, have asked if it might be possible for them to remain here until the autumn, and then address all the Rotary and Kiwanis Clubs of the country. This, however, they cannot do.

The French lady, who spoke first, at the meeting, held under the auspices of the two Yearly Meetings' Peace Committees of Philadelphia on the 18th, referred to the banding together of women to promote Peace and Good-will, and the better understanding of Patriotism. She described the difficulty of such work in her own country. "But often, she believed, prejudices can be removed until 'we see only the human being' instead of the enemy." Since Dr. Nansen has described the suffering in Russia to the French people, and made them really see the conditions there, the French relief work for Russian children has advanced wonderfully.

The young German woman began by speaking of the gratitude of the German people to Friends. "Although she knew 'the Friends do not like to hear about their own work,' she was glad they had consented to have a street in Frankfurt called 'the Quaker street,' 'so that our children may have the remembrance of you.'

She gave a charming account of the young people's movement in Germany, comparing it to what Carolina Wood had told them of the lives of Friends, in the desire to escape from the turmoil of the cities where (as her quaint wording put it)—"The human being within them will be greatly crushed by their daily life"—into the country places where they can live a more simple life.

She told us also of the schools which have been started since the war, where the teachers may "have their own way of teaching," and though the school equipment is furnished by the State, "the State no longer interferes."

The "League of War Opponents," and other pacifist organizations in Germany were briefly described, and she closed with the words, "Above all nations there is humanity."

The English lady—a finished public speaker—first called our attention to the ineffective position in which all pacifist organizations had been found during the great war, when they could do war relief work, but were unable "to create public opinion," and she questioned whether if another should come we would be any stronger. It is not enough "to hope for Peace." We must "do hard thinking, and do it now."

In England they have had some "compulsory education" on the evil effects of war, and it has produced a group of brilliant and convincing writers, and among the working people definite results, such as the "Councils of Action," which prevented war with Russia. She pleaded with us not to be afraid to let our opinions be known; to "garner the thinking, and get it expressed in our national life."

It was a privilege to hear these three fine women and to enter somewhat into their work and realize how far-reaching must be its power for good.

PANDITA RAMABAI.

[The following, from The Friend (London) on Fourth Month 28th, will be of interest to the many Friends who have known of and helped Ramabai's work for the child-widows of India.]

A romance of Indian life is the story of Pandita Ramabai, who at the age of sixty-four, passed away last week. The friend of India's child-widows, she ranked in distinction, says a Times correspondent, among the first half-dozen of the daughters of India. She was the daughter of Ananda Shastri, a learned Brahmin, one of the first Indians to believe in the education of women. He educated first his wife and then his daughter, the work being carried out for a time in a mountain jungle home. There Ramabai became familiar with Sanskrit, the Vedas and much early Indian lore. Lack of means, however, led her father to adopt the pilgrim life, and for seven years they wandered over the country, while the girl learned to speak and write Marathi, Kanarese, Hindustani and Bengali. When she was sixteen both her parents died, and for some time she continued to travel with her brother, seeking to promote the education of Indian women. Eventually, in 1877, in Calcutta, the learned men, after testing her acquirements, conferred upon her the title of Saraswati (goddess of wisdom) and she was allowed to assume the title of Pandita. Soon afterwards Ramabai's brother died, and a few months later she married a Hindu trader of advanced ideas, Baboo Dass, M. A. In less than two years, however, he was carried off by cholera. In 1883, Ramabai, with her little daughter Manoramabai, came to England to receive Western education. Embracing Christianity, to which she had been previously inclined, she studied for a time at Cheltenham College, at which she was subsequently appointed teacher of Sanskrit. In America, she afterwards enlisted much sympathy and initiated a scheme for educating Hindu girls, particularly child-widows. In 1880, with American aid, she opened a school in Bombay for high caste Hindu widows (soon removed to Poona). In the 1807 famine she visited the affected districts and rescued 300 high caste girls from a life of shame. The school and home she opened for them became known as Mukti (Salvation), while a third school and home is called the Kripa Sadan (Home of Grace). For many years past in these institutions more than 2,000 women, most of them widows (many of them saved from degradation, and all from the hardship incidental to the Hindu widow's lot), are maintained on a basis of self-help. The Mukti is socialistic in working. Its inmates grow their own food, weave their own cloth, manufacture most of the simple articles required, conduct their own education, all under the inspiration hitherto of this woman of genius, this practical mystic. The ideal of life in the home is not ascetic, nor are its inmates out of touch with the outside world. On the contrary, they travel on missionary work not only locally, but also far afield. As they go forth to the responsibilities of varied vocations or married life, others take their place. Ramabai, who was awarded the Kaisari-i-Hind medal in 1910, lost her best helper in her daughter, who died only last year.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF RELIGIOUS BODIES.

Who hold that Peace between nations can be maintained by following the teachings of Jesus.

To be held at Bluffton College, Bluffton, Ohio, Eighth Month 4th-7th, 1922.

About two years ago the American Friends' Service Committee minutted its approval of a plan to call together for a national conference all the religious bodies who by creed or practice bear testimony that all war is un-Christian. Plans have now materialized; and the meeting is scheduled to be held as indicated above. A committee of invitation, consisting of representatives of the three groups of the Society of Friends, the Schwenkfelders, Mennonites and Brethren, will constitute a committee of arrangements; and the plan and program of the conference will be announced within a short time.

The object of this conference, as stated in the invitation, is: "(a) To bring together for a season of conference and prayer representatives of all who profess discipleship of Jesus Christ and who hold that war has no place among Christians.

"(b) To discuss ways and means of furthering this Christian principle outside the respective denominations participating in the conference.

"It is not expected that any formal, permanent organization will be effected. It is to be a meeting for prayer, for cultivating a spirit of closer fellowship among all of these more or less closely related bodies and for conference."

This is the first time that an attempt has been made to get together the groups of people who bear a like testimony in regard to war. If the world is to be rid of war, it must come about through the influence of the Holy Spirit. "There is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved."

Further announcements concerning this conference will be made from time to time; but the call is issued now for Friends to join in prayer not only that the spirit of Christ will be present in the meetings when held, but that all who follow the Prince of Peace may be united in His service.

COFFEE FOR HAY.

Sonia Sapir is just a Russian girl—English born, because her parents were political exiles of the Czarist days. She is a member of the English Friends' Unit, and serves as interpreter, investigator, organizer, and nurse.

Last fall it became apparent to the workers that if the food was to be distributed to the outlying villages in the famine area, it would be necessary to buy hay for the camels and horses; otherwise, the animals would not live or be strong enough to do the work. Arrangements were made, therefore, for Sonia to take about 3600 pounds of coffee which had been contributed by English firms for relief work, down to Tashkent in southeastern Russia to trade for hay.

She left Buzuluk on First Month 5th. One hundred and twenty miles down the line her car developed a hot box and the train crew detached it and left it on a siding. Sonia, however, found a free locomotive in the yards at the little station. She climbed into it, and directed the engineer to run back twenty miles to where she remembered having seen an empty car on a side track. She commandeered it, transferred her coffee bags and directed the engineer of the free locomotive to take her on down the line. She reached Tashkent on the 30th, and began her bartering for hay. In her report she stated that coffee was not in as much demand as green tea, "so I walked about and asked 'Who wants coffee?'"

Two weeks later she started with twenty-two cars of hay to Buzuluk. For every pound of coffee she had secured 35 pounds, or, altogether, 126,000 pounds, of hay.

One of the American workers (not a Friend), in commenting upon this, wrote:

"The Quakers are resourceful in utilizing the gifts that come to them. The moral may be: Give something, and the Quakers will somehow use it. They will turn cotton prints into June clover, green tea into barley for human feeding, scented toilet soap into wheat for autumn sowing. And if they must have cucumbers and carrots to fight the scurvy this summer, you may hear that they have bought it in Turkestan with dress tweeds and colored woollens. . . . But trips to Tashkent are difficult and dangerous and for every one it needs a Sonia. And Sonias are not made in a day, even in Revolutionary Russia."

RELIGIOUS WORK IN GERMANY.

"The Monthly Meeting in connection with the Wilhelmstrasse Meeting for Worship (Berlin) is of great interest. It has builded a way into the life of the community. It is carrying on a steady effort at Russian relief work and other practical matters, as well as a study circle. Its last meeting reports twenty present."

"There is a small but growing nucleus of German members. No one has ever been urged, to my knowledge, to join the Society. These memberships are entirely a personal response to a sense of need. I welcome this fact, because it is creating a group with a common responsibility around which a German religious society will grow and adapt itself to meet its own needs."

"The lines of right development in respect to Quaker needs in Germany seem gradually becoming clear. Groups at Elberfeld, Berlin, Charlottenburg, Frankfurt and Darmstadt, with many individual links in all parts of Germany, indicate a growth which is entirely normal and healthy. Friends are responding to a searching. As way opens the door the growth will be natural and have German rootings."—(Extracts from Report of Carl Heath.)

NOTES FROM RUSSIA.

Methods of Distribution.—Under the system adapted from other fields, it is possible to tell where every pound of food has gone, not only what volosts have received it, but also what villages and kitchens. It is also possible to tell the name of every child who has received a ration. Supplies are carefully checked out, and reports are received from local authorities, showing careful checking upon receipt of supplies. There is no foundation for statements that supplies are not reaching the people or are being sold in the market, etc.

Seeds.—The first shipment of garden seeds reached Moscow the first part of last month. Advice from Reval stated that the Soviet authorities were shipping the much-needed garden seeds in ahead of their own food supplies.

Clothing.—All clothing received has already been distributed. Some bedding has been obtained from the A. R. A.

Clean-up Campaign.—To prevent serious epidemics, a general clean-up campaign has been inaugurated, beginning with Sorochinskoye. The city was divided into districts with a captain at the head of each with twenty men under him. These men are to bury the dead, cart away filth, and spread lime over what cannot be removed. Every householder has been notified to clean up his premises. The cleaning squads are to be given a ration so that they will have strength for the work.

Needs.—The need for food continues. Letter of the 14th ultimo says: "Conditions grow steadily worse in the district and we must feed a larger number if we are to meet the situation."

It is too early to know what the harvest will be. The prospects are that there will be a small crop, because of the small acreage planted. In addition, the shortage of animals and machinery, together with the weakness of the people, makes a good crop unlikely.

People are in desperate need of clothing. There are 90,000 children who need undergarments. Bedding for 2000 beds in children's homes and hospitals is needed. Sheep have disappeared, so there will not be wool to spin next winter. No flax can be planted.

The need for medical supplies is unlimited. The simple things, soap, vaccine, quinine, sheets and blankets are needed in great quantities.

Moscow Milk Distribution.—The discontinuing of milk distribution in Moscow has brought about a serious situation. There is no fresh milk supply and the children are suffering severely from the lack of all kinds of proper food. It is hoped that funds will be forthcoming for the continuation of this work from both English and American Friends.

NEW ENGLAND YEARLY MEETING (Conservative) will be held as usual at Westerly, R. I. The Meeting for Ministers and Elders is held on Seventh-day, Sixth Month 3rd, the Yearly Meeting proper beginning on Second-day, the 5th. James M. Moon, of Falls Monthly Meeting, Pa., and William B. Harvey, of Westtown, are expecting to be in attendance.

J. HENRY SCATTERGOOD, of Philadelphia, has recently been elected a member of the Board of Trustees of Hampton Institute, Va. Chief-Justice Taft is President of the Board.

THE Service Committee has recently received the largest gift for Russian relief which has come to them. It was for $65,000 and from a man who only last year gave $50,000 for Poland. This gift will feed for one month two-thirds of the number of people in Russia whom the Service Committee is now feeding.

DUBLIN YEARLY MEETING convened on Fifth Month 3rd. Referring to Epistles received, it was mentioned that no Epistle had been received from California. George G. Williams said that such Epistle had certainly been written, as he was a member of the Epistle Committee. A large proportion of their members were not birthright Friends; the pastoral system was in vogue and there was very little silence in their meetings.

Letters were read from two other Yearly Meetings in America—Genesee, and Indiana (North A Street, Richmond). With the four letters read in the morning sitting, this made six from Yearly Meetings with which Dublin Yearly Meeting does not usually correspond. It was decided to send replies to these in exactly the same way as to the fourteen Yearly Meetings on the American Continent with which correspondence has been maintained for many years.

STATISTICS issued by Dublin Yearly Meeting include the following and show a membership on the thirty-first of Twelfth Month, 1921, of 2,282, an increase of 1 member for the year. Two hundred and thirty members are "non-resident in Ireland" and 199 are "practically withdrawn." In 1921, 2 members were married according to rule, and 13 not according to rule.

THE Committee having the care of the Children's Corner in THE FRIEND is only a very small one; its members are truly interested in the children of our Society and are eager to provide in their small Corner reading that is both profitable and interesting to these, the younger members of our meeting.

We are writing to thee to ask for suggestions along the line of our work; frank criticism will be greatly appreciated.

Would thee be willing to join our little group to prepare and select articles suitable for our Corner, or does thee know of some one peculiarly gifted along this line who may be interested to help us?

We meet for informal discussion and the planning of our work only four times in the year, so that the actual time spent in committee meetings is not great.

Will thee give the subject thy serious thought and from time to time send us interesting articles, either original or selected?

We shall be most grateful for any such assistance which we feel that you parents of little children can most ably render.

We are sending this brief but earnest appeal to you to whom THE FRIEND comes, hoping that by your co-operation we may be able to "brighten our corner" and to increase its value to our children.

ELIZABETH S. PENNELL, Wawa, Pa.,
Chairman Children's Corner Committee.

VIRGIL HINSHAW, Chairman of the National Committee of the Prohibition party, is a member of the Penn College, Iowa, graduating Class of 1900, and his interest in the great prohibition movement was first inspired by his mother at his boyhood home near Richland, Iowa. A few months ago he was sent to Austria in the interests of World Prohibition.

The Christian Herald has recorded some of his interesting experiences in Austria, one of which is that at Vienna he found that the leading political party in its last national platform declared for total abstinence and named prohibition as the solution to the liquor problem. As a result of his visit to the President's palace, an Austrian committee was formed for co-operation with the World Prohibition Federation.—From The American Friend.

The following Minute of the Library and Printing Committee of London Meeting for Sufferings was recently under review:—That gift copies of the New Part I of the Book of Discipline, "Christian Life, Faith and Thought in the Society of Friends," should be sent to the Clerks or Recording Clerks of all American Yearly Meetings, to the Recording Clerk of Dublin Yearly Meeting, to all Foreign and Colonial Yearly, General or Quarterly Meetings, and to Cardinal Bourne, the Archbishops and representatives of the leading Free Churches.

"SUMMER is upon us, and with it another big earthquake! Nothing was hurt here, but in Yokohama there was considerable damage, as well as among the flimsy buildings at the Peace Exhibition. Our newly raised scaffold-poles didn't come down, and the work is going on merrily. Fifteen members of the graduating class came to me last week by invitation to organize a weekly class in English Conversation. Three of these are now in Ume Tsuda's school, and one is attending another higher school. Of the others who could not come one is at the Women's University, and one at the Ueno Music School, and two or three hope to go on with their education in a year or two."—M. N. RHOADS.

TOKYO, Fourth Month 27th.

THOMAS MOTT OSBORNE, the former unconventional warden of the Sing Sing Prison, is opening a preparatory school for boys in the old Osborne home at Auburn, New York, his present residence. The policies of the school will be formulated by the boys themselves, who will be allowed the fullest possible amount of control. He holds that scholastic institutions in America do not train for the responsibility of citizenship. "Osborne School" is so named in honor of his father and mother, whose home was a noted place of gathering for the early reformers in the suffrage movement. His grandmother, Martha Wright, was the sister of Lucretia Mott.

FROM the most recent records received it appears that there are 406 meetings in London Yearly Meeting. The total membership is 20,047, which is an increase of 53 for the year. One thousand, one hundred and twenty-six of these members are returned as residing abroad, but the addresses of 70 of them are unknown. Three hundred and nine persons have entered by conviction, the Quarterly Meetings of Lancashire and Cheshire, London and Middlesex, and Yorkshire being responsible for the largest accessions.

WHITTIER COLLEGE, Cal., has completed a successful campaign for a $200,000 endowment. Practically all of the money was raised in Whittier. Rather more than half the total (including $66,666 given by the Rockefeller Foundation) was given by non-Friends.

NOTICE.

A MEETING for Worship will be held at Parkerville, Pa., on the first First-day in the Sixth, Seventh, Eighth and Ninth Months and also on the last First-day of Ninth Month. The hour is 2.45 P. M. (Standard Time). The first meeting of the season will occur Sixth Month 4th. Any Friends from a distance desiring to be met should address Norris G. Temple, Pocopson P. O., Pa.

WHAT PART HAS OUR TEMPERANCE ORGANIZATION?

A visitor to our recent Yearly Meeting remarked, not casually, but with an evident genuine sense of concern, that Friends had ceased to be solicitous in regard to the use of intoxicants. "When I was last with you," he said, "a definite inquiry seemed to be made among your male members; this I understand was extended to include your entire adult membership. Then, too, you had in every Monthly Meeting a committee under appointment to promote temperance or prohibition sentiment in all your neighborhoods. Now I note that all you do is to make a summarized answer to a set query, that is so framed as to be in harmony with the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution. If this is all you are doing, it seems to me," he further said, "that you have fallen short of a duty, and are unworthy successors of your fathers who really added something to the prohibition sentiment of the country."

It was not difficult to enlighten our critic, who admitted that he had placed us in an unfair light. The conversation that followed was responsible for certain generalizations, which, while they showed plenty of cause for honest concern on the part of prohibitionists, revealed certain hopeful or at least alleviating circumstances that are often not considered.

These striking head lines appeared in a prominent daily some months ago: "Less Crime and Increased Savings were in 'The Wettest Region of the United States.'" This wettest region, we easily surmise, is the quarter circle with Philadelphia as a centre and a radius that would include Scranton, Wilkes-Barre, Pittston and the adjacent coal regions.

Many of us are familiar with the story of arrests and attempts at arrest along the Baltimore Pike that passes through a succession of Friendly settlements in southern Chester Co. and on southward and westward to Baltimore. We know also of the looseness in general morals that has appeared within the past two years, as evidenced by the heavy draft made upon the time of our judges and jurors.

Soon after the Eighteenth Amendment had become a part of our Federal Law and the Volstead Act had gotten upon the Statute Books, an interesting and at the same time a shameful condition existed among the citizens of the quarter circle just alluded to. This state of affairs still in good measure prevails, for the counties where anthracite is mined most extensively, with Scranton as a centre, have been distributing depots for illicit trading and all kinds of methods, that would tax the quickest wits of all except trained detectives to ferret out.

If one lives in this section or if he bases his prohibition sentiment upon conditions as they have existed and still exist here, he must remember that this is but a small section of the U. S. and that conditions here are very peculiar. The manufacture of and traffic in liquor have for a long time been, next to mining, the chief industry of this section. It has a strong foothold here and it dies hard.

Another item of some moment is the fact that the three important Middle Atlantic States, New York, our own and New Jersey have had to depend very largely on Federal enforcement of the law, because as "wet" states they have not polled sufficient dry votes to give them a strong state police for enforcement of Federal laws. Unlike these three states, Delaware has had a strict enforcement law of its own. Delaware makes no pretensions to being perfect, but the way is made much easier for the "dry" party there.

Another fact to be taken into account is the system, still prevailing, of licensing saloons. The cities and towns in the quadrant referred to count hundreds of licensed houses. Scranton five years ago had over 300 licensed houses. That they are not all wiped out, but instead that a considerable proportion still hold their licenses, explains why Pennsylvania stands so low on the list of "drys."

Some interesting things were said about the "wet rule" in the mining regions soon after the law was enacted, while conditions have improved, to some they seem hopeless yet.

Another consideration to give us pause is the political status of Pennsylvania. With both parties in the state tacitly committed to a "semi-wet" plank in their platforms, can we look for the results to be the same as were public sentiment through political leaders decidedly "dry"?

Another fact to which should be given due prominence is that Pennsylvania during all this period of law-breaking has largely failed in putting into the field one spirited reformer, whose message should stir the mind of this commonwealth, as years ago John B. Gough, with only half the backing a public speaker would have today, stirred audiences of ordinary people all over the country.

Again, may be most powerful of all, we must reckon with the financial side of this great problem—the money already invested in it, calling for dividends, and the temptation, so easily yielded to by men not over-scrupulous, to allow their non-sensitive consciences to be still further seared when great financial returns are likely to follow the illicit traffic.

And so there are other reasons, better known to many who may read these remarks than to the writer, why the little section of our country which, we hope, is touched to some purpose by the sentiment of Friends, is worthy of special consideration when this topic is under discussion. But adding these all together, though we shall have sufficient evidence to satisfy the "wet" politician that his philosophy is the best for the times, there are certain patent facts that should encourage us.

The mayors of some of the larger towns and cities in our quadrant have said in effect that though the law was being generally disobeyed, the net effect of it was good. One of them in an interview some months ago with a newspaper man closed his remarks thus: "The prohibition law has decreased crime, without question. The population of our jail has fallen off to a third or fourth of what it was. Arrests are fewer. Though many men are dissatisfied with it, wives and mothers are certainly better off, and are pleased with the law. They get a greater share of the family earnings than formerly."

The police of the same district give much the same testimony and further state that the difficulty of procuring pure liquor has vastly increased the number of drug-users, with the expected result that the arrests of criminals of this class have increased. A carefully tabulated list of arrests for drunkenness in Philadelphia, covering a period of about eighteen months, is nothing to be proud of, but if facts are facts it shows that something is to be entered on what we call the right side of the balance sheet of prohibition in Pennsylvania.

If to the quadrant alluded to we add the cities of Pittsburgh and Allegheny we have embraced the wet regions of our state. The rest of Pennsylvania will pass with many other sections of the country.

No great reform movement escapes its periods of back-sets and disappointments. The prohibition cause probably has before it serious battles to fight. There is this, however, to give permanent encouragement. There is real reason to expect that the devices to thwart the administration of the reform laws will lessen and weaken, if the forces for good stand by their posts, and there is also reason for hoping that government machinery for the enforcement of law will improve; permits and licenses will lessen in number rather than increase; the whiskey stored in the country will sometime be consumed, and best and most to be reckoned with, the educated sentiment of the citizenship will all the while be advancing, because son who succeeds father will have had a better training in the schools and will have advanced a step in real wisdom.

Now what part have we had in this as a Society of Friends? Much, little or none at all? It seems to me very much, if we can be patient and await issues that cannot appear at once.

The main task before our temperance organization has been for years to furnish such temperance instruction in our public schools through the classes in hygiene as our funds will permit. The time never comes to quit a task until the object before us has been attained, so with the record of good accomplished by our Temperance Society behind it, we trust they may continue to further the cause as their best judgment prompts them.

The last appeal for funds, but recently issued by the Association, has met with a generous response.

BOOK REVIEWS.

CHRISTIAN LIFE, FAITH AND THOUGHT.*

Being the First Part of Christian Discipline of the Religious Society of Friends of Great Britain.

British Friends have been revising their Book of Discipline. For some time past they have divided it into three sections—Christian Doctrines, Christian Practise and Christian Discipline. The second, Christian Practise, was revised just previous to 1911 and printed under separate cover in that year. The third section, Christian Discipline, "is also issued separately, and is kept up to date by including in new copies issued any fresh regulations made by the Yearly Meeting."

The First Part is now complete and is just out of the publisher's hands and it is to this volume we would call the attention of those who are interested in all the best and clearest expressions of our Christian faith. Under the revision the old title of Part I, Christian Doctrine, is changed to read, Christian Life, Faith and Thought, and one hundred and thirty-four closely printed pages are given to its discussion. As the Preface says: "The title, Christian Life, Faith and Thought in the Society of Friends, shows the character now given to the book. The attempt has been made throughout to state truth, not by formulating it, but expressing it through the vital personal and corporate experience of Friends." Before the work of revision was undertaken some Friends felt grave misgivings as to the result. There as here, there are many shades of thought and doctrine and some feared a partial or biased statement of faith; but through long months they worked together with prayer and an earnest desire for harmony, till the present comprehensive statement of truth as held by Friends is the result. Moreover the effort to find unity in diversity has brought English Friends into a closer harmony of spirit than was possible before. While many shades of thought are expressed through the extracts chosen, there runs through all the common bond of our essential principles and faith. Might not Friends in America profit by their example?

After a brief Preface and Introduction about sixty pages are given to Illustrative Spiritual Experiences of Friends. These cover extracts from George Fox and William Dewsbury to John Wilhelm Rountree and Thomas Hodgkin. More than thirty Friends are included in the list. They make a very impressive and inspiring group of testimonies to the reality of the presence and power of the spirit of God in the hearts of men and women who have sought Him and striven to live His Truth. It is not creed or doctrine these men know but the living power of Christ in personal salvation and spiritual life and growth. At the end of the chapter one feels like exclaiming, "Seeing then we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight and the sin which doth so easily possess us and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus the author and perfection of our faith."

Following this section of personal, spiritual experience is a brief statement of our position as to creeds taken from the Yearly Meeting's epistle of 1827 and from a paper presented to the Yearly Meeting of 1920 in connection with the world conference of Friends. Here again emphasis is placed on a vital experience of religion rather than on doctrines about it, valuable as it may be to try to express so much of the truth as our finite minds may have been able to grasp.

The next division is entitled, General Doctrinal Statements and includes selections from George Fox's Epistle to the Governor of Barbadoes in 1671, and from the Yearly Meeting Epistle of 1907. The former is known to most of us, the latter may be briefly summarized in these words, "We are called as a Society and as individuals to witness to the true meaning of the Real Presence of God in man." In the hearts of all men is the sense of need of the divine, the seed which must be quickened to life and growth by the spirit of God. This life is rooted in God's love manifested in Jesus Christ, the Revealer and Redeemer, who shows us what God is and what man may be. The more we understand His love the more we realize the possibilities it opens to us and our own weakness and failure in measuring up to them. The more also will our hearts reach out in loving service to other men that we may bring them to Him. We must carry His message through characters remoulded by His Divine Presence and through personalities transformed by His love.

Under the general heading, The Light of Christ in the Heart, are sub-titles like these: Shining Through All, by George Fox; Return Home to Within, by Francis Howgill; Christ Nigh to All, by Robert Barclay; The Operations of the Spirit, Yearly Meeting Epistles of 1868, 1861, 1830; The Light of the Holy Spirit in the Human Soul, a paper presented to the Yearly Meeting of 1920; Appeal to All Men, a Document issued by the Meeting for Sufferings, 1919, &c. These are all extracts full of deep spiritual insight into the universal need of the soul for God and the opportunity for life and growth for all who seek Christ and follow the leading of His spirit.

Then follow divisions on the nature of God and the Universality of His Grace and the Person and Work of Jesus Christ. These are important subjects and many phases of thought are shown in the extracts, especially of the second topic. Emphasis is laid on the revelation of the Father through Jesus Christ, on the divine and human nature in Christ, on His power to save from sin and on the newness of life and the power for service which comes to those who believe on Him. In the words of Whittier here quoted:

Oh, Lord and Master of us all!
Whate'er our name or sign,
We own Thy sway, we hear Thy call,
We test our lives by thine.

.....

We faintly hear, we dimly see
In differing phrase we pray;
But dim or clear, we own in Thee
The Light, the Truth, the Way!

The Scriptures are next treated, though not so fully as some other topics, and under the heading, The Church, are many interesting and important sub-titles. Under the interesting section, The Way of Life, are sub-heads such as Service in Daily Life, Christian Service Abroad, Testimony for Peace, Foundation of a True Social Order, etc. And lastly, some Religious Problems are suggested in which science and Religion and Unity in Diversity are helpfully dealt with.

I fear the foregoing description of the book seems a mere table of contents, but it seemed difficult to show the manner and scope of it without some detail. The method used has the disadvantage of being less definite and concise and clear than a formulated statement of faith and doctrine such as we have in our discipline, but this disadvantage is offset by the wealth of experience and evidence and by the sense of vital reality of faith which so many expressions give. Also the witness which covers so many decades of our history and so many phases of thought and which yet speaks with one voice on our essential principles, brings a very impressive conviction of our belief. One closes the book with a feeling of very deep gratitude for the heritage which is ours, with a new sense of responsibility for the individual and corporate living of so great a message and with a deep humility in the face of our failure to make it more real to men. The emphasis throughout is on the vital experience of religion realized in personal communion with God and expressed to men as a way of life which controls and guides all our doings.

It is a book full of inspiration for individual study and could well be used for reading aloud in the home a few extracts at a time, for it burns with the spiritual idealism which young hearts crave, and it surely will have a message to seekers of truth outside of our Society and might well be passed on to others.

May the spirit of the closing Prayer quoted from John Wilhelm Rountree fill us and impel us as individuals and as a Society:

Thou, O Christ, convince us by Thy Spirit; thrill us with Thy Divine passion, drown our selfishness in Thy invading Love; lay on us the burden of the world's suffering, drive us forth with the apostolic fervor of the early Church! So only can our message be delivered. "Speak to the children of Israel that they go forward."

A HILL SONG.

Bird above the mountain,
Fern and brook and fir wood,
Where I used to wander
When my heart was light,
Now, at last, remember
All you used to sing me;
Keep my feet from straying
This and every night.

*Though the night may cheat me,
And the dream defeat me,
Let the memory linger
This and every night.*

Keep my feet from straying,
O lanterns of my boyhood;
Lead me to my home again,
Poppies in the wheat;
Keep my feet from straying,
O bloom of sweet rest-harrow,
Twist your tendrils round my heart,
Your roots about my feet.

If I seek the valley
Where the roads are easy,
Let the thorns beset me round
And never let me roam.
Keep my feet from straying,
Birds that beat before me,
Star beyond the sunset,
Oh, shine and lead me home.

Many a light has failed me,
Many a friend has left me,
Yet the hawthorn in the glen
After all these years
Breathes the old sweet fragrance,
And the stars are shining
Fair as when the face of love
Turned to them in tears.

Have I lost my heaven?
Earth with all her beauty
Yet may lead me on to live
With spirits free from stain.
Keep my feet from straying,
Eyes of youth and wonder!
Wake my deadened heart and give Heaven to me again.

High above the heather
Once the bird of morning
Filled my heart with glory
While I trod the height.
Now the night beaues me,
Now the dream deceives me,
Now the music leaves me,
Come, O Light of Light.

*Shine above the mountains,
Lead me through the pine woods,
Keep my feet from straying
This and every night.*

QUARTERLY MEETING COMPANY.

ELIZABETH W. PAGE.

No one except a Quaker born and bred can possibly know how important an event Quarterly Meeting used to be. Ours came in the Eighth Month,—of course, I know a Quarterly Meeting must occur four times a year, but the other three times it was held in other places and didn't count. It lasted only two days, but in our family, all the events of late summer and early autumn were dated from those two days.

I suppose you may think that the meeting was the important thing. It is true, there were sessions in the big, cool meeting-room where a long row of men and women Friends on the high seat in front looked down into the silent, waiting faces before them, until some one was moved to vocal service. If it was an elderly Friend, his speech swung out from the silence like a boat from shore, quiet and steady at first in the lee of the land, but gradually sailing out till it rose and fell on the swelling waves of a rhythmic intonation. Others followed him in prayer or exhortation till those on the high seat judged that Friends' minds were easy. Then they closed the meeting with hand-shaking. But the thing that really marked Quarterly Meeting as a great event was the Quarterly Meeting Company.

For a week before the time our whole household was astir with preparation—the windows must be washed, the silver must be polished, and every room must be put in exquisite order. Even the cellar stairs must be washed down, for mother seemed to think that, like the gods, the Quarterly Meeting Company saw everything.

All the bed-rooms on the second floor were turned into guest-rooms, and the family was banished to the attic, where we slept on the cot-bed, an evil invention that rolled one into his bed-fellow willy-nilly, or on the discarded feather beds of our ancestors. To be comfortable on a feather bed in the attic in mid-summer is a thing not to be accomplished without some effort. It usually fell to my lot, as the youngest, to "reduce" the feather beds. This process is accomplished by first patting and smoothing the bed into as level a surface as may be. Then the reducer lies across it at the top, rolls rapidly to the foot, reverses, and repeats the process until something tolerably firm results. It is not an exercise to be recommended for those who "feel the heat."

Large stores of provisions were laid in for the great event, too. Since dinners were served at the meeting-house, the meal of greatest importance from our point of view was supper. The menu for that was invariable: pressed chicken, sliced ham, currant jelly, tea, and bread and butter, with sliced peaches and cake for dessert. Let not any man think that he has fully lived until he has tasted mother's pressed chicken with its beautiful, even mottling of dark and light meat, suggesting that the originals in full dress must have been Plymouth Rocks and retained some of their neat marking for this, their last appearance. The peaches, too, were of superior quality, having come from the Quarterly Meeting peach tree, planted with the date of Quarterly Meeting in mind and punctually timing its product to that event.

We always set an extra table in the sitting-room, and the whole family was at liberty to issue invitations. I suppose those invitations must have overlapped each other a good deal, for we never had more guests than our two tables would accommodate, though the younger people at the table in the sitting-room had to sit in rocking chairs or on the sofa. After we were all seated, there was a moment's hush for the silent blessing, and then the talk began again, like a stream that has gathered new vigor from a moment's obstruction. Elderly Friends exchanged stories, and younger ones chaffed each other across the table, and the flow of good spirits that started there went on through the dish-washing, a social labor, in which the guests joined heartily with the family, and never ceased till mother sent the Friends to bed. Next morning, the good cheer continued, and the company had to be reminded that it was time to start for meeting, or we should all have been late, with one more entertaining story to remember.

All that day we spent at the meeting house, until we bade farewell to the visiting Friends at the close of the afternoon session. Then we came home at supper time to bring the house back to normal and to eat up the leavings. Mother would say: "Now Quarterly Meeting is over, it's the fall of the year," and we felt that that expression had a special significance for us, for after we had reached the high-water mark of domestic excitement in that sudden influx of company, what could be left us but a fall for the rest of the year?

—From The Westonian.

AN ARAB TRIBUTE TO MISSIONS.

An appeal that the governments of countries in which foreign missions are working should support them is one of the surest tributes to missionary usefulness and efficacy. Such a suggestion has just been published in Lisan El Hal (The Tongue of the Times), one of the leading Arabic daily papers in Beirut, Syria, concerning the work carried on by English Friends at Brummana, in which American Friends have displayed so much interest.

"The people of Brummana," says the writer, Yusef Safa, "have told me of the generosity of the Protestants to the inhabitants of that neighborhood during the war. They spent large sums of money to stave off famine, providing food, drugs and medical attention gratuitously from religious and humanitarian motives. But for them half at least of the population of the village would have perished.

"This English mission is the only philanthropic agency in Brummana. Such was its work during the war period: now it has turned its attention again to its well-known school and hospital.

"The school is one of the best in the country, and affords instruction in English, French, Arabic and mathematics. Special attention is given to the training of the scholars' characters, and inculcation of self-reliance as a means of success in life. The school has produced many men who have both benefited their country and received benefit, among them merchants, skillful doctors, politicians and officials, all of whom remember with gratitude the days of their youth spent in Brummana.

"It would be well if our respected government would take some account of the work of this mission, or even make an appropriation from the funds which it spends for the improvement of the country. The effect on the strength and enthusiasm of this enterprise would be considerable; and the government would thus share in the work of those who are laboring there for the public good."

DETROIT MEETING.

[A personal letter from Walter G. Heacock, well known to many Philadelphia Friends, and to many attached to Friendly ideals, a former student at Westtown, will appeal to our readers as introductory to the paper which follows.

W. G. H. attended our late Yearly Meeting and was helpful in certain sessions when matters of more than ordinary concern were before us.—EDS.]

DEAR FRIEND:—

The writer having had some experience with group meetings in Harrisburg, Pittsburgh and Detroit, expressed the opinion that work could be done in our large cities (especially those not having had Friends' meetings in the past) along Friendly lines that would, first, bring back to the Society those who have drifted away, and second, by taking advantage of the friendly attitude of the press and denominational interests for the work we have done in the foreign fields, get our message to a great many people, many of whom may be drawn closer to us.

The opportunity for service is unlimited and can comprehend many talents. As Detroit Meeting represents a definite move in this direction, it is believed by the writer that some account of our activities might be of timely interest; hence the following article.

W. G. HEACOCK.

The Friends of Detroit Meeting with the beginning of the third year of incorporated effort, feel that real progress has been made towards the establishment of a meeting of all Friends in a metropolitan community where heretofore no organized meeting existed, and where Friends, as such, were little known.

There are now ninety-nine members of this separate Monthly Meeting which is officially attached to Winchester Quarterly Meeting of Indiana Yearly Meeting. We have a mailing list of three hundred and ninety names of persons whose interest might reasonably be expected to be friendly.

As an evidence that this meeting has a place in the community is the fact that but seven of our members have had definite church connections in Detroit, and that this same condition obtains with hundreds of others who have not as yet become attached to this meeting, is a reasonable conclusion.

Detroit like most industrial centers has been hard hit during the past year. Many of our regular attendants have been out of employment and all have necessarily lived under very much reduced incomes. Even the apparently small matter of carfare has been an item to be considered when it is known that the average distance traveled by our attendants at meeting is five miles, while eleven, twelve and seventeen miles on interurban is necessary for some.

Strange as it may sound to outsiders, there are not more than half a dozen automobiles owned by our entire membership, and it occurs to the writer that in this alone can be found one of the reasons why our membership, made up as it is of such a large proportion of working people, both men and women, in but modest circumstances, have contributed so liberally to the upkeep of the meeting. In fact, it is doubtful if many meetings can show such a large number of regular contributors to the extent of their means as can be done by this meeting. Not only have they met the expenses of the work in large part, but have always responded to appeals for help from outside, especially in foreign fields.

During the past year the average attendance at our First-day morning services has been about fifty, with perhaps forty at First-day School, which is held in the morning, preceding the hour for worship. First-day evenings the Young Friends hold their meetings at six-thirty, followed by a social hour to get better acquainted. This meeting offers great possibilities and needs encouragement.

Our midweek meeting is held on Fourth-day evening, followed once a month by our regular business meeting, at which times a supper is served in order that those who are downtown need not go home.

Our midweek meetings are directly under our Overseers, a Committee of whom are regularly present. These meetings are quite informal, and usually a person belonging to the meeting is asked to act as temporary leader and it has been found that these meetings are oftentimes very precious occasions, all feeling their dependence upon the Head of the Church, and through a prayer service and a living silence, real help has come not alone to the membership, but in a very definite way to the leader for the evening, developing as it does an individual responsibility and confidence which perhaps is lacking on more formal occasions.

Every two weeks the women of the meeting who can possibly do so meet for a day's sewing. At these times a simple lunch is provided and a course of study and discussion of interest to Friends is carried on. Our women Friends feel these meetings are particularly helpful in matters relating to Discipline, and a more helpful spirit is maintained through becoming better acquainted with each other. The products of the sewing-room are sold at our Annual Meeting which has brought in sufficient money to provide dishes, silverware, etc., for our suppers.

The attendance upon most of these several meetings has been very gratifying, and the interest taken in the business of our Monthly Meetings has been very encouraging.

Our First-day School is well organized, especially our Primary Department, which has an average of ten little ones each week. We use the International lessons from the Quarterly and leaflets sent out from Richmond, Ind. We have been particularly favored in having plenty of teachers, and while many of them have had no previous experience, they have entered whole-heartedly into the work and are proving out the theory that consecrated effort is of itself a means to an end.

At our Meeting for Worship on First-day every opportunity is given those who may be present to enter fully into the service; visiting Friends especially being welcome and on such occasions it is not unusual to have double our usual attendance. On the sixteenth of Fourth Month, Morton C. Pierson, Secretary of the Detroit Federation of Churches, and J. Passmore Elkinton, of Philadelphia, were with us and an attendance of 110 was noted. On the twenty-third Fred J. Libby, of Washington, D. C., presented to us our responsibility as Friends in helping to prevent all future wars. Eighty-five were present to hear him and a very liberal response was given to his appeal for funds. Early in the Seventh Month next, Max I. Reich and Albert Votaw, of Philadelphia, are expected to spend a few days with us. It is hoped that others, who can, may include Detroit in their itinerary, especially through the summer vacation months.

It is felt that this meeting is working out in a practical way the problem of whether Friends, regardless of their previous definite experience in the matter of worship, might not be able to unite with others bearing the name of Friends in a fellowship and a religious exercise that is helpful not only individually, but has, perhaps, untold possibilities for the Society at large. As one visitor expressed it to the writer, "In Detroit Meeting you have no prejudices of environment to overcome and you can work together seeking only the best, while fearlessly approaching issues which in older communities of Friends would prevent action due to the fear of precedent."

It is felt that a sincere effort is maintained to carry on all our meetings under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, but using the talents God has given to each rather than placing a dependence upon anyone, or a group. The very nature of the work to be done must needs depend upon the greater number of spiritually-minded persons feeling they have a service here and a responsibility individually which, perhaps, is not so keenly considered in other places. Such as these will be gladly welcomed, as there are so many opportunities for service in addition to those mentioned, such as local community work, following up the names of Friends given by ministers of other churches, Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A.; also, attention to colored people, which of itself should claim our attention. All of these, however, need not only workers, but money. At present the Home Mission Board of the Five Years' Meeting is contributing the salary of Anna Kelsey, who officiates in pastoral and secretarial capacity, while some help has been given by Indiana Yearly Meeting, but during the past year Detroit Friends have contributed upwards of $2000 and no debts have been contracted. A budget for the ensuing year has been prepared which comprehends more extensive work along the lines suggested, but which can be followed only as means are made available.

It is hoped that Friends generally may consider this meeting as one of their open doors here at home, and as the way opens, share with us in carrying on the work that seems to many to offer such promise, not alone to Friends, but those who are hungry for the Quaker message and what it implies.

TURNERS OF THE OTHER CHECK.

In Moravia the Huterisch people lived for nearly a hundred years and prospered greatly. In the beginning of the Seventeenth Century, Bohemia and Moravia were in the throes of the terrible wars that culminated in the battle of White Mountain in 1620 and lost Bohemia her independence. The Huterisch people were there during those awful days. They suffered at the hands of each invading army every sort of plunder, ravaging and indignity.

So great was the suffering that they left the farms they had for a hundred years been cultivating, and fled to Hungary to begin life anew. Again they went through the hardships of pioneer days. Again they began to see the fruits of their labor in prosperous homes and an easier life. Again persecution arose, and again they fled, this time to Siebenburgen, or Transylvania.

And again the old, old story repeated itself. Here there were Turks and Tartars and Haiduks to invade and plunder. Men must stand guard over the women and children while others went to the fields to work. Wholly unarmed, using no force to resist force, they were always the losers. Soon all their possessions were gone. Famine overtook them. In direst need they sent delegates to Holland and Christian brethren there sent them relief. But they knew it was impossible to continue living under the old conditions, and so, after a hundred and fifty years in Hungary and Siebenburgen, they undertook a pilgrimage to Wallachia, which is now southern Roumania.

In their first year in Roumania the Russian army was there fighting the Turkish one, and again they suffered the horrors of war and of poverty. Seeing their wretched plight, a great Russian general told them of the generous terms just then being offered to German people, and especially to Mennonites, by the Empress Catherine, who had great tracts of devastated lands in the south of Russia, and needed colonists. A German princess herself, the Empress Catherine had heard of the wonderful farms the Mennonites had developed out of worthless swamps in Germany. She knew also they were becoming extremely fearful of the growing military spirit of that country and were considering emigration. So she offered them free land, exemption from taxes for a period of years, religious freedom, and entire exemption from military service. Such an offer at such a time was a godsend to Mennonite and Huterite alike. They went to Russia, built up villages and prosperous homes.

For a hundred years all went well, in fact, too well. Jealousy arose, and naturally too, among the Russians who lived all around them and to whom no such generous terms had been given. Complaints were entered. When the hundred years' lease was up, the government refused to renew it on the old terms. Under the new contract they were required to do military service, and to give up their own Swiss-German dialect for Russian. To a Huterite and to a Mennonite those two things were impossible. For one principle they had suffered a succession of exiles for three hundred and fifty years. To give up their language was to give up that to which they clung almost as dearly as to life, the great tie which bound them to those fathers who had founded their faith.

There was no alternative except another exile. By thousands upon thousands they set out, until in alarm the Russian government woke up and tried to compromise. Forestry service would be substituted for military service. Under these modified terms many of the Mennonite people stayed, but of the Huterisch folks, none. All of them migrated to America, some to the United States and some to Canada. Most of those who came to South Dakota arrived in 1874. Since 1920, when their journeyings began, new fields of religious and political freedom had been laid out in a new continent which might be tilled in peace.

But when political and religious liberty have gone to seed it makes a sorry field of freedom certainly. We shall be bereft of more than their model farmstead when these Huterisch folk have left us on what seems to be their endless quest. The simple routine of their day, effective in thrift and prosperity in material things, comes from an inner discipline that has its first result in spiritual abundance. The relation of these two in their life is constantly visible.

JAPANESE NOTES.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.

The Yearly Meeting was held in Tsuchiura this year, and we all lived at the hotel. It was a very nice Yearly Meeting. The Mission and the Japanese Friends have drawn much closer together than they were three or four years ago. That was evidenced by the number of foreigners that they put on the program this year. And then they have become more and more Friends, with a broad outlook and a feeling of mission in the world. That was shown by the correspondence they undertook, letters to twelve different Yearly Meetings with some especial concern in each. Nomura San is really a remarkably good clerk and there are others, deeply concerned Friends, among the laymen. Besides the business sessions there was an afternoon for First-day School work, at which a paper was read followed by some very suggestive discussion; a women's meeting at which Iwasawa San and Minnie Bowles spoke; an evening public meeting at which T. E. Jones spoke on Christianity and the Social question, and Hirakawa San spoke. The last afternoon was a Social Meeting and we all took our lunches to a very pretty place some miles from Tsuchiura by a river bank with beautiful cherry trees bordering one side.

I have had all varieties of company this past week. One morning at 6.30 the carpenter who built our house at Takayama and a staff of his turned up. He had written that they were to be on a sight-seeing trip, but I did not know when he would arrive. Another overnight guest was a woman and her year and a-half old baby. I found them when I got back from one of the children's classes one rainy afternoon. I had never seen her before, but had heard the Binfords talk about her husband. She had come just for sociability and a little spiritual food. She carried the baby on her back and her baggage in her hand for eight miles.

THE RIGHT QUALIFICATION FOR RELIGIOUS LABOR.

[The following came to our office a few days since. With a "Visitation Committee" of our Yearly Meeting, recently appointed, it is peculiarly fitting that this message should be pondered.—Eds.]

We must live in [the power of Truth] at other times, if we expect its gracious assistance in the weighty affairs of the Church, when met for the management thereof, for that which is born of the flesh is but flesh, and cannot enter into the kingdom of God, nor so much as see it. All is certainly of the flesh that hath its principal delight and satisfaction in sublunary things, so that although some may maintain the character of God's people as to the outward appearances, yet, if the love of earthly things hath the chief room in their hearts, the love of the Father is not in them, and therefore it is impossible they should be qualified to do God's work.

The same reason and understanding by which outward affairs are managed, is altogether unfit for the discipline of the Church; "for the world by wisdom knows not God," and consequently is not likely to understand his work. Hence if any speak, or act in their own strength and wisdom merely, their endeavours to promote the work may mar it, and they frequently darken counsel by a multitude of words without right knowledge. Instead of raising life in a meeting, they bring death and darkness over it, to the great pain of the upright hearted, who are not always ready, like those hinted at, but experimentally knowing their sufficiency to be of God, for every good work and word, they dare not move until it please Him, by moving upon their hearts, to open their understandings, and to be a spirit of judgment unto them; in this only, there is binding and loosing, remitting and retaining with divine approbation, which is livingly known and sealed upon the understanding of the faithful by the Holy Spirit of promise.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

THE UNITED STATES AND GERMANY HAVE RESUMED diplomatic relations with each other after an interruption of rather more than five years. Dr. Otto Wiedfeldt, the new German Ambassador, as representative of the business interests of the Fatherland, was presented to President Harding at the White House on the 25th ult.

A. B. Houghton is the ambassador to Germany from the United States, and the following extract from his speech just before leaving this country indicates the spirit he is taking to his important and delicate task. He said:

"I do not believe in the moral or spiritual or even the economic value of hate. Hate serves no useful purpose. It is far more dangerous to those who hate than to those who are hated. It leads only to confusion and destruction."

"IS ORGANIZED CHRISTIANITY FOR WAR OR PEACE?"—In the last issue of the Federated Council Bulletin, Fred. B. Smith, a leader in organized church work, who is just returning from three active months in the Far East, has a thought-provoking article with the above title. Among other things, he says, "Only the Christian Gospel of brotherhood can furnish the moral and spiritual foundation that will make peace really possible. The Christian Church, moreover, is the only organization with the world contacts which make possible a common binder for preserving peace. . . . If the Church fails to take a new leadership in behalf of peace, if it fails to remove the sting of this war-interpretation of Christianity, we may as well banish our hopes of winning the world to Christ for many, many generations. I believe the Great War has set back by many years what might have been the progress of Christianity in China and India."

Many things remain to be done by the Church, but one thing it must do! Proclaim and follow the New Testament teaching of peace and brotherhood or eventually it won't have anything to do.

GERTRUDE BAER, ONE OF THE THREE EUROPEAN WOMEN recently in the United States in the interest of world peace, speaking of Germany, said: "To-day there is no longer any conscription or compulsory military service. We must not only guard against the consequences of the past war but also work against the possibility of future wars. There is no better way to attain this than by the interchange of magazines, books, literature and education among the nations. Moreover, the great body of younger people of the different nations can demand that the newer civilization be built, not upon a foundation of competition and greed, but by preserving amicable relationships with international good-will and kindly feelings."

AT THE AMERICAN-JAPAN SOCIETY DINNER in Tokyo, on the 11th ult., given in honor of the Japanese delegation to the Washington Conference, Admiral Kato, one of the delegates, declared that no limitation of armaments was practicable unless a strong naval power led the way and showed a sincere intention to restrict its own armaments.

"President Harding, Secretary Hughes and other American statesmen," he said, "endeavored both in and out of the Conference to create a friendly, conciliatory atmosphere among the representatives and journalists of the various countries and made strenuous efforts to attain the object of the Conference."

"I believe the atmosphere of the Conference constituted a signal contribution toward the success of the deliberations. The American manner of handling it left nothing to be desired, and credit is due Secretary Hughes for his increasing care, intense earnestness and indefatigable industry, as well as for the unalloyed sense of justice with which he discharged his onerous duties."

In commenting on Admiral Kato's remarks at the dinner Secretary Hughes remarked, "I regard the work of the Washington Conference as establishing peace in the Orient, and I only wish the same results could be achieved in other parts of the world."

AT THE INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF TRADES UNIONS, representing 23,000,000 members of nineteen European nations, in session at Rome a few weeks ago, the question of attacking war and militarism was introduced by Leon Jouhaux, Secretary of the French General Federation of Labor, whose report on the problems of the reconstruction of Europe ended with the declaration that "the first essential is disarmament and elimination of war." An anti-war resolution before the Congress says, "The Congress declares it the duty of organized workers to oppose every war which threatens to break out in the future by all means at their disposition, and if necessary by an international general strike."

BERTRAM PICKARD—PAMPHLET—THE ROOTS OF WAR.—"John P. Fletcher, recently returned from Germany, gave an exceedingly interesting account of the Pacifist movement, both in Germany and France. The breadth and strength of the movement in Germany is extraordinary, and in France pacifism is far more prevalent than is generally known. He pointed to the possibility of co-operation of pacifists throughout Europe in a great "No More War" movement that should stir the imagination of men." —The Friend [London].

TACNA-ARICA CONFERENCE HOLDS OPENING SESSIONS.—What is known as the Tacna-Arica Conference held its first meetings in Washington the latter part of last month. Only Chile and Peru are represented in this Conference. They will try to settle in a friendly way a boundary question that has troubled these two countries since they signed the treaty of Ancon in 1883. This treaty ended the five-year war between Peru and Bolivia on one side and Chile on the other.

Under this treaty a plebiscite or vote of the people was to have been held within ten years to decide whether the provinces of Tacna and Arica should become part of Chile or of Peru. The plebiscite has never been held because Peru and Chile have never been able to agree upon a method of holding it. The provinces are now occupied by Chile.

Bolivia was not invited to the Conference, although at the League of Nations meetings last fall the Bolivian delegates hotly demanded that the League revise the Treaty of Ancon, claiming that it barred Bolivia from an outlet to the sea.—From Current Events.

THE CHRISTIAN CRUSADE FOR A WARLESS WORLD is the title of a new leaflet issued by the Commission on International Justice and Goodwill of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

Its closing announcement is "A mighty crusade against the whole war system is now imperative. The Churches must wage this crusade with the same holy enthusiasm and unflinching devotion that characterized the ancient crusades. We must enroll intelligent crusaders by the million. None other can be efficient. No conscripts can be forced into this war to end war. We have, moreover, priceless values at stake in our crusade more fundamental and essential to religion and to civilization than the crusaders of the middle ages had in theirs."

To aid in this mighty campaign the Commission on International Justice is preparing a manual for volunteers. It is called

"THE CHRISTIAN CRUSADE FOR A WARLESS WORLD."

It will deal with the problem of the Church in a warring world, with modern civilization as a preparation for either a warless world or a world destroyed by war, and with the ideals that will create a warless world. It will describe some concrete tasks that must be accomplished if we are in earnest with our program to end war. It will outline policies, procedures and courses of action. An important appendix will provide additional significant material together with suggestive questions by which each of the eight chapters may be made the basis of discussion for study classes. A selected bibliography is included of the best books for collateral use by classes and especially by class leaders.

This manual for volunteers and study course for classes will be ready by the end of the summer, for use during the coming autumn and winter.

HE THAT FORSAKETH NOT.

I have a great aversion to anything that savors of militarism. I dislike the army style of breeches, rolled leggings, Boy Scout uniforms—even the color of khaki cloth. There are times, however, when to convey an idea to the public mind it is necessary to use war phraseology. This I do now, in order to illustrate one phase of the Service Committee work.

In considering applicants and interviewing possible workers, I often hear such expressions as "My first duty is to my business associates—I would lose too much if I went into the Service Work for a year." Or, "My first duty is to my home." There is always more or less justification for such statements; but what about the soldier's obligations, as compared with Christian obligations? Paul said in 11 Tim., Chapter 2, verses 3-4: "Suffer hardship with me as a good soldier of Christ Jesus. No soldier on service entangles himself in the affairs of this life; that he may please him who enrolled him as a soldier."

When the war broke out, every man of military age was drafted; practically no consideration was given to business obligations, family life or future prospects. The government officials said that certain individuals were needed: rich and poor, educated and uneducated, the carefree and the heavily-laden were taken and paid a dollar a day and keep. No matter if mothers were taken sick and pleas were made to those in highest authority in Washington for permission to see "My boy just once more" before she went into the great beyond, the boy was not allowed to come. Wives were not able to maintain themselves and their children on their income, but the husband was not released. The officials said that the work at hand was of greater importance than the feelings or welfare of any given individual.

Is the work of the church any less important? Is the welfare or personal wishes of any individual of greater importance than the work at hand, namely, the bringing of the kingdom of heaven to earth? When God calls—and He calls each of us to do something more than look after our own business or family—has the individual a right to hesitate? Protestantism denies the spiritual authority of the Pope; but it affirms the supreme authority of God over man, individually or in groups. The great trouble with the Christian church to-day is that the individual members do not feel that they have been drafted for service. The church represents to many of them a social club, a valuable institution because it helps to keep down the careless or undesirable elements—a refuge in time of death; but the call of the Christ to "Follow Me" cannot be denied.

What else could Jesus have meant when He said that he that forsaketh not father or mother, wife, children, lands, is not worthy of Me? What else could He have meant when He said except the corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone? Or, he that saveth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for My sake shall find it?

In the furtherance of the war all individual interests were submerged. It was represented that the interests of the group were greater than the interests of any individual; that the interests of the nation were greater than the interests of any State; and that the interest of the Allied World were greater than the interests of any one nation.

I do not justify these conclusions; but I do maintain that the interests of the spiritual kingdom are greater than the temporal interests of any one individual. We have built upon the theory that our lives were our own; when, as a matter of fact, they are not, for "We are bought with a price." We have a service to render, and cannot for one moment justify the thought that an individual life is of more consequence than the doing of the will of God.

THE FLOUR CAMPAIGN.

In the Flour Campaign for Russian Relief, the banner goes to the little town of Moundridge, Kansas, where a town of 700 people and the surrounding community contributed two carloads of flour. The city of St. Louis contributed 6,000 barrels of flour; and Trenton, New Jersey, $5,300 for the purchase of flour. Pasadena, California, has contributed 1,160 barrels.

A PART OF THE DAY'S WORK.

In Sorochinskoye they say you can reach Grachefka in a day if you start early in the morning. That may be possible if you drive a horse that has not been subsisting on thatch, and follow a road that is not a little of river, a little of avalanche and a little of muddy prairie. But there are not such horses in Buzuluk Ooyezd and there are certainly no such roads on the way to this new northern outpost. It took me two days, the labor of 6 horses and 6 drivers and the over-night hospitality of a cabinetmaker to land me safe in Grachefka this afternoon. It is about forty miles from Sorochinskoye.

I started early First-day morning, for they said, "If you wait another day you may not be able to go for perhaps six weeks. As it is you must run a race with the sun; the roads are softening." We caught up with a caravan of peasants crawling north after a semi-satisfactory search for seed grain in the Ukraine. We fell in line with the several hundred sleds and wound slowly toward Nikolsky. Every time the line stopped to pull a weaker brother out of a hole in the slush, the horse or the steer behind rooted among the bags of the sled in front in search of a straw. A desperately skinny steer tried to munch the fur off my coat collar. It would be difficult to say whether horses or men are the hungrier.

While waiting for a change of horses in Nikolsky, several women came out of the Soviet headquarters and approached me with some curiosity. From their very frank discussion, I gathered first, that they seldom see an "Amerikansky" in that village; second, that some of their children are living on Quaker products; third, that women are given a considerable "say" on all committees dealing with the famine. One of the women handed me one of the pancake-shaped loaves of bread made of lebeda and a spoonful of meal. This is one of the best of the 46 varieties (the Soviet Government Hunger Museum in Samara actually exhibits this number) they are eating in the state of Samara. All of them call for an india-rubber stomach. Only the very fittest can survive such human fodder. But these women were apparently the fittest for they chatted pleasantly and eagerly and seemed but slightly dispirited by the fearful deprivations and suffering of famine time.

We reached Ivanofka about four o'clock. The office of the local Soviet was filled with smoke and a First-day afternoon committee meeting when I ducked through the low door and presented my order for another pair of horses. A huge, handsome fellow explained that their horses were all tired out. It would be impossible to reach Grachevka before midnight so it would be better to remain there for a night's rest. A cabinetmaker, the most prosperous man in the community, offered me hospitality. After tea and white bread from the Mission basket, the guest went for a wade in the village. The younger people were out to enjoy the First-day evening air, not exactly promenading, but sitting or standing on the dirty snow-drifts rolling literally to the roofs. Giggling girls, busy little boys building dams in the thaw streams running in every direction through the streets, and a few men eager to talk and find out about your business and tell you about theirs and the hunger—normal village life at least for those who could come out. For those within, sick and starving, the horror of the winter continues, a horror that the Quakers have lessened only to the extent of feeding fifty children.

This morning the family stirred at 5.30. When a family stirs in a Russian cottage and you are sleeping in the same room, you feel inclined to stir yourself. Moreover, the fresh horses were waiting at the gate and within ten minutes I was picking my way behind them down the torrent-skirted streets.

Grachevka, at last, was sighted over two hours before we reached it. The first fifteen houses I pass on the main street leading into the town are dead and empty; the inhabitants gone somewhere, the thatch used for food and part of the wood for fuel.

The town is aware that we are here. Anna Herkner arrived three days ago with ten sleds and an interpreter. Already three children's homes are wearing garments from the Philadelphia store-room. The children are now receiving dry rations to be taken home and cooked, for in the coming weeks it will be next to impossible for them, so short of shoes, to get to the kitchens. The ARA "Kokoroosa" (corn for adult feeding) will begin moving to-day. They are waiting in line for it now. This is one of the worst districts. The famine has wrought here its full quota of terrors. So we are feeding 70 per cent. of the children or more than in any other district in the American section.

The mail goes but once a week, the next in ten minutes.

THE complete Christian will ask the permanence of the things he possesses, adaptation for what is to take place, and the eternity of those things which he shall receive. And the things which are really good, the things which concern the soul, he prays that they may belong to him and remain with him. And so he desires not anything that is absent, being content with what is present. For he is not deficient in the good things which are proper to him; being already sufficient for himself, through Divine grace and knowledge. But having become sufficient in himself, he stands in no want of other things. But knowing the sovereign will, and possessing as soon as he prays, being brought into close contact with the almighty power, and earnestly desiring to be spiritual, through boundless love, he is united to the Spirit.—CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

A PERSON in attendance at a recent Educational Conference in Geneva writes: "Twenty-six nations are represented here, and the ease with which one representative after another expresses himself (in Esperanto) on every subject of the Conference is itself the most striking testimony to the practical utility of the language."

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING issued a brief letter of good-will to the groups and meetings of Friends in Germany. It is a matter of no small interest that there were at least a few such groups, but when one reads the subjoined list he will be surprised at the number to whom the letter went.

It is well to remember in this connection, that the labor of love, directed by the Service Committee and sustained by every one who gave even a little toward its support, is responsible for this great awakening.

Friends have been very cautious that their errands of real mercy should not be misconstrued and made to appear as a means of winning men and women to the Friends.

As openings have been presented for spreading the simple Gospel message they have of course been grasped, but systematic religious teaching from the standpoint of a particular sect has been zealously guarded against.

If there has been a turning on the part of some to the simple method of Friends in the matter of worship, it seems thus far to have savored but little of human origin.

The Friend (London) states: "The financial position of the Society as revealed by accounts showed marked improvement, the balance in hand of £6,077 at the beginning of the year having increased to £8,691 by the end of the year. The contributions from the Quarterly Meetings as a whole fell far short of the £7,500 asked for by the Yearly Meeting."

THE biggest year of Bible circulation since the high levels of the war period is reported by the American Bible Society in their Annual Report just issued.

The total number of volumes circulated during the year was 4,855,464, which is more than a million in excess of the distribution of the preceding year. The largest increase is shown in China, where 2,362,730 were circulated. From Japan, the Near East, and all of Latin America, there has come an increased demand so great that the Society has been unable to meet it.

During the year, the Society has been busy with many important translation programs. The revised Spanish New Testament has been completed and will be ready for distribution during the coming year. Translation work has gone forward also in Luragoli for missions in British East Africa; in Quechua for the Bolivian Indians; in Zulu for the black people of South Africa; in K'pelle for use in Liberia. In China large parts of the Scriptures have been issued in the new Phonetic Script, which is a simplified written form endorsed and promoted by the government.

During the year the Society has arranged for the reorganization of its manufacturing program and hopes thereby to largely increase its output. It will make use of the largest and best organized printing concerns in America for the rapid production of its books in many languages for use in all parts of the world. It will continue to use its own plates and exercise painstaking supervision of versions in accordance with its policy of over one hundred years.

THE yearly showing of the London Friends' Book Store, known as the Devonshire Book Shop, gives a decided shrinkage—a total loss of £1,274.

IDLE MEETING-HOUSES.

A few weeks ago, on a glorious First-day afternoon, a group of worshippers crowded the quaint old meeting-house at Greenwich, in southern New Jersey, where the meeting records date back to 1604. One was led almost perforce to ask whether even in communities where the holding of a regular meeting is not deemed practicable, it is right that a meeting-house should stand idle for three hundred and sixty-four days in every year, or for all but one day in the month, as at Merchantville, or for all but three or four days in the summer, as at Barnegat. But ought we to stop there? In the strongest centres, where the meetings are the largest and most flourishing, these houses, which might be so useful, are seldom opened more than twice a week.

No attempt will be made, in this article, to exhaust a subject so comprehensive as that of the possible utilization of our meeting-houses, but merely to outline two, out of many, avenues of such service—two, which are especially open to groups of concerned Younger Friends.

During the past year we have enjoyed the visits of several eminent English Friends. As they went about in our different communities they could not fail to be struck, and some of them gave expression to it, with the contrast of their active First-day evening meetings at home and our own meeting-houses, closed, barred and shuttered after the morning worship. They feel that their evening meetings give an opportunity for reaching out to those who are, it may be, connected with no religious denomination, but who are seekers in as true a sense as any in George Fox's day. The first line of service we shall consider, therefore, is that of an evening meeting on First-day.

Three fairly distinct types of evening meeting have come into the present writer's experience. First, a regular meeting for worship, held just as the morning meeting is held, without any special announcement to the public and without any explanation of why we worship as we do. This has certain disadvantages, as those who have attended the evening meeting, held at Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, in the winter months, will readily allow. It brings out but a slim attendance of our own membership, and while strangers may occasionally drop in, they are likely to be somewhat mystified, and at a loss to know what we are really striving to do. It cannot be said to reach outside.

The fairly natural reaction to this state of things is the organization of some form of "mission meeting." In a number of communities in England, where the regular meeting for worship is strictly held to in the morning, a programmed "service," with hymns (and possibly instrumental music, too), a time definitely assigned for prayer, and a set address, is organized in the evening, drawing, sometimes to the naïve surprise of the organizers, "a quite different group" from those who come out in the morning! The chief criticism of such a meeting would be based on what to many of us would seem its utter inconsistency. If our manner of worship is something esoteric, suited only to an elect few, to which we cling because we ourselves personally prefer it, and because we are sentimentally attached to it as being the way our fathers worshipped, then, of course, we should be willing to forgo personal choice and supply that which will appeal to and attract the greatest possible number outside the charmed circle. But if our way of worship approaches, more nearly than any other way we know, that worship "in spirit and in truth," which Christ told us is what our Father asks of us, if we feel that Friends were from the beginning Divinely called to worship as we seek to do, and that our meetings are a part of our testimony, a banner given us to display because of the Truth, then what is required of us in the morning we shall find required in the evening as well. The Light Within does not disappear with that of the sun, at nightfall. This inconsistency will scarcely fail to be evident to those who come into such gatherings, and who become interested, as it is usually hoped they will, to attend the morning meetings as well. Either they will become utterly confused in their conception of Quaker worship or they will, rather logically, wish to see introduced into the morning meeting that which plays such a vigorous part in the evening.

A third sort of evening meeting, which seems to possess the outreaching spirit of the "mission meeting" without its inconsistencies or the probability of creating confused impressions, is of the kind that is divided into two distinct parts: a teaching meeting, and the meeting for worship. One of the most successful of these, which it has been my privilege to attend, was in the little town of Yeovil, near Street, in the south of England. Here the group—none of them Friends but the leader and the visitor—happened to be studying zealously the Journal of John Woolman. When the time of study and the expounding of Friends' principles was finished, there was a clear break, and the period of worship began. No one confused what had been said in the first part with what was uttered in the second: the "teaching ministry," with the "prophetic."

Those who object that only persons who have been so trained and educated for generations can appreciate our silent, waiting worship, I would refer to returned workers with the American Friends' Service Committee missions in France, Germany, Austria, Poland or elsewhere. Could you attend some of the regularly instituted Friends' meetings of a First-day morning (or evening) in Berlin, Paris, Vienna or Stuttgart, you would have all doubts dispelled on that score, and your faith in the latent power of our way of worship vastly strengthened.

In this third sort of evening meeting, as described above, there is obviously opportunity for the widest range of teaching, study-circle or discussion groups, as may seem best suited to the particular circumstances. The essential thing is to keep this hour distinct from the time of worship, in the minds of all concerned.

So much for our First-day evenings. The other suggestion as to possible use of our meeting-houses is along the line of "Tramps." These may last from a week-end to ten days. They may be attended by a half-dozen or a half-hundred. Just as the war broke out we were experiencing in the Philadelphia neighborhood something of what such group activities might mean, but of course the years that followed gave little scope for carrying forward this sort of work. It has been my happy lot to be a member of one of the big English "Tramps" (that at Kendal, in the Lake Country, in 1912) and of the one held in and about Moorestown (in 1914). Briefly they can be described as follows: A group of (mostly) young people get together in vacation time in some centre of Quakerism, where there are outlying meetings and communities readily accessible, and where simple but suitable living arrangements are easily planned. The "Tramp" has a two-fold purpose: the deepened fellowship among a group met together "with one accord, in one place," their more perfect understanding of conditions in the region they have selected, and, on the other hand, the stimulus and encouragement to the meetings and communities among whom they move about.

The mornings are usually planned after the manner of a summer-school or conference. The tramps themselves, or lecturers who may be invited especially, discuss various aspects of Bible study, Quaker history, social problems or religious truth. A devotional period held daily is of great help. In the afternoons the group as a whole, or if too large, in subdivisions, goes off to a nearby meeting-house or town, where notice is given of an evening meeting. This may be in the nature of an "appointed meeting" for worship, a conference meeting, or, as often is the case, both—the latter preceding the former. As the days pass there is ample opportunity for tennis, swimming, long walks and all sorts of jollification (it is, happily, still true that "a merry heart doeth good like medicine") together with the more serious things, and the band is bound together, the tide rises, till at the end there is felt, often, a sense of the Divine presence and power that may be beyond anything that some of the group have ever known. The local meetings are cheered and encouraged, closed meeting-houses are opened, in villages where there is no meeting the truth as Friends view it is spread, yet in a way as natural, as untrammelled, as consistent with our ideal of Quaker freedom as were the ancient "threshing meetings" or the labors of the "First Publishers."

Many are wanting to be engaged about their Father's business in a way rather more definite than they are at present. They feel the importance of allowing every possible opportunity for the spontaneous working of the Spirit of Christ, guiding them and showing them what He wants them to do. They realize how essential it is to let God work, and while they may use another term for it, they appreciate the danger of what used to be called the "activity of the creature"—working in our own strength, filling up and obstructing the channels of the spirit with the matters that our own imperfect judgments deem important. It is hoped that these paragraphs may contain suggestions to just such persons of lines along which they can work: lines definite and clear-cut on the one hand, but which, on the other, sacrifice in no way that freedom of the Spirit.

AN OPPORTUNITY AT LAST!

It has been the desire of many Young Friends to enter more fully into the responsibility for our small country meetings. At a recent discussion, a small group came to the conclusion that there are three main possibilities open for this. There are visits to country meetings by small groups of Friends; the holding of week-end conferences in a struggling neighborhood; and full-grown "Tramps," such as are described in "Idle Meeting Houses."

A number of Young Friends have already written us of their desire to visit meetings during the summer. It will be excellent for small congenial groups to organize themselves to attend meetings. However, if individuals prefer to let us know at the Young Friends' office, 20 South Twelfth Street, we will gladly endeavor to make up parties, or to fill extra seats in autos to go to outlying meetings. We will be very glad to know of meetings that would appreciate visits from small groups of Friends, and we will be very thankful for all the co-operation you give us in these points and in reporting trips both prospective and accomplished, so that we may attempt to distribute the visitation evenly. Lastly, we will be glad to make any arrangements with the local Friends that may help.

The second proposition of a week-end conference in some country neighborhood requires only a little more planning. A group might gather on Sixth-day evening at some meeting-house to get acquainted. After spending the night in homes of Friends or others roundabout, they could assemble again on Seventh-day morning for a Bible Class or a conference discussion. The afternoon might well be taken up in extending a "house-to-house" invitation to the residents of the neighborhood to attend the appointed meeting or tea meeting which would consume the evening. First-day morning would afford an opportunity to visit three regular meetings at the conference seat or others nearby. All this would involve very little expense beyond the carfare. The fellowship of the group would be very valuable as well as the service to the community. Next year, such an adventure might develop into a real "Tramp."

Does this interest you? Can we possibly arrange one or two such week-ends for this summer? If you are interested let us know.

If there are neighborhoods which would appreciate such a visit, we shall be glad to hear from you! The visiting group or groups will feel their youth and their inability to help as they want to, but they will come with a real desire to give of their best.

M. J. M.

A PRAYER.

Yet these hands shake so that I cannot hold
A cup of water where men faint with pain,
And these lips twist so that I cannot frame
Even the comfort of Thy name.
And these feet stumble and I cannot run
To lift a fallen child.
Lord, not for a heart cold
I pray, and not for eyes
Turned to the angelic skies
In peace again,
But that Thy Undeified
Strong Son
May succor me,
And wash me clean from poison of my fears;
That being made strong and sweet
I, even as He,
May drink Thy cup of tears and then
With steady lips and hands and feet
May walk with men.

WHAT IS THE USE OF A YOUNG FRIENDS' COMMITTEE?

It was one of those soft warm days in Sixth Month when the shade is so peaceful, that we gathered in a semi-circle in Maple Grove on the Westtown south lawn. Two hundred and fifty perhaps there were of us, between fifteen and thirty-five years old, mostly between twenty and thirty, Young Friends from all over Philadelphia Yearly Meeting and some visitors. For several days we had sought Truth in class and devotional groups. Here on First-day we worshipped together. One by one deliberately with vibrant silences as their background came the earnest vocal offerings. As eager, humble children of our Heavenly Father we were brought very close together in life's travel. The Spirit of His Christ overshadowed us.

Another time it was at Ardmore that we held the meeting which some readers of this will well remember. We felt that our week-end conference in conjunction with the Summer School at Haverford needed some outreaching expression toward our neighbors. So we secured a room in the Y. M. C. A. and on our own account advertised a public Friends' meeting. That was the first time I think I ever had the responsibility of breaking a Friends' meeting. A splendid training in Eldership it was. As clear as could be it was to me that no vocal service was mine that day, but an earnest travail of Spirit with the others of our little company who were drawn to give voice in praise and testimony to the reality of spiritual things, until it seemed right to close the meeting.

Again it was in our regular monthly Committee meetings at the Institute that we were brought weightily under the problems of the Society and of Christ's Kingdom as we tried to be led in leading Young Friends to a fuller life. The time and effort required to maintain a central Young Friends' Committee can be justified only by useful results. Time properly brings changes, but to those of us who have shared the spiritual responsibilities of such a Committee, its experiences have contributed conspicuously of bettership in our lives.

Thus far in Philadelphia and probably elsewhere there has been, I believe, no jealousy between old and young. The children love tenderly their parents and older Friends, but there is a psychological deepening when young inexperienced hearts carry sober responsibilities alone, of a meeting for worship, of a conference, or even the more practical details of work to develop spiritual character in their own generation.

Each group of Young Friends will have to face its own problems, but if, as one who has profited greatly by a share in the responsibilities of the Philadelphia Young Friends' Committee, I can help with suggestions, they would be that the Committee meet regularly to bring into intimate acquaintance representatives from the different Quarters, that this acquaintance be enlarged by periodical visits to local meetings on the part of the Committee's Chairman or Secretary and as many exchanging delegations as possible. Where way opens and older Friends approve, public meetings for worship conducted by serious Young Friends are invaluable to the Young Friends themselves and should honor Truth as well.

Our lives seem too busy with work, charities and travel to favor more conferences, but I am quite sure young lives between sixteen and twenty-five greatly need the deliberate, earnest comradeship of the inspirational conference, extending over several days. I hope some Friendly agency will provide such at Westtown or Haverford, or elsewhere within reach of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting members, say at least every three years. We need it in addition to Northfield, Silver Bay and Earlharn.

J. PASSMORE ELKINTON.

RUFUS M. JONES'S ADDRESS AT CRUM CREEK.

On the evening of Fifth Month 17th, the youth of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting assembled for their annual outing at Crum Creek in Delaware County. Since these outings became a regular feature of the program of the Young Friends' Movement, many erstwhile eligibles have crossed the fateful line which the officials of this movement have established between youth and middle age. Their places, however, were filled with newcomers who desire to "move" with other Young Friends—especially when the movement is toward the open woods, a pleasant stream, sandwiches and ice cream.

When the huge bon-fire began to repel the encroaching shadows, and the remnants of the "victuals," as Rufus Jones later called them, were being fed to the indigenous youth of the region, the hillside took on the aspect of a Quaker meeting.

The early part of Rufus Jones's remarks was an emphasis upon the present upward and outward trend of the Society of Friends. He quoted the remarks of Franklin concerning the new American Republic in the dark days of the first Congress:

"He had wondered whether the Republic was a rising or a setting sun, but had become assured that it was a rising sun." Rufus Jones stated that when he also was "young" he had wondered whether the Society of Friends was a rising or setting sun. After many years of such wondering he had become convinced that it was a rising sun. We could not possibly realize, he assured us, the revolutionary changes that had taken place in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting during the period of his knowledge of it. From a group with an ingrowing consciousness, intent largely upon the preservation for itself of certain ancient Quaker doctrines and forms, it had become a group with a dominant desire for outward service and a readiness to co-operate with other agencies for the achievement of its broadened aims.

He placed upon the group on the hillside before him and those whom they represented, the task of fulfilling his prophecy of a "rising sun." "Die Reihe ist an Ihnen," he told us.

As a necessary equipment for the task he outlined the following:

1. A Vision of the Opportunity. The post-war world, with its ancient faiths shaken or destroyed, needs a religion grounded in reality and verified by an actual, inward experience of God. This kind of a religion the Society of Friends is peculiarly fitted to interpret.

2. An Experience of God for Ourselves. The springs of opportunity will dry up and the machinery of service will delay without a first-hand knowledge of Him who is the source of inspiration and power.

3. An Historical Perspective. It is impossible correctly to analyze current tendencies and problems without a knowledge of history. Much mistaken and unbalanced emphasis and effort could be avoided by a knowledge of the causes and effects of similar problems in past cycles of the life of our own Society and the religious world at large. Tolerance and breadth of spirit (essential Christian virtues) are acquired by extending the horizon of our understanding over the successes and failures of the earlier builders of the Kingdom of God.

4. Determination to Succeed. We can succeed in the tasks laid upon the Society of Friends if we will to do so. In the realm of material things the will is not supreme. We cannot change the contour of our features or the color of our hair. But in the realm of the spirit we can absolutely determine the character and course of our life and effort,—so we were encouraged and admonished by this great Quaker student of psychology and religion.

HOME DISCOVERIES.

It was a warm summer evening—the sort of evening when one wishes for the seashore, the mountains, the Hudson Bay or somewhere cooler—that we stumbled upon Mount Pleasant. There is always a thrill about making a discovery and especially when one comes upon a treasure in one's backyard. It was just that way with Mount Pleasant, on the Schuylkill, the evening of our first visit.

Mount Pleasant was the old residence of Benedict Arnold, the home to which he brought that fascinating Quaker lass, Peggy Shippen. The Arnold Mansion has a romantic enchantment due partly to the charm of Georgian architecture and partly to its owner's later misdemeanors. When the old lady, guide and philosopher, employed by the city as custodian, suggested that we inspect the underground passage, we immediately concluded that it was built by Arnold as a way of egress in case the Colonials should surprise him at his schemes. As a matter of fact the whispered invitation of the custodian led us quite astray, inasmuch as historical fact explains that both house and secret passage were built by Captain John Macpherson before the Revolutionary War. History does not rob the mansion of interest; on the contrary, John Adams in his Diary mentions a dinner at the Macpherson mansion, speaking with enthusiasm of the beauty of the house and the richness of the entertainment. The beauty of the house still maintains, although the entertainment is left to the imagination and the exaggerations of the nimble-tongued old lady; all of which flourish on warm summer evenings.

There exists a deplorable habit amongst Americans who visit Europe, of depreciating the scenes and show places of their own country, a most unfortunate practice. I do not champion an attitude of braggadocio which insists on "seeing America first," just because it is America, but I do plead for that appreciation that will lead one up the valley of the Delaware. Few foreign parts share the enchantment of the river road. New Hope is a good starting-point. The vehicle is of little consequence, automobile, horse-back, runaway or "shank's mare." The important thing is to follow the sinuous trail of the canal by road or tow-path, gazing at the canal with its pictures of reflected foliage or through vistas across the river to the hills of the Delaware valley. One does not have to pace the banks of the Loire, Severn, Moselle or Fal to see nature and man happily coupled together.

The Artists' Colony is always interesting, especially if one is not an artist. A canal bridge and a canal lock, I believe, were specifically constructed to attract all humans. What there is about water flowing in to a compartment while a boat squealing for room reluctantly lifts to a higher level, I am unable to explain—but canal locks always have an audience. If you loiter at every lock on your journey up the river—and you probably will—it will take a full day to reach the hospitality of the Williams's at Nockamixon. The farm and its orchards and the village are a climax to the spell of the Delaware. To me the trip was a real discovery of the Old World at home.

INTERNATIONALISM IN PRACTICE.

The meeting at Fifteenth and Race Streets Meeting-house on Fifth Month 18th, under the auspices of the Peace Committees of both Philadelphia Yearly Meetings, was a most interesting and inspiring occasion. The three European women brought constructive messages full of hope for the future.

It was very heartening to have confirmed by Mlle. Pottecher-Arnould the idea we have long had that Poincaré and the present reactionary Parliament are not without opposition in France. She pointed out to us our mutual ignorance of each other, the difficulties in the way of getting acquainted, the prevailing prejudices strengthened by the false teachings of patriotism, "like a fanatical religion." One of the chief difficulties is that we regard a nation as an abstraction. But when, as after the war, with regard to Germany and even more recently with regard to Russia, the French learned of the suffering women and children in those countries they forgot their own sufferings and realized that the Germans and Russians were also human beings, that all countries form one human brotherhood. Now, too, there is a growing realization in France that a treaty based on narrow nationalism acts as a boomerang—that unemployment in France may be traced to German reparation payments.

Frl. Baer, after thanking the Friends for their work in Germany in the name of the children and mothers and of the pacifists of that country, gave us a short account of the German Youth Movements. They began about 1900 as a protest against the growing materialism and autocracy in family, school and state which followed the peace of 1871, and were very similar in many respects to the first Quakers. Their chief aim was for simplicity. They got as much as possible out of the cities and established communities in the country where they raised their own food. This is a very good preparation for later work in the cities. For pacifism must come from within as an expression of a new attitude of life. Since the revolution in 1918 the young people have been able to do much more. One of the most interesting lines of work is in connection with the schools. Germany's school system was and still is a class system, that is, the common school education is quite different from that in the pay schools which the middle and upper class children attend. A number of young teachers have started new elementary schools for working-class children with the thought of giving them as good an education as the upper classes. But also they are endeavoring to put a new spirit of mutual help and understanding in the schools for they feel that just so much as this spirit is lacking in school, by so much will it be lacking in the business and political life of the boys and girls after they leave school. Hamburg, Berlin, Bremen and several other cities are supporting such schools but do not interfere in the least with their management.

Another branch of the youth movement is pledged to do nothing to further another war, and to oppose the reintroduction of compulsory military training. The Welt Jugend Liga is trying to arrange for an exchange of books and literature with other countries in an endeavor to get to know one another. They wish to be of the most service possible and feel they cannot go out and kill the youth of other lands with similar aspirations. Above all nations is humanity.

Annot Robinson of Manchester asked why it was that pacifist organizations, including the Society of Friends, were so ineffectual in 1914 and 1917 and were practically unheard in the tide of militarism. They were unable to do anything but relief work or help C. O.'s or occasionally raise a feeble protest against some of the more obvious brutalities of war.

She found the answer to her question in clashing realities.

On the one hand is the internationalism of finance, trade, industry, literature, ideas, communication. On the other hand is the inflamed feeling of nationality with its passport regulations, tariffs, differing customs, etc. The result is unemployment in one country, over-employment in another and distress in all. We must realize that the unit of the nation is the family, and that war or a peace of revenge means misery and a lower standard of living for the women, children and workers of another country.

Our problem is to reconcile nationalism and these international realities. To do this we must think, and think now. It is not enough to do relief work or to hope or to try to forget the war. In England there are a number who are thinking, among them Bertrand Russell, G. Lowes Dickinson and H. N. Brailsford. There were also a number of poets who wrote the awful truth about war, mostly, unfortunately, its victims. The workers of England are getting a bit of compulsory education. The miners are realizing that the dumping of reparations coal in France is the chief reason for their unemployment. The cotton spinners and weavers are learning that the condition of Germany, Austria, Russia and China is responsible for the idle cotton mills. They have no bitterness against their enemies and in 1920 by serving notice on the government that they would not aid in a war with Russia they prevented one. This has been one result in action of their thinking.

How may we put the results of our thinking into actions? Annot Robinson's solution is to go into politics. It may be a mean business, but until some other way is found we must go into politics to bring pressure to bear on the government. At the present time relations between communities are supposed to be without the moral law. This will continue to be the case until people of good-will will go into politics and bring another spirit into international relations.

AN IDYL OF CONFORMITY!

One of the most difficult matters to explain to Europeans is our American pastime of lynching, particularly the lynching of social heretics, as I. W. W. members Non-partisan League organizers. It somehow just doesn't seem natural to them to tar and feather those who disagree with one's political or economic views.

One of the best books giving the background for this is "Main Street." Telling the story of the treatment of a city girl with a desire to reform anything and everything, by the respectable people of her husband's home town, it portrays vividly and with a sometimes wearying detail the narrow, untrained type of mind, which is unable to combat new ideas except by destroying the one who expounds them.

The group described were not an unintelligent lot. In some subjects they were quite well informed. But except for a very few they had never done any independent thinking. They had never thought just why they did or thought as they did. But this lack of creative effort was not confined to their thinking. In their business they created nothing.† They were all middlemen, who were engaged in transferring food, already grown, to the cities, and clothing and machinery, already made, to the country. Important work, but not creative. Even their pleasures were those of possession and not those of creation. Only with great effort could they be brought to do anything new even in play. The topics of their conversation were the things they possessed, not the things they did.

Yet withal they were quick to see anything detrimental to the established order of things as is indicated by their treatment of Miles Bjornstorm, the only real reformer in the town. Typical also is the fact that Dr. Kennicott, who was on the whole very liberal with regard to his wife, declared as the unpardonable sin her lack of sympathy with certain patriotic citizens of a nearby town who, with full knowledge on the part of the protectors of law and order, tarred and feathered and rode on a rail a Non-partisan League organizer. His work threatened their pocketbooks.

Typical of many reformers, also, is the heroine Carol. She sees only the surface indications and wishes to better them. But she does not seek through to the roots of the trouble. She is not thorough.

In reading this book one is apt to miss its meaning by seeing only the details, to feel that "my town is not like that," or "the people I know do not talk and act like that." But if one looks behind the actual words and actions to the spirit which they reveal, one will discover an all too true picture of one's own surroundings, even though they be in the large eastern cities.

MINISTRY.

[This is a contribution from an older Friend who is very much interested in Young Friends.—Eds.]

I have been noticing the attitude of some of the Younger Friends on the Ministry and desire that we may be given a clear vision and understanding of this important office.

We are desirous of being the powerful preachers of earlier days. To shake the country for miles around in a spiritual sense. We think that we all should have part in the delivered message; and cannot see why one is to prophesy and another is not to prophesy. The fact that one seems to find no message to deliver, causes him to query: "What is the matter with me?" Do we forget that Paul speaking of gifts, says: "And He gave some apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists, and some pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ?"

We have as we sit in silent worship some text or thought come into mind, and with it some enlargement of understanding. We at once grasp the thought that it is a message to deliver and hasten to give it forth. Now this may seem proper and have its place and yet not be a real call to the Ministry.

Again I quote Paul, because as one not having been with the Lord Jesus, his call seems the more like ours; if we have one. He says, "Though I preach the Gospel, I have nothing to glory of; for necessity is laid upon me; yea woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel." We might take it that he meant if he preached something else than the Gospel, but he says, "If I do this thing willingly, I have a reward," showing that it was something he felt he must do rather than that he must be sure that it was the Gospel. He had a conviction that he could not get away from, and I believe it is so with the real anointed ministry of to-day. We will as surely know when we have the Divine appointment as the apostle of old.

Christ Jesus called twelve men to be His apostles; but He evidently did not expect even these to preach then; they were simply to follow Him; and it was not until he had walked with Him until the end that He commissioned them to preach the Gospel. That had not hindered them from showing whose side they were on. Peter could not hide the fact that he was "one of them," although at that time it does not appear that he had preached the Gospel by word of mouth. But he had followed the Lord Jesus Christ.

And so to-day, we have the call "follow me." We are to be ready for anything. He may never intend us to become preachers of His spoken message. He may have quiet little duties for us that mean just as much to Him as to become great preachers. Because He knows we would not all bear becoming powerful ministers. We would not all of us keep humble enough in this capacity. And so if He gives us a message at all it may be a very simple one; not one that will be recognized by man as a gift in the ministry at all. But it will give us His peace, and we should be satisfied, even though our soul longs to know whether any have been brought to Christ through our small instrumentality or not. But this is not so much our business as to know His Voice, and when He commissions us, to go forth in His Power and then only; and we will jealously watch that each inspiration be just as fresh and forceful as at the first. In this way only will the true ministry grow.

*"Main Street." Sinclair Lewis. Harcourt, Brace & Co., New York.

†They did create values, but they were devoid of any intellectual freshness. Like blind oxen they followed the paths of dull routine which they learned upon taking up their occupations.—H. E. Y., Jr.

The fact that we have at one time felt sure of the call, is not sufficient reason for determining that we will preach at stated times, or at some time during a particular meeting or that we always expect to preach. The real Friend minister will wait for the Divine impulse which he knows and understands, for if he gets in the habit of preaching without this, he becomes no longer a Divinely anointed minister, but simply a preacher of good thoughts, as any one may do who has a gift of language, but it will lack the power and unction of Life.

Now there are many ways of ministering to the world's needs without even a gift of language. And there are many kindly messages given forth both in and out of meetings for worship which do not at all indicate that that person is called with a prophetic gift.

"Are all apostles? Are all prophets? Are all teachers? Are all workers of miracles?" The apostle had previously declared in the same chapter (xii of I Cor.): "There are diversities of gifts but the same spirit," and again, "To one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom, . . . to another faith by the same Spirit . . . to another prophecy, to another discerning of spirits, . . . etc. But through all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will."

Then it seems to me there need to be no jealousy in the Church as there should be no schism in the natural body, because of its various members according to its needs. But let each member of the Church militant be alive to its own particular functioning and all will work together for its good.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The following letter from a German teacher seemed so very much worth while that I thought it would be of interest to others. The clipping he refers to was taken from The Friend (London) on "Education in Germany." It emphasized the newer policies among the educators, and stressed the revision of text-books as an important step.

My correspondence with Leo Mader dates from a year ago in connection with a class in German at Barnesville, our respective students exchanging letters.

AN APPRECIATION.

In the early 'sixties and for a number of years after, the village of West Branch, Iowa, was an ideal Friendly community. Love and unity prevailed, helpful acts of neighborliness and good-will were the rule. Here lived Joel and Hannah Bean whose gentle, Christian, unobtrusive yet pervasive influence was felt by all. They were the able teachers of the village school, loved and honored by parents and children. They were gifted ministers of the Gospel. Their ready sympathy, quick understanding and wise judgment drew people to them.

Fifth Month 4, 1922.

DEAR RUTH LIPPINCOTT:—

Your kind favor of the twenty-first of Second Month reached me just when I was on the way to the station for starting for Berlin, where I had an appointment with some Friends from England. I read your letter with great interest and was glad to hear that you and your husband are getting on well. I thank you also for enclosed article from The Friend which, from a German point of view, proved highly interesting. Yes, I think it covers the ground fairly. The revising of your text books, I think, is a good thing, I warmly sympathize with, hoping it will contribute a good deal toward bringing mankind to a better understanding of the good-will which I am sure is found everywhere, if we only take the pains to look for it. For there is that of God in all of us.

I hope the frost has been kind to you. It has not been so with us, for it is snowing and rather cold even to-day, when, in other years, all was blossoming and real spring. Well, this does not matter so much for us or for our school, the pupils being at home for we have no lessons till the nineteenth of this month. They call it Easter holidays, though I don't think we should call it thus, every day being a Holy Day before God.

I have managed now to get one term, at least, in history. Our "Director" who shares my international feelings to a great extent has gladly consented to my giving lessons in history, for it may be hoped to influence by those means our young people and to counterweight the national influence which they meet with when at home. I have met Dr. Elizabeth Rotten, one of our keenest internationalists, in Berlin, and we are working all together, with other Friends and with the German Union called "Friends of the Quakers." I have started also a collection for the Russian Famine Fund and hope it will prove of some help.

Some weeks ago, after a meeting for worship, I met an American Friend, Francis Bacon, who is living in Berlin with his wife and children, and who told me that you are his second cousin. Is this not strange, America being such a big country?

I think you will not be surprised to hear that I am now a member of the Society of Friends. I felt one with you since a long time and it was only a formality to the Roman Catholic "Church" that I broke the last chains which held me back. This step has been necessary, so that there is harmony in life. And yet I feel a growing spiritual strength and I am very happy. I met some people in Berlin who are not only strongly interested in Quakerism, but who will, as I hope, join our Society before long. There is, of course, no making proselytes by us, but the fundamental ideas themselves are working in our Lord's Spirit. I am now getting The Friend (London) regularly from England, and find it very helpful and interesting.

Yours very sincerely,

LEO MADER.

END OF THE YOUNG FRIENDS' NUMBER.

Their counsel was sought in times of difficulty and trial. Their hospitable home where the Christian graces were practiced and where the things of the spirit and of the mind took precedence, was a Mecca of weary, troubled souls and of seekers for intellectual help and guidance. In short, Joel and Hannah Bean were true leaders whose influence and power in the community never insidiously transformed them into dictators. Their wide vision, humble and constant dependence upon the Source of wisdom, and their loving interest in friend and stranger prevented such a disaster, so often the result of personal power.

Into such a favored community and such a home Lydia Shipley Cox was born. She was, from the first, a child of promise and its fulfillment came in full measure as the years passed. She was sent to the Moses Brown School (then called Providence Boarding School), and later to Penn College, Iowa. As a student in these two institutions, she won distinction, scholastic and social. After graduation, she taught with marked success and later married Charles E. Cox.

Joel and Hannah S. Bean, with a younger daughter, Catharine (now Catharine E. B. Cox, of Honolulu, Hawaii), moved to California and settled in San José. After teaching in Le Grand, Iowa, Charles and Lydia Cox also chose San José for their home. A meeting for worship was started. Here, under the tactful and loving guidance of the Bean and Cox families, Friends of varied points of view worshipped to the honor of Truth. The necessity of some organization was felt, and the "College Park Association of Friends" was formed. This Association has no official connection with any other meeting. The annual meeting is the event of the year, when Friends and persons with Friendly interests gather for the consideration of subjects which specially concern the group and also of the larger subjects which deal with Christian living. The influence of this Association has been wide and deep. Upon the death of her parents, a large share of the responsibility and labor of the meetings fell upon Lydia Cox. Ably and faithfully was this work done when health permitted.

For a number of years Lydia Cox exercised very helpfully a gift in the ministry. Her deep religious experience, wide outlook, scholastic attainments and sober sense of responsibility which such a gift confers, contributed to make her messages fresh, lively and fitting. While Lydia Cox was a loyal Friend, her deep interest in the growth of the Kingdom of God on earth led her to take part in movements by other denominations which had this end sincerely and distinctly in view.

The home of Charles and Lydia Cox was a center of attraction where the young found understanding and sympathy and the old received needed encouragement and stimulus. Lydia Cox's discriminating literary taste made her a valued critic, and her exceptional conversational ability attracted and edified any group which was favored by her presence. The two daughters of Charles E. and Lydia S. Cox, Anna Cox Brinton and Katharine Cox, worthily uphold the noble traditions of the family so well proclaimed by Whittier in his poem, "To the Memory of Thomas Shipley," their great-grandfather. They both were engaged in relief work in Germany under the American Friends' Service Committee and are now successful teachers in California.

Our dear Friend will be missed by a large and varied circle. For such a life of wide and beneficent service, reverent thankfulness is due to Him who made her what she was and loaned her to earth for a while.

"And though the ways of Zion mourn
When her strong ones are called away,
Who like thyself have calmly borne
The heat and burden of the day,
Yet He who slumbereth not nor sleepeth
His ancient watch around us keepeth;
Still, sent from His creating hand,
New witnesses for Truth shall stand,—
New instruments to sound abroad
The Gospel of a risen Lord."

"WHAT are the chief causes of unrest? If you know yourself, you will answer Pride, Selfishness, Ambition. As you look back upon the past years of your life, is it not true that its unhappiness has chiefly come from the succession of personal mortifications and almost trivial disappointments which the intercourse of life has brought you?"

"Wounded vanity, then, disappointed hopes, unsatisfied selfishness—these are the old, vulgar, universal sources of man's unrest. Now it is obvious why Christ pointed out as the two chief objects for attainment the exact opposites of these. To meekness and lowliness these things simply do not exist. They cause unrest by making it impossible. The ceaseless chagrin of a self-centred life can be removed at once by learning meekness and lowliness of heart."—HENRY DRUMMOND.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

TURNERS OF THE OTHER CHEEK.

When you have entered the long stone houses set in lines, spotlessly clean, and seeming always to have been freshly painted, there are the great wooden chests and square cupboards, and the feather-beds piled on feather-beds of which you have read so often. I was in their homes during a summer of record-breaking heat, but always there was the cool that comes into country homes where some one rises before the dawn, and throws the house wide open for the early morning air; then draws the shades to shut out the glare and dust of the day. Of course there are shade trees near the houses. There are whole groves of trees, and in South Dakota when there are trees some one has planted them; patches of wood across the river where the children go to play, always under the careful direction of one who has been delegated to this task; orchards of many kinds of fruit trees. It was with an air of wisdom that the little band of girls who piloted me to the orchard, smacking their lips the while, called off the names of the fruits the colony could boast, and told, too, just how many geese and ducks and sheep and cows there were. I watched them eat with the rarest of juvenile jugglery their one sweetmeat, the Russian peanuts, which, being interpreted, means sunflower seeds; these are fed into one corner of the mouth, while the husks fly out at the other, and the oily kernel stays inside.

Among the Huterisch social life is still in the stage where it centers around the home and the church. Among a people who spend money sparingly the home is not the thing that is stinted. The most modern conveniences are there for the women, just as the best machinery is in use by the men in their work. There is no cooking and no kitchen work done in the house. There is one building for all the laundry work, one for all the baking, one for the milk, one where the little children eat, and one for the men and women. Work is assigned to groups in turn, and in the way it is arranged it seems less arduous than any work I have ever seen fall to the lot of farmers' wives. For hours in the day the women and girls sit out in the yard under the trees spinning and talking, or spinning quietly while one reads aloud to the others.

The Huterisch people draw a careful line of distinction between their kind of communism and that advocated by many socialist thinkers of to-day. One said to me:

"The socialist plans of communism can never succeed because they are not based on religion."

I cannot do justice to the richness of the spirit of Christian love and forgiveness which characterizes all of their speech. When I spoke of one of their boys who died because he would not don uniform or carry out military orders in the late war, one of them answered:

"Yes, but for the most of our boys it was so different. The officers were not often like that one. And there were so many to help us. The Quakers in camp helped our boys greatly. They knelt down with them and prayed and helped them to keep their strength up so that they would stand for their principles."

Not only is it that they must not kill; they must not resent evil in any way, nor feel hatred. One of the most astonishing conversations in which I ever shared was with one of the men who served a term at Leavenworth for his stand on war. He did not speak a word of resentment or criticism. He remembered the people there. The Jews—such wonderful students. How any one could learn books as fast as they did was a marvel! The I. W. W.'s—there was unadulterated idealism! "But," some one interrupted, "the I. W. W.'s are very wicked people." "Not those in our prison," he said. "Probably there are very wicked people among them, but these were people who had the highest Christian ideals." They have never retaliated. And their faces wore the heritage of four centuries in their rare kindness of expression—a sweetness mingled with tremendous strength.

(To be concluded.)

the sickness of Arthur Watts, outlined the program of feeding for the English Section beginning with Fifth Month 16th. Of the 200,000 adult population in the west Buzuluk territory the English will feed 180,000 (a much more balanced ration than the A. R. A. corn including flour and beans and herring and soup); and of the 160,000 child population, the English will be feeding, if their Fifth Month plans are carried out, some 112,000.

While the conference was in progress on First-day, Parry Paul arrived from Samara, where he had been buying oil and gasoline for the three Fordson tractors that will soon be turning up the black soil near Sorochinskaya. He came in the "teplushka," and brought Rebecca and Harry Timbres with him. They were on their way from Moscow, and stepped into the Quaker coach at Kenel. Parry came to the Friends' house, leaving the bride and groom in the wagon. The train, so the station-master had hinted, would not leave for Sorochinskaya before evening. But when we went down in the late afternoon to put the Morrises, Dr. Elliott and the other workers aboard it, we searched the yards in vain. The "teplushka" had never been pulled off to Sorochinskaya, and Harry Timbres had neither the inclination nor the Russian to stop it. Now, a "teplushka" is a relatively comfortable box-car made over for something like decent passenger traffic. But the American delegates missed this touch of comfort. They swept out an empty box-car from which heavy wooden logs had just been lifted. They climbed in and waited far into the night before an engine came and pulled a freight train down the line to Sorochinskaya.

CORRESPONDENCE.

BOSTON, MASS., Fourth Month 17, 1922.

DEAR FRIEND:—

I have read with interest the account of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting as it appeared in THE FRIEND. It seemed to me as I read it that I wanted to commend whosoever wrote it, for one particular statement which to me is quite worthy of approval. To make such a statement in these times savors of the heroic and is in the nature of a protest based on real conviction.

I refer to the statement on page 470 reporting Fifth-day afternoon's session, regarding "business methods" and "efficiency." I fully endorse the sentiment expressed and implied. As a modern Friend and a pastor I do not want to see us get away from the right and time-honored and proven way of conducting business meetings. Parliamentary order may be all right for the Congress of the United States, but not always so for all Friends' Meetings, though there may be exceptions, such as the sessions of the Five Years' Meeting.

I do not wish to be interpreted as thinking we should be slipshod or haphazard in our meetings and care not for orderly things and business-like methods backed by good sense. However, to follow the injunction of doing things "decently and in order" does not necessarily mean that numbers count more than weighty judgment and that the only way to vote is by show of hands.

The Holy Spirit, in former days, was equal to the task of leading Friends in business meetings as well as in meetings for worship, and it is quite unthinkable that the unchanging One should have become impotent in these "latter days." This leadership is needed as much as ever, and perhaps more than ever, in all our lines of work, and our griefs, sorrows and disputes come from lack of it.

Two of the bitterest experiences of my life as a minister have come as a result of contact with those who stepped aside from the ways of Divine Guidance and well-poised consideration of balanced methods. "Efficiency" is a fine thing and a thing we all admire when we view it in operation at the height of its simple and humble glory without sound of axe or hammer. But professional efficiency operating purely by appointment to demonstrate its own skilful armour is quite the opposite from a thing of beauty and a joy forever.

Attempts at such organized short-sightedness are apt to be soon shelved by discerning Friends, but not always in time to save disaster following in their wake.

"Steam roller" methods are not needed in the various activities of Friends. And when attempted, as in a Bible School or Conference, are apt to run on the rocks, for these things are considerably more than "business institutions."

Moderation in all things is yet good counsel for all, and the hope of Quakerism and of Christianity does not lie in the extremes.

Thy Friend,

J. EDGAR WILLIAMS.

[Had our friend J. E. W. been present at the session under review, he would, first of all, have been most impressed by the orderly and deliberate consideration given to the matter under review; secondly, he would have commended the deference shown for the judgment of those whose ripe experience had gained for them a leadership, which they themselves would be the very last to assume; and, thirdly, he would have commended our method, whereby a real difference of judgment can be comfortably harmonized without a vote or a show of hands, and the Clerk enabled to draft a minute to the reasonable satisfaction of all.—Eds.]

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

BURLINGTON AND BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING.—Burlington and Bucks Quarterly Meeting, falling on a legal holiday (Fifth Month 30th), probably brought a fuller attendance of its own members than would have been possible otherwise; and the attendance of a goodly number of the Yearly Meeting's visiting committee and others gave an added interest to what some of us, members, feel is usually an interesting and profitable occasion.

The solemn silence broken by prayer—"We bow before thee, asking for Thy bread of life"—seemed a fitting opening for the impressive sermons that followed. "What think ye of Christ; what think ye of Christ," was beautifully followed up by the statement that much of Christ's life was spent in prayer. The comments on the influence of Socrates suggested that which some of us have long felt a willingness to believe; that he was a factor in preparing the way of Christ.

"Reach hither thy finger and feel my side," was beautifully enlarged upon, showing how He desires His revelation to be a spiritual one. This was followed by a plea for the children that we do not fail them in the demonstration of the power of the spirit over the material.

The heart-searching query, "Is thy God able to deliver thee?" was followed by a loving plea that we watch for the tares among the grain.

A sweet prayer was offered for children—all children as Thine own.

"Is thy work done," was feelingly enlarged upon. A plea was made for an exemplary walk before our children, with the reminder that God gives grace to the humble, and by the grace of God I am what I am.

A petition for that humility in which our prayers may be answered seemed a comfortable close to the meeting for worship.

The business seemed to be carried through with much unity, and as a body we felt grateful for the real interest and help of the visitors present.

An interesting Conference is planned for the closing days of this month and the first of next at Woolman School. For a full program please address Woolman School, Swarthmore, Pa., or Mary J. Moon, Friends' Institute, No. 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia.

The Conference opens Sixth-day, Sixth Month 30th, at eight P. M. Among the speakers are Wm. B. Forbush, Julia W. Williams, Paul Jones, Leslie Pinckney Hill, Dr. Wm. W. Cadbury, E. Morris Fergusson and others.

Henry T. Hodgkin, of England, expects to attend the week-end meetings from Sixth Month 30th to Seventh Month 2nd.

On Sixth Month 26th he is planning to attend the sessions of the Fellowship of Reconciliation at Haverford. In addition to the above there will be week-end Conferences at Woolman School throughout the Seventh Month. These are so planned that business men with engagements during the week in Philadelphia can comfortably attend.

THE "brick meeting-house," at Maiden Creek, was well filled on First-day afternoon, Sixth Month 4th, when the meeting appointed by the Visitation Committee of Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting assembled.

The beautiful weather, which, we were told, has characterized the days set apart for these gatherings, made the peaceful country-side look its loveliest;—all fresh and green from the rains of the preceding days.

Four members of the Quarterly Meeting's Committee were present and two of the Yearly Meeting's Visitation Committee. Friends' views, especially as regards worship, were clearly set forth early in the meeting, and earnest prayer and words of exhortation followed.

Though few present were Friends, and there were a number of children, there was reverent silence; and one felt that such a gathering of neighbors in a place where Friends had once been numerous must be a testimony not only to those who remain to keep "the candle upon the candlestick," but to the influence of faithful lives, long since ended here on earth.

EDWARD C. WOOD, of Germantown, accompanied by his nephew, Horatio Curtis Wood, Jr., are about leaving home for a trip around the world. E. C. W. has for many years been identified with "Christian Association" interests at the University of Pennsylvania, his special field of work being with resident foreign students.

The Monthly Meeting at Germantown has given these two Friends a sojourning minute or letter of introduction.

WHY?

On a recent trip (1922) from San Francisco to Hongkong the relations existing on the ship between the Orientals and Occidentals in the first cabin were of peculiar interest. As to numbers they were about equally divided.

The Americans, Japanese and men and women of other races day by day joined in the deck sports. Sometimes the nationals of three or more different countries or continents would engage in the same game. There were no exterior indications of bickerings, prejudices or suspicions. Everything was enjoyed in the most sincere fashion and in the finest spirit. Honors and applause were liberally granted to the victors without reference to their native habits or tongues. More than one American confided to me that "the Japanese were good sports."

Men and women with skins of various shades walked the decks together whilst exhibiting mutual politeness and regard. There did not appear any reason for their doing anything else. They unfeignedly appreciated each other's friendly conversation and banter.

In the dining saloon the peoples of Asiatic and European stocks were generally placed at different tables by the chief steward, but there were a few exceptions. These exceptions bothered nobody. The Filipinos and those from the mainland of Asia were just as polite and agreeable as some of their neighbors of European lineage. It would be difficult to determine where the greatest courtesy prevailed. I confess that in some instances the Americans could learn table manners from their Far Eastern associates. Chinese "boys," garbed in white "nighties" to their heels, waited on us and no one objected to their uniforms or to the very close personal contact involved in their quiet and efficient service.

Two beautiful Sabbath mornings, between San Francisco and Yokohama, some of the ship's company gathered in the mess room for Divine worship. Protestant and Roman Catholic, Confucian and Agnostic reverently sat side by side whilst they exalted the one Deity, the Creator of sea and land and of all men. There were no disagreeable denominational controversies among folks who already were settled in their religious beliefs and practices. All apparently with genuine sympathy and interest regarded each other's faith and viewpoint.

Now, what I want to know is this: If men and women of very distinctly different races, creeds and mental processes can agree to get along pleasantly together when forced to do so by the exigencies of travel, and can generously waive the expression of national or racial predilections and prejudices—to their own comfort and satisfaction—why can we not also agree to respect one another en masse, and speak decently of each other when separated by lofty mountains or stormy seas? While the truth should ever be recognized, why do we so frequently prefer to be weakly misled into erroneous judgments and fears regarding each other by a relatively few politicians, newspaper editors and others? Why do we not indulge in the ordinary common sense and grace of reciprocal forbearance and remember that we are all the dependent children of the One Father and as such should live together in mutual confidence and peace? Why?

IN THE GOLDEN GLORY.

As I looked out of my cabin window early one morning (1922) when approaching Honolulu, I caught sight of a little boat floating easily in the arms of the sunny sea. The splendor of the tropical sun had transformed the beautiful waters into an ocean of gold. Who were the men in the tiny craft? I can not tell. Probably they were fishing folk who had toiled all night and who had caught almost nothing. Possibly they were humble workers who from their situation could not behold or imagine the golden glory that surrounded them.

Then I thought of how strangely like human life was their occupation and their surroundings. How many of us strive—and in God's ordering rightly strive—for the material things that must inevitably perish. How, whilst so engaged, we often fail to detect the beauty and the charm of life that is all about us. We do not understand the wonderful protection that God day by day affords us. We do not comprehend the riches of his forgiveness and grace. As the mist-crowned mountains of Oahu break the force of the strong trade-winds that sweep over the heaving bosom of the great Pacific and make a tranquil sea wherein the Hawaiian can float his little vessel, so does God often, very often, shelter us. We, too, are protected from the ravages and the perils of veritable oceans of difficulty—from dangers seen and unseen—and like the fishermen I saw that entrancing morning, we are permitted to rest for a season in the golden sea of His quietness and peace.

But the simple lesson of the blue-flecked sea of gold did not close here. I thought of the imperishable future. When the voyage of life shall have almost ended, and the struggle and the weariness will have ceased, there shall remain for God's faithful children the heavenly vision that John wrote of—"the sea of glass mingled with fire." As the little boat I beheld outside of Honolulu harbor that iridescent morning quietly rested on the radiant waters, so will God finally and forever encompass us with perfect safety and encircle us within the golden glory of His love.

NEAR MANILA,
Fifth Month 12, 1922.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

We are now approaching Manila after a remarkably pleasant voyage. The Shinyo Maru called at Tokyo, Kobe, Nagasaki and Shanghai. I was busy in all those cities, and able also to leave messages from church organizations to Christian churches, in conferences, in Nagasaki and Shanghai. I was particularly glad to address a large group of theological students in Kobe. Altogether we feel well satisfied to have come to the Far East by this route—indeed, it is the most direct although somewhat roundabout way to Java. We are due in Hongkong on the 16th inst.

I enclose two little articles that I wrote when nearing Yokohama, and which were duplicated through the kindness of Friends' Mission in Tokyo. The work there goes forward. My residence in California, and relations there with the State Federation as chairman of its department of international justice and goodwill, has given me much information for years on that line and if I get time I want, sometime soon, to write on California-Japanese matters. Most people who write on the subject think they know!

Your Friend,

The foregoing came to our office just too late for our last issue. We are glad to give it place now.—[Eps.]

ESTHER H. FOWLER

In the passing away of our dear Friend, Esther H. Fowler, the Society has lost a valued member, a true mother in Israel, and a devoted faithful follower of her Lord and Master, who was ever concerned to be found doing His will, and faithfully upholding the principles and testimonies of the Society. She was born Sixth Month 27, 1845, daughter of Dr. Isaac and Sara Hustis, of Chesterfield, Ohio. She spent her early life there, indeed it was her home most of the time until her marriage to John S. Fowler, in 1882, after which she and her husband lived at Plymouth, Ohio, from which place they removed to West Chester, Pennsylvania, where they made their home for some years, returning to Ohio in 1897.

She traveled extensively in religious service both in this country and across the water, and though frail in health she has often remarked that strength was given each day for all that was required. She attended her own meeting on First-day the 14th ult., where she was engaged in a lively testimony, the savor of which rested on the hearts of not a few.

As the years went by and the infirmities of age increased they did not lessen her interest or willingness to labor in the Lord's vineyard. Having a minute for religious service within the limits of her own Quarterly Meeting at the time of her death, she remarked to those about her the morning she passed away, she believed the will would be taken for the deed and that her end was near. Thus with her lamp trimmed and her light burning she calmly viewed the approach of death, and quietly breathed her last on Fourth-day, the 17th of Fifth Month, at the home of Joshua Brantingham, where she was kindly cared for during the absence of her niece, Hlanna C. Fowler, with whom she made her home. Her funeral was an impressive occasion, and the feeling was with many who followed to its last resting-place the remains of their dear departed friend.

"She being dead, yet speaketh. Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord. Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

RACHEL E. COPE.

THE NEED FOR THE DENOMINATIONAL SCHOOL. ADDRESS BEFORE THE WESTTOWN ALUMNI ASSOCIATION, FIFTH MONTH 27, 1922.

WILBUR K. THOMAS.

I come to you today as one who is vitally interested in the welfare of the Society of Friends. I have never spent one day in the class-room as a teacher. I have, however, been deeply interested in the development of the Society of Friends from the standpoint of the service which it can render to the world. From this angle I approach the question of the need for the denominational school.

I recognize, also, that I am speaking to a group of people who are not devoting their lives to educational work. I take it, therefore, that your primary interest is two-fold: to see that the children of the Society of Friends receive the right kind of an education, and that they develop the right kind of character. Your problem is not a financial one, for wherever your heart is, there will your treasure be also. The real issue is the desirability of maintaining a denominational school.

There can be no question but that the tendency of the day is away from the denominational control of educational institutions. The Carnegie Foundation for the Pensioning of Teachers is not available for schools whose directors must be members of any one denomination. The development of the country high schools and the great state universities by public taxation, has lessened the need for private educational institutions and has made it all the harder for them to compete in salary and equipment. The tendency to inject theology into the curriculum has also led to much dissension; and one of the great problems confronting public educators today is how to introduce the study of the Bible into the school course. In many places the controversy is even more simple, and hinges around the question whether or not the Bible should even be read in the public school. Those private schools and colleges that are not supported by any one particular denomination, or out of public taxation, have found it necessary to either close their doors or secure large endowments.

All of this has tended to raise a question in the minds of the general public in regard to the denominational school; and today the school under the control of a religious group must justify its existence, or else close its doors.

The tendency has been, on the part of our great educators, to deprecate the institution controlled by a religious denomination. Most of our great college presidents and leaders in educational work have affirmed their belief that the best educational work could be done if such institutions were under the control of a self-perpetuating or publicly appointed governing body. In other words, these men feel that the limitations which are placed upon schools by boards of directors who are of one particular faith, are such as to stifle the best educational work and to make it impossible for the teachers to pursue their calling with absolute freedom.

There is a subtle implication in such reasoning, viz., that non-sectarian schools are, as a rule, better than the sectarian schools. Or, to put it in other words, its proponents hold that the greater freedom allowed in the non-sectarian school works not only for better educational standards, but for better all-round development—that the broadest-minded are the most religious. Dr. Pritchett has stated that: "Men who are religious in the best and deepest sense—the sense which qualifies for educated leadership—are not segregated in conformity with denominational lines. They belong to the church individual and universal." I do not agree with this, but prefer to say that men who are religious in the best and deepest sense—the sense which qualifies for educated leadership—are those who, while recognizing the good in all other groups, hold that they themselves have found something which is more valuable than anything else—the pearl of great price. I differ absolutely with the implications of those educators who argue that the non-sectarian school presents a better field for the right kind of educational effort than any other. It is true that the non-sectarian school may have a better financial background, but it lacks the stimulus that comes from a group of people who are really devoting themselves to a religious or moral issue. Public opinion can be just as arbitrary as any sectarian group ever thought of being. In the final analysis, I believe that it always comes down to a question of leadership, whether within or without the denomination. Williams College in one hundred years sent one hundred and twenty-seven pupils to the foreign mission field. This was due, not to the influence of any one denomination, but to the spirit and traditions of the school itself. In any given instance it may be possible to find a better person outside the denomination than within, to head up an institution. It is first and last a question of leadership and not a question of sectarian or non-sectarian.

I believe I should go farther, and differentiate between the denominational school and the sectarian school. I shall use the word "sectarian" in the more restricted, limited sense as referring to the theological position of any given group, and the word "denomination" as one of the children in the large family of churches. I am convinced that there is no longer a place for the sectarian school among Protestant churches. There is no longer any reason for the Congregationalists maintaining a school to educate Congregationalists, or Baptists Baptists, or Presbyterians Presbyterians. There are now no fundamental differences between these groups. But we have not gotten beyond the time when we need schools that are founded upon the principles of Christianity. The day for isms has gone by; but the day for real Christianity is at hand. If any given church believes that it needs to educate its own children in order to propagate the faith, then it should have a perfect right to do so, providing the education given is at all in harmony with recognized social standards. Friends hold beliefs that are fundamentally different from those of other denominations. We believe that these are an integral part of Christianity and that the other denominations are at fault in not emphasizing them. They represent something more than clothing. They are a part of Christianity. This sounds like bigotry to those who differ from us, but if it is not true why do we maintain our separate identity? There is no justification for a separate existence on any other grounds. Granting all this, however, the question still remains—should a denomination seek to combine religious teaching with secular education? Should not the home and meeting provide all the teaching necessary along these lines and leave the school free to do strictly educational work? If the home or meeting or both met this need there would be no need for separate schools, providing, of course, that such institutions did not undermine the teaching of the home and meeting. We readily admit that the home teaching is not efficient, that it is hard for young people to get much out of the ordinary Friends' meeting. It is at this point, therefore, that I find the reasons for maintaining our own Friends' denominational schools. What is the purpose of education? Naturally, we want our children to learn to read and write, to know something of the world in which they live, to understand what has happened in the historical past, and to partake of the best of the literary and artistic productions of the past and present generations. Most of us desire to have our children go further and study the sciences, theories of existence, questions of social order, etc. But none of us as Christian people want to stop with this. We are interested most of all in character. It is true that we do not desire to sacrifice scholarship for character, but it is even more true that we do not purpose to sacrifice character for scholarship. It is well that our children should be educated to understand the world in which they live; but it is of far greater importance to give them such an education in their younger formative years that they will become not only useful citizens, but the right kind of men and women.

"An education that improves the mind and the memory to the neglect of moral and religious training, is at best but an imperfect and defective system. God has given us a heart to be formed to virtue as well as a head to be enlightened."*

The glory of a Christian nation is not increased by the amount of knowledge which its citizens may encompass, but upon the integrity and the uprightness and unselfishness of its people. For "Though I have all wisdom and all knowledge, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing."

I maintain that, as Friends, to bring about this result we must have our own denominational schools and see that our children are educated in such schools.

As far as education itself is concerned, there is no need for separate schools. Publicly supported institutions are so well equipped that our children can get just as good an education in them as in any school which we may support; but these other and more fundamental things to which I have already alluded, namely: the things which make for character, are not sufficiently emphasized in the public school system of the present day. Again, however, may I repeat what I said above—that it is the personality of the teacher that counts, and great teachers are not confined to any denomination.

In studying the public school system through the eyes of my own children, I find that there are practices that are not only allowed but encouraged, that I consider very detrimental from the standpoint of character development. Reference to these will show that my reasons for the maintenance of our own private schools have to do not with education itself but with atmosphere and outside influences that are being brought into the public schools.

One of the fundamental tenets of our Society is that love and good-will, and not war and hatred, will bring about better world conditions. Such a belief leads not only to a refusal to participate in war, but to the constructive program of doing away with the causes and all thought of war. We believe that there cannot be peace upon earth until there is mutual trust between peoples and nations, and that this spirit should be cultivated. There is reflected in all of our public schools more or less of the current type of national patriotism which fosters the idea of selfish nationalism. It is true that the Friends' private schools are not entirely free of this spirit; as there are teachers in your Yearly Meeting schools who hold to the popular conceptions of patriotism, but it is easier to deal with such teachers in a private than a public school. There are occasions, such as Memorial Day, when the Civil War and World War veterans are brought into the public schools in uniform to tell the children about war. Whether these veterans deprecate war or not they command a sort of hero worship in the childish mind which is not in keeping with Friendly principles. There are other times when the thought of America's greatness, of her unwhipped navy, of the righteousness of her cause, is emphasized in such a way as to glorify our nation to the detriment of others. In the early days of the Great War the children in our public schools were not only encouraged, but urged, to buy War Saving Stamps and help win the war. In the early days of the war one of my children was subjected to humiliation in the following way: The teacher asked all of the children in the room who promised to buy War Saving Stamps to raise their hands. All the rest of the children held up their hands at her request and then the teacher said, "I see every hand up but one. I am very much surprised, for I supposed her hand would have been the first one." "Why will you not promise to buy War Saving Stamps?" She replied that she did not believe in war and she did not believe that her father would like for her to promise to buy the stamps. In telling the incident at home the child said: "I was very glad that Miss ——— did not say anything more." I believe it is wrong to inject such things into the public school system as parents certainly have a right to some consideration in regard to the influences that are being brought to bear upon the child. Friend's children must be expected to do like others do or else suffer criticism. I maintain that it is possible, and in keeping with the best educational standards, to eliminate such things from our Friends' schools and put in place of them a higher type of services and patriotism. It cannot be done except in private schools where the management is backed by its supporters. It takes a group with convictions that cannot be shaken to support such a course, but why should we have convictions if they are not worth perpetuating? Again, however, I must state that individual teachers in the public school may be able to counteract such influences, but I am speaking of the general work of the public school and not of any one given individual.

(To be concluded.)

BOOK REVIEW.

"RELIGION AND PUBLIC LIFE."*

True to the longing of the present moment and to the call of the future, the Swarthmore Lecture this year is on "Religion and Public Life." The lecturer, Carl Heath, was wisely chosen and his message should be widely read.

That the "kingdom of God" symbolized in the teaching of Jesus a combination of social and spiritual responsibilities, including, of course, an application of religion in all public life, is excellently presented in the lecture.

Jesus Christ was a Jew, and Carl Heath briefly sketches what a kingdom meant to that intensely nationalistic people, but whether it be a Kingdom, a Republic or a Community, its Christian members should gladly give of their best and some to their utmost. C. H. says: ". . . No candid student of the New Testament, of the great teachings of Divine fatherhood and of the Kingdom, but must realize that a whole body of religious principle for the moral guidance of human association is both implicit and explicit in the Gospel."

How have these principles been grasped and taught by Christ's ambassadors through the centuries? How has the Church behaved during the past few years when loud calls from every side have thrown humanity into confusion?

Carl Heath tells us and tells us why the Church has failed to give a clear message and to show a vision of a spiritual kingdom.

"The picture we should see in startling line and color . . . is the tragedy the Church has made of heathen Europe and the tragedy heathen Europe has made of the Church."

To this generation then, out of its unrest, distrust and searchings for truth comes a keener sense that "the Church is a means, but not the only means, for the development and growth of the Kingdom," a Kingdom "which will invest the common secular duties of life with sacredness and grandeur, which will bring the mighty sanctions of eternity to bear upon modern industry, and the home and foreign policies of nations." (D. S. Cairns.)

One cannot understand what is, without knowing what has been, and Carl Heath's historical sketches and testimonies from scholars are vastly illuminating. His candid discussion of "compromise" can only be most helpful to all of his readers whose active lives press such considerations continually upon them.

The task and pleasure of a reviewer should be only to whet the appetite, not to satisfy the palate, so one more quotation must suffice to show Carl Heath's understanding of the Society of Friends—he joined from conviction—and also his conclusion of the whole matter.

"The Society of Friends, as I see it, is in essence neither a sect nor an institutional Church. . . . The Quaker community is primarily a free and catholic fellowship of souls. A free, catholic, spiritual community answering to the cry of men in all nations and all lands, implies a vision which is a world vision. . . . Humanity cannot be divided into spiritual categories.

"The functions of that social human life, which are working out God's purpose, are not to be classed as sacred and secular, but all are parts of a life which is expressing God's life, in which all we have and know and see of truth and beauty and goodness and charity and utter sincerity is called for personally, in our individual lives; and corporately in the common life of man, as he builds from age to age the wonderful City of God."

I PRAY for quietness to run
The race appointed me to-day,
Not lingering idly in the sun,
Nor hastening wildly on my way,
Nor looking anxiously to see
What all the coming days may be . . .
I have a promise safe and sure
Of strength sufficient for my need.
. . . . And if I walk with quiet mind,
And keep my restless spirit calm,
Some happiness I'm sure to find.

THE JOURNAL OF GEORGE FOX.

Reader, hast thou ever read the Journal of George Fox? If thou hast not, I beg of thee to procure a copy from thy bookseller. Get it in old folio, if thou hast a liking for old books, or else in the well-edited edition of Rufus M. Jones. Perhaps it is already on thy bookshelf, handed down from former times, but unread these many years.

In its pages I promise thee not only solid reading but a stirring and graphic Autobiography. It is indeed a picture of former times, and, apart from its religious significance, a very readable and interesting volume.

It abounds in many phrases and expressions which carry with them the fundamentals of our faith. The word "openings" occurs frequently, and, as thou knowest, connotes much in silent worship. He often speaks of the "Light," and of "darkness," too. "I saw, also, that there was an ocean of darkness and death; but an infinite ocean of light and love, which flowed over the ocean of darkness. In that, also, I saw the infinite love of God, and I had great openings!" He often tells us that in preaching he addressed himself to "that of God" in his hearers.

All through the Journal we find George Fox living in the Divine Presence. To him God was an intensely real, vital experience. Moreover, he thought everyone who tried could have access, as he had, to the influx of the Holy Spirit.

May I bring to thy remembrance what William Penn said of him, that "He was a man whom God endowed with a clear and wonderful depth, a discernor of others' spirits and very much a master of his own." These words seem to sum up the gifts wherein lay his power and influence. His strong, virile personality—yet loving withal—stands out on every page. He had a commanding presence and a certain personal ascendancy. People spoke of his piercing eyes and the strength and power of his voice.

With homely but expressive similitude, one of his jailors said "He was as stiff as a tree and as pure as a bell." And William Penn, who knew him, perhaps, as well as any of his contemporaries tells us, that "He was of an innocent life, no busybody, nor self-seeker, neither touchy nor critical; what fell from him was very inoffensive, if not very edifying. So meek, contented, modest, easy, steady, tender, it was a pleasure to be in his company." A very engaging portrait that!

Thou wilt be much moved, I promise thee, by the recital of the hardships which George Fox endured in the service of Truth. On one occasion, being without food for several days, he tried to get something to eat from several homes along the roadside, but was refused. To quote his own account, "After I was gone a pretty way, I came to another house, and desired the people to let me have a little meat, drink and lodging for my money, but they denied me. I went to another house and desired the same; but they refused me also. By this time it was grown so dark that I could not see the highway; but I discovered a ditch, and got a little water and refreshed myself. Then I got over the ditch, and being weary of traveling, I sat down among the furze bushes till it was day." Passages such as this do of a surety make us love the man himself, for what he suffered and for what he did, that Truth might prevail. As William Penn said, "Many souls have done virtuously in this day, but, dear George, thou excellest them all!"

RECOLLECTIONS OF YOUTHFUL DAYS, AND SOME RECORDS OF AFTER YEARS.

WRITTEN BY MARMADUKE C. COPE. COMMENCED AT NEWPORT IN THE SUMMER OF 1877 IN MY SEVENTY-FOURTH YEAR.

[It has been several years since THE FRIEND published, in serial, extracts from a Friend's Journal. The last was that of the late Samuel Morris of Olney, Philadelphia.]

With the much of absorbing interest that each week has sought for space in our columns, and possibly from the dearth of instructive and, at the same time, fresh and lively journalistic material, we have not keenly felt the loss.

There has recently come into the Editors' hands a manuscript copy of "Recollections of Youthful Days, etc.," by Marmaduke C. Cope, late of Germantown.

These records were made with no thought of publication beyond a limited circle of relatives and friends, but having come into our hands and having received a careful reading, we find so much of general interest that we have gained the consent of members of the family to give them a wider circulation.

The problems that confronted the past generation were not just the same as those we meet, they were surely not one whit easier of solution.

The glimpse that we shall gain of the daily walk of one who strove to shape his life by the pattern of our Great Exemplar is made attractive by its simplicity and openness; added to this will be the charming glimpses we shall have of the home life of a Friend's family in Philadelphia when ferry-boats and trolley cars were not known here, and when a First-day ramble a little way north of Arch Street brought one into the "real country."

Added to these will be the references to the visits of English Friends to Philadelphia, a practice common many years ago, but of later times grown quite unusual, pleasantly revived, however, of late in the visits of E. Maria Bishop and William Littleboy.—Eos.]

I was born in Philadelphia, the third day of the Seventh Month, 1804. My parents resided then on the east side of North Fourth Street a few doors above Market Street. The house was taken down many years ago, and the site is now occupied by a store. When I was about one year old my parents removed to a house purchased by them on Arch Street, below Eighth Street, where the family resided about sixty years, when the property was sold and a large store built on the site which is now numbered 728.

My mother was Margaret Cooper, a lineal descendant of William Cooper, who about the year 1682 settled at the spot now known as Cooper's Point in the City of Camden. A considerable portion of this property descended through her to me and my sisters. She was the daughter of Marmaduke Cooper who resided in the mansion on the Haddonfield road built by his father, Isaac Cooper, in the year 1728. In my very young days the old mansion with its spacious hall, broad massive staircase and ample-sized rooms, had to me a very stately appearance. Many a time I used to sit in the great kitchen chimney, on one side of which there was a bench, talking with the old family gardener Henry, who came from the old country and prided himself on his horticultural skill. As for the garden there was none grander in my eyes, with its fine beds of tulips, hyacinths, roses and other beauties. In the centre was a magnificent Jersey holly tree, the largest and most symmetrical I have ever seen. On the trunk of this, visitors were invited to cut their names. At the first visit of my father he was asked to cut his initials, and climbing the tree he placed his the highest of all, which in after days we considered remarkable, as the property finally descended to his children. The tree is still standing and is probably considerably more than a century old. The glory of the garden has, however, entirely disappeared under the neglect of unappreciative farmers to whom the premises have for n years been rented. In my boyhood days the great melon patches were an especial charm. I was permitted to roam at will in them, selecting the finest and eating the most luscious part until fully satiated. The peach and apple orchards were laden with the finest fruit in perfection and in such abundance that no limit was placed on their use. The ample cider press was a great institution in those days. It furnished many barrels of the choicest juice, sweet as sugar, which I sipped through a little straw tube as freely as I chose. Camden was then a small straggling village, the ferry houses being the prominent buildings. The forest extended to the river bank, being carefully preserved as the then only source of fuel, so that my father's walks with me as his companion, to the ancestral hall were mostly through shaded wood paths. We crossed the Delaware in boats called wherries, sometimes rowing, sometimes sailing. "Boat Ahoy" was the familiar cry of the ferryman as he stood at the ferry "slip" waiting for passengers. Twelve-and-a-half cents was the price in summer, twenty-five cents in winter. In icy times the ferrymen were equipped with very high water-proof boots, as they were obliged to sit on the bow of the boat with boat-hooks to push aside the cakes of ice, or if they were too large, to get out and pull the boats across the cake and launch it in the water beyond.

I can remember many winters when there was a well-traveled road across the Delaware and vehicles of all descriptions passing over it. But the wherry, and the quiet shady wood path with its rustling leaves, are long since numbered with the dissolving views of the past, the village in 1877 being changed into the populous city with miles of street cars, and capacious steamboats daily conveying thousands to and fro over the broad river.

On our way to the Camden ferries my father and I sometimes stopped at the humble yet peaceful cottage home of that good man and gifted minister of the Gospel, Richard Jordan. It was close by the Newton meeting-house. He always gave us a hospitable welcome. On his little farm, he skillfully cultivated the sugar corn, and so planted it that he had for a long time a succession of the sweet ears for his simple table. He was an adept in making net work for useful purposes, and invented a stitch called the Jordan stitch, worked with one wooden needle. He was also expert in turning boxes and other useful articles which he presented to his friends.

Among the earliest recollections of my boyhood, was being sent in my seventh year to a boarding school in Byberry Township, kept by John Comly, the author of a grammar and a spelling book both extensively used in schools. It was in the summer of 1811 and the total eclipse of the sun, and the appearance of a great comet which occurred that year, produced deep and solemn impressions, vivid after the lapse of sixty-six years. The surrounding school premises being adapted for childish enjoyments I remember my stay as a very pleasant one. I had many lively companions there, and entered with zest into the simple amusements allowed us. The green meadows and the running brooks, the hum of the honey bees, returning to their hives laden with sweets are all remembered now. Soon after attaining my ninth year I was sent to the boarding school at Westtown, where I remained, I think, three sessions. My reminiscences of this period are pleasant. The fine old forests, and the streams and vales, the long mill race and the dam with its pleasant spots for swimming, afforded scope for delightful exercise in many ways, which I fully appreciated. The nutting seasons in the fall were joyous occasions. Many a time I came home laden with the spoils of the walnut trees, improvising such bags as I could, sometimes using summer pants with legs tied at the bottom, much to their damage. As was the custom then, I built a small hut in the boys' woods, on the roof of which I spread the nuts to dry for winter use. My letters home contained frequent requests for nails to construct this, as well as the seats and arbor of a summer garden, which in partnership with one or two of my school-fellows was staked out and kept in order with its beds and walks. I joined actively in games of ball and shinny, prisoner's base, etc., but never excelled in them. Sometimes I strayed beyond bounds, and engaged in little raids on the orchard, etc., but on the whole

I passed muster pretty well. I made use of the school library and especially enjoyed such books as Mavor's Voyages and Travels, Anson's Voyages, etc. Returning home I well remember the grand illumination in Philadelphia on account of the treaty of peace with England. The citizens generally thronged the streets that evening with joyful feelings. To my young eyes it was a most magnificent display, nearly every house being lighted in various devices and colors and brilliant arches were thrown across many of the streets.

After leaving Westtown I went to the Latin School on Fourth Street below Chestnut, then taught by Thomas Dugdale. Here I remember obtaining a prize offered to the class of which I was a member. After this I went to a higher school taught by Dr. Wilson and James P. Espy at the corner of Fifth and Arch Streets, where the Apprentices' Library is now located. Here I made further progress in the Latin, being about thirteen years of age. A course of mathematics at the Friends' School in Fourth Street taught by Joseph Roberts then followed. My teacher being skilled in astronomy, took me with him occasionally to make observations of the stars, etc. Although I was interested in this, I was not a diligent student, and made little progress in science. At home my dear mother was desirous to instruct me in good things, and often had me to sit by her and read the biographies of Friends. This, though sometimes distasteful, was, I have no doubt, helpful in forming a more serious habit of mind of which I reaped the benefit in after life.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

TURNS OF THE OTHER CHEEK.

I attended a vesper service once. It is there more than anywhere else that one realizes how a bit of the old, old days, centuries gone by, has come down to us with these friends. The service so primitively simple, the elders sitting up in front, the short prayer and words of exhortation, an elder lining the hymn, just as I have heard my mother say they used to do in the early days in New England. The Huterisch people use no musical instrument, nor do they sing by parts, but all in a high soprano, making a shrill melody. The elder sang one line, then all the congregation sang it after him; then he sang the second line, and they repeated it, and so on with the others. It is the way their fathers did, and their fathers' fathers, back to the third and fourth, yes, to the eleventh and twelfth generations.

In the extremest degree, in their religion, the Huterisch people are conservative. The goal toward which their eyes turn lies in the distant past. Their fathers set the pattern, and they follow it. To keep the faith of the fathers is their great duty, to sing their songs, to pray as they prayed. This has much to do with their deep love for the language in which their services are held—a feeling parallel to the love many feel for the King James Version, and dislike for new ways of expressing old thoughts.

This extreme conservatism makes the Huterisch people hesitate to send their children to outside schools. They fear that the influence there will tend to break down their allegiance to the old faith. They maintain elementary schools, and in subjects taught there the children are well grounded. Their neighbors constantly speak of their progressiveness in methods of work and their interest in knowing all that pertains to it. Recently we were conducting botany clubs in the country, and often we found herbs which we did not know. The frequent remark under such circumstances was: "If one of the men from the colony comes in today perhaps he can tell us. They know all such things." In the first days of their sect the Huterisch people could claim among their number some of the greatest university teachers on the continent. They are skilful in the use of the common herbs as medicines, still cherishing an art most of us have long since lost.

Undoubtedly, the Huterite is standing at the parting of the ways. The great problem he faces deeply concerns us all. We have been the pioneers in building up a type of highly socialized life, and, having achieved it, we realize now that it has been gained at the cost of two or three of the most precious things life holds. These treasures the Huterite still holds—and the question he faces is: Can we go forward into the new phases of life we are already entering, and yet hold the strong, unbroken influences of the home, still let social prestige honor the man who has toiled the hardest with his own hands, and still shape character by the performance of homely duties?

Too much our policy has been that of trying to inflict everything we have chosen to do on all who come to our land. Better will it be, if realizing that we have failed to hold much that is desirable, we give our heartiest backing to these who are so heroically trying to avoid our failure, and who may yet arrive at a solution better than any we have found.

There is no question in my mind that if a world peace policy of some sort should go into effect, we would recognize the contribution to be made by spirits strengthened by four centuries of persecution and martyrdom for the principles of their faith.

LEBANON HOSPITAL FOR MENTAL DISEASES.

Information is recently at hand of the death in the latter part of Second Month of Dr. Harris Graham, Chairman of the Board of the Beirut Executive Committee of the Lebanon Hospital for Mental Diseases at Asfuriyeh (founded by the late Theophilus Waldmeier in 1897).

Dr. Graham was a valued and efficient member of the Executive Committee for nearly a quarter of a century, and was also connected with the American University at Beirut for thirty-three years as a Professor of Pathology and Practice of Medicine.

He was a Canadian by birth, born in Ottawa, Canada, in 1852, and a graduate of the Toronto University. He took his M. D. from the Michigan University in 1885, after which he was commissioned by the American Board as a missionary to Turkey. In 1892 he took special bacteriological studies in Dr. Koch's laboratory in Berlin and rendered efficient service during the terrible cholera outbreak during that year in Hamburg. Subsequently, on returning to Turkey, he passed through several cholera epidemics in which his experience and skill were of great value.

One of his most notable research works was proving that the common culex mosquitoes are conveyors of dengue or "break-bone" fever as it is sometimes called.

As a linguist, he was able to converse in the principal languages of the polyglot Levant.

On account of his medical skill, he was widely sought in consultation by patients from all parts of the Near East, and his death is a great loss to that part of the world.

The Lebanon Hospital for Mental Diseases is greatly favored in having several such skilled, yet quiet and unobtrusive men on its Executive Committee, and largely on this account is able to carry on the difficult work of ministering in the most efficient and up-to-date methods to the unfortunate mentally afflicted people of Syria and Palestine.

UME TSUDA.

TO THE EDITOR:—

I am enclosing to thee an extract from a letter to Ume Tsuda from one of her former pupils.

The readers of THE FRIEND will remember the keen interest which my husband always felt in the "Girls' English-speaking School" in Tokio, founded by Ume Tsuda in 1900. Many who listened to his lectures and saw his beautiful slides, knew that the small sum which he charged went to her school.

The Bible Association kindly sent and will continue to send Bibles each year to the graduates.

Quite lately the directors of the School have decided to add to the curriculum and raise $400,000 endowment so as to give the School a college standing. It is slow work raising such a large sum of money, but the 317 graduates are devoted workers. This letter shows not only the devotion which they feel to the School, but also the character of the English teaching which they receive and best of all the high ideals which Ume Tsuda instills into her pupils.

If these approvals of giving this letter a place in THE FRIEND, I hope the readers of the paper will be interested in the new outlook of one of Japan's many forward-looking mothers.

Sincerely thy friend,

SARAH W. ELKINTON.

MOYLAN, Pa., Fifth Month 1st.

MY DEAR UME TSUDA:—

I wish you would believe that I have thought of you much more and often than you ever imagine or my neglected writing deserves.

This last spring I had a great mind to come up to Tokio just to see you, if I could, but moving seems so hard when one has a home and especially little children. But I saw R. R. the first time after her being away for a few years, and in my changed life I just poured out my heart to her. She knows so well what my life was while I was at the Juku and under your care and how much it meant to me and means to me in my life now, and she could feel with me the feeling of one, who loves most who owes most.

However the circumstance may appear, if I ever have a sparkle to shine or the power to live the life of a true woman, that little sparkle was kindled by your great light and will surely be brought down to my little baby-girl. I have already two boys—five and three—growing rapidly, but when the girl came I experienced a new kind of joy and different expectations. She is one of your granddaughters and ought to be brought up in the way you would like and expect for a girl who would live in the future Japan, in the third generation from your time.

I feel we are stepping-stones and would be contented to be trodden over if we could send out better ones to the world. I am nothing and the only way to be something in the world is to convey the best things got from my past life to the new lives—and send out true men and women to poor Japan which is in sore need of them.

When the girl came, I just thought of you and perhaps you would be glad to hear of her and remembered your words not to make any difference between a boy and a girl, not to give any handicap or privilege because it is a boy. We named her Aiko "to be loved by God and man."

Ever lovingly yours,
T. N.

"GIVE YOUTH ITS CHANCE."

An article under the above title will be found in a recent issue of The Woman's Home Companion, and is another example of the deepening interest and concern about the social life of the present day.

Its author—Alfred E. Stearns—is Principal of Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass., "which opened its doors two hundred and forty-two years ago," and has ever since numbered among its students boys of the "best families," using the phrase in the right sense. Dr. Stearns says: "As a schoolmaster who has dealt pretty intimately for twenty-seven years with nearly seven thousand boys I think I may claim to know something about boys, and the reactions of boy nature."

"At the best the school can only supplement the work of the home; and the schoolmaster is always dependent on the parent." He asks to present "a few plain facts," and to "try to draw from them conclusions that will help us in our efforts to play fair with youth."

The most interesting feature of Dr. Stearns' argument is his strong feeling that parents and older friends do not "play fair" with youth, that "we have too much ignored the most vital factor involved—the boys and girls themselves." He feels that there is nothing unusual about them; "they are just as normal as those of us who criticize," but that "Never before was youth so sorely beset. Never has youth more sadly needed parental counsel and parental restraint." And he abundantly proves this by incidents gained from his own observation.

But, he concludes, "What is needed is the unvarnished statement of patent truths, a clear exposition of their significance, the 'rod of correction,' if need be, and the ringing challenge to that manly and better self which in all boys lies so close beneath the surface."

"When once the goal has been made clear, and it is seen to be a necessary and a good goal, youth will lead us in the race to attain it. And if in our efforts to accomplish our ends the restraints of discipline are at times required, as they surely were in the days of our youth, for the sake of the manhood and the womanhood of to-morrow, let us not withhold our hand."

"If youth rebels, we may rest assured that what we seem for the moment to lose in the good-will and affection of those we love will be repaid us a hundred-fold a few years hence, in the gratitude and reverence of minds that see and hearts that understand. The love of fair play has ever been a marked characteristic of youth. Youth will play fair with us if and only when we as parents play fair with youth."

[We can do no less than print the following letter in full, though doubtless it has reached many of our readers direct:]—

SIXTH MONTH 7, 1922.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

Cannot you help us do something about the West Virginia situation? If you do not know conditions, read carefully the enclosed bulletin.

After serious consideration, our Committee felt the need so imperative that it took action to relieve the immediate distress, hoping in some measure to reconcile the groups involved. We plan to begin in a small way and enlarge the scope only as we profit by experience. In our best judgment there is no other choice. Children, citizens of the future, are being stunted—dwarfed in body, mind and spirit. We dare not go our way indifferent and self-satisfied. It may be our privilege to hear again to-day, "I was hungry and ye fed me."

This is our opportunity—our responsibility. The Committee cannot go further without funds. We are asking for $3500. Six hundred dollars of this has already been raised. Will you not help to make the proposed relief program possible?

Sincerely,

WILBUR K. THOMAS,
Executive Secretary.

The "enclosed bulletin" alluded to is an earnest appeal for relief. It recites:—

"The best estimate which we were able to obtain as to the total extent of need in the State was made about two months ago. At that time it was estimated that approximately 28,000 families were dependent upon charity, with an average of three children to the family. According to this estimate, the total number of children dependent upon charity was about 75,000. As the period of unemployment has increased, since that time, the extent of the destitution has increased accordingly.

We were surprised to discover that this need is not located to any important degree in Logan and Mingo Counties, which have received so much publicity in the North. The miners in these counties are either non-union, and so have been working, or else have been living in the tent colonies, and receiving aid from the international union organization. Though living under hard conditions, these tent colonies have thus far managed to get along.

"The main need is found in the union areas, where unemployment has prevailed. These areas are located around three principal centers: 1, around Charleston, in upper Kanawha County; 2, around Beckley, in Raleigh and Fayette Counties, and 3, around Grafton.

"The fundamental need is for food. It should be understood that conditions do not in any sense compare with those reported in Russia. There is no famine. Two or three relief agencies, though they are not able to properly feed the destitute population, are at present preventing actual starvation. There is, however, increasing lack of food, and increasing undernourishment. The latter strikes particularly hard upon the children, who, in most cases, have no milk and light cereals, and are forced to live upon beans, corn-meal, flour and occasional bacon, which is all that the present relief agencies can supply. Yet even this coarse food is not being provided in sufficient quantities to meet the need."—Eds.]

THE HOUSE OF TERROR.

Our daily round, even in the heart of the Russian famine area, is often a normal one of office work, warehousing and household business, or it may be a round of visits to children's homes, hospitals and kitchens—all of them distressing enough, but at least doing the best any one could with their slender resources, and keeping most of the kiddies alive until better times come.

But always in the background runs the plaintive minor note of wailing at our doors, or windows, always a mournful voice begging a bit of bread, a pinched face peering in and pleading for life for another day. They walk the streets by day and always a few filter into the office and sometimes even to our living quarters. Always we must turn them away empty and ignore the pleading. We must feed those we can reach every day; not yet have we enough to touch them all, and our lists are full. So we tell ourselves, but I can never convince myself that is the answer Christ would make. As yet we find no other course. We try not to see them and to forget by plunging hard into the mountain of work always at hand.

But what becomes of these poor bits of human driftwood? Some few find their way into the children's homes, but they have supplies for never more than five new ones each day, and the others must pass on and sleep in sheds or empty houses, or drop down and die in the snow. At last by the earnest efforts of the big-hearted and untiring head of the local Soviet a small house was repaired and some fuel secured. Here each day the current washes up a few more derelicts, and they sit in the sun at the door or herd together inside for greater warmth.

For days and weeks I have passed this house, but never entered. I had no business there of any sort, and there is always enough that is harrowing without touching any that is avoidable. That visit could wait until some one wanted to know the worst, and then I could check up on the tales that are told of this House of Terror.

Visits there will be by request only. Our Field Director, who arrived the other day, is very much on the job and wants to see everything. I've not wanted to take the interpreters because they already receive the full brunt of horrors and begging more than we do. However, a new worker came along and wished to see everything before going on to open up her new outpost, so the time had come to see the worst.

It is an attractive enough little one-story house, and the day was a beautiful still sunny one so three nites were basking in the sun on the steps. One could hear the wailing, and, as we pushed open the door of a tiny corridor, it came like the sound of a mournful sea and with it came a horrible smell. The next door, and we faced the two rooms, with only a wide built-in bench as furniture. On this bench and the floor and piled against the walls and stove are bundles of ragged, moaning wretches, about a hundred of them, some dying, others already dead. Every day the one attendant of the place cleans it and pulls out from twenty to thirty dead bodies to cart off to the burial trench. He tries to keep the living from eating the dead, but it is not always possible.

One quick look is all any one can stand, though the Chief was strong enough of stomach to get a picture, before the stench of corpses and filth drove us out, thanking God for out-of-doors.

THIRD MONTH 20, 1922.

BEULAH A. HURLEY.

SPRING CLEANING IN RUSSIA.

The thaw is on! The beautiful snow covers are melting off the house roofs, and from the black soil of the plains, and the redder hills to the north, and off the dirt piles of the streets and from the bodies of the poor wretches who fell and died by the wayside and were buried in snow. Our streets were rivers for a week or two and the River Samara rose up and spread over the country a roaring torrent of muddy water and floating ice. No one could come from the villages for food. For awhile the railroad was broken and even telegraph lines down. Now the waters have subsided and the mud has dried up enough to find on most streets a path that is navigable without boots. The roads will soon be usable.

Looking ahead we dread the days when mud is dried into dust and begins to circulate. There are good chances of all sorts of epidemics from this and from flies, mosquitoes and rats. Some cases of cholera, malaria and bubonic plague are already reported. It is estimated that 9000 bodies lie unburied in sheds, in holes, in all sorts of places throughout our area.

What are we doing about it? Personally we are carrying our left arms with great care because of the vaccine just shot into them and we are mulling over the wise counsel of our newly arrived doctor and feeling profoundly thankful for her presence. As a family we are boiling our drinking water as always and plan to treat all salads, fruit, vegetables and greens the same way. We are preparing screens of mosquito-bar for all windows and doors and await only the tacks to put them in—these must come all the way from Moscow, 1200 miles away. We've already had practice in fly-swatting, as several noble ones have appeared. We've been fairly eaten up with mice, they have even begun on our baskets and clothes and papers for nests, but the doctor fixed them a lunch of phosphorus and cheese and they have gone off in a body to digest it.

As for the village, we have organized a clean-up squad to see if epidemics can be nipped in the bud. This week they begin work, 250 men and 50 horses; the men to be well fed each day at one of the children's kitchens, to give them strength enough to bury the dead, cart away filth and spread lime over what cannot be moved. Every householder is responsible for the cleaning up of his own premises and inspectors are appointed to see that this is done. In each volost, or township, we are feeding twenty people to devote their time and strength to burying the dead.

Spring winds are busy with their cleaning-fans and the rains are expected soon. We stand ready to do our part and the drugs and vaccines and other supplies are coming in from America and England and Germany and Moscow to back us up and hold the lives which the food alone cannot insure through the summer while the new food supply is growing.

FOURTH MONTH, 1922.

POLAND STILL NEEDS OUR HELP.

Wire from Poland received Fifth Month 22, 1922: "Thousands returning refugees without bread crop till harvest 1924 unless we plough and seed. Horses bought. Polish towns helping devastated areas prospect co-operation supplying ryce. Our budget mere minimum."

One million refugees who were ordered into Russia by the retreating Russian army in 1915-16 now remain to be repatriated in Poland. They return to land that is often covered with entanglements and gutted with trenches and concrete dug-outs. In any case no ploughing has been done since they left home.

The Friends in Poland have bought 1000 horses from the Polish Government and are ploughing the land owned by returning peasants. If no ploughing is done this year before Eleventh Month 1, 1922, it will be necessary to wait until 1924 before their crops can be harvested. One thousand horses will plough enough land to start 2,000 families every month with at least four acres of broken ground.

More fortunate Polish towns in Western Poland are adopting devastated areas. They raise funds for seeds, ploughs, spades, hoes, scythes, and sickles. They also provide food and medical supplies.

Friends in Poland calculate that we can supervise the ploughing of twenty thousand acres of land by 500 of the 1000 horses formerly owned by the Polish army. The other 500 horses will be sold at once to poor peasants, preferably widows with children, on long-time credits. The cost for ploughing will be approximately $5.00 per acre. This sum will plough and seed the land, will provide the spade to work it, will give the scythe to harvest the crop. It will also make a well peasant out of an undernourished one.

It is hoped that the American Friends' Service Committee can contribute $45,000 between now and Ninth Month 1, 1922.

SHIPMENTS received during week ending Sixth Month 10, 1922—117 boxes and packages received; 1 German relief; 6 anonymous.

Contributions received during week ending Sixth Month 12, 1922—$18,257.51.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

THE American Friend has made the following quotation from a review of "The Later Periods of Quakerism" by Rufus M. Jones, appearing in The Nation for Fifth Month 24th: "The story of the Friends may justly be regarded as a replica in miniature of the history of Christianity itself. Each began as a mighty impulse of joyous enthusiasm; each was led by the very exigencies of the situation to develop forms of thought, practice and organization which laid bonds upon the free spirit and checked spontaneous expression; each passed through periods during which the great ideals of the founders faded into forgetfulness; and in each we find today a revival of those ideals in the changed conditions of the present with happy promise for the future. Moreover, the Friends have much to teach the religious life of today. Will the Christian ideals of love as the law of life, and the effective power of good to overcome evil, work in the world that now is? Perhaps the story of the Friends does not fully answer the question, for usually they have been protected within a militant nation, but at least their experience throws light upon the problem. And when it comes to forms of worship, one who cannot abide the "short, snappy, sacred" type of religious meeting which flaunts as its ideal "Something doing every minute," thinks wistfully of the living silence (there is vast difference between a living and a dead silence) during which Friends are still and know that God is and that His word still comes to waiting souls.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING appointed five delegates to attend the Conference of sects fundamentally opposed to all war. The delegates are: Wm. Bishop, Francis R. Taylor, Ann Sharpless, Wm. B. Harvey and Mary B. Moon.

The Conference is to be held from Eighth Month 4th to 7th, at Bluffton College, Bluffton, Ohio.

Friends of various groups, as represented on the Service

Committee, the Schwenkfelders, the Mennonites and the Brethren constitute a committee of arrangements.

The objects of the Conference are given in the invitation issued some time ago: 1. To bring together for a season of Conference and Prayer representatives of all who profess discipleship of Jesus Christ and who hold that war has no place among Christians. 2. To discuss ways and means of furthering this Christian principle outside the respective denominations participating in the Conference. It is not expected that any formal, permanent organization will be effected. It is to be a meeting for prayer, for cultivating a spirit of closer fellowship among all of these more or less closely related bodies and for conference.

A LONDON CORRESPONDENT sends us word that A. Ruth Fry and Sir Benjamin Robertson recently addressed 100 members of Parliament in the House and showed them lantern slides depicting Friends' work in Russia. This was one of many things done to help impress upon Parliament the will of the public with regard to help for Russia.

On the fifth of last month Hampton Institute, Virginia, celebrated her fifty-fourth anniversary. As usual the occasion was one of great importance. Chief Justice Taft, president of the Board of Directors, presided. Among other expressions from him, he warned the Hampton students against doing anything that would injure the confidence that the American people have in Hampton's usefulness and power to solve the greatest social and racial question with which this nation has to contend.

Among other munificent additions to the endowment of Hampton, made this year, is the Armstrong Athletic field, named in honor of General Samuel Chapman Armstrong, who founded Hampton in 1868. The field is the gift of the Alumni. In the presentation address, the President of the Association said "that the field would promote physical education and be of benefit, not only to the students of Hampton Institute, but also to students of other Negro institutions, including Howard University, Tuskegee Institute, Lincoln University, Cheney, and many other schools and colleges. Hamptonians plan to spend $30,000 to make this athletic field conform to all modern requirements."

As referred to a week ago, J. Henry Scattergood was elected a Trustee to succeed the late William W. Frazier. He is probably the first Friend to hold a position on the Board. He spoke briefly on the significance of the presentation of this athletic field in the development of the ideals of good sportsmanship, which are, according to his judgment, close to the best ideals of life itself. The total endowment of Hampton is given as $4,700,000.

THE graduating class at Friends' Boarding School, near Barnesville, Ohio, numbered twenty-six. The exercises on the occasion were highly commendable. The address to the class was made by David H. Forsythe, who forty-three years ago, while a teacher at the school, addressed the first graduating class. The class then graduating numbered three, two of whom are now prominent members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

FREDERICK J. LIBBY, Executive Secretary of the National Council for Reduction of Armaments, delivered the commencement address at Nebraska Central College last week.

THE Pacific Friend for Fifth Month opens with an Editorial from THE FRIEND (Philadelphia), "Stakes and Cords," which appeared early last month.

IN addition to an interesting travel sketch by George G. and Anna R. Williams, which we hope to give in full later, the Pacific Friend is responsible for these two items:

The name of the "Workers at Home and Abroad," (London), has been changed to "The Wayfarer," and is published monthly as before, by the Home Missionary and Extension Committee. The paper contains much of interest about English Friends' work and other matters of general interest. Its purpose is to be a Record of Quaker Life and Work. English Friends, in common with us, are feeling greatly the financial stringency in their mission work. A number of those in the foreign field have been recalled and their work in Ceylon closed. Despite these adverse circumstances the "Wayfarer" keeps a smiling face and a cheerful voice, and Henry T. Hodgkin, Henry Silcox and others now at home are in "the saddle" for work in the homefield.

ONE hundred and thirteen political prisoners still remain in Federal prisons, convicted during war time, and nearly three hundred men in all in state and Federal prisons for "conscience" sake." Many of them are badly broken in health on account of terrible prison conditions. Some are being deported penniless to lands where they are unknown and unacquainted with ways of making a living. Some are serving terms of five, ten and twenty years. Esther Harlan, 1012 N. Sixty-sixth Street, Philadelphia, is pleading for persons to write regularly letters to these prisoners, or for those who would write on birthdays. "It makes a break in the monotony—a splash of color in the gray. Some of them haven't a visitor in two years and hardly a letter in two or three months."

DUBLIN YEARLY MEETING appointed five Fraternal Delegates to the Richmond Conference, they are Samuel A. Bell, Henrietta Bulla, Charles B. Lamb, Charlotte G. Lamb and Joseph T. Wigham. The Yearly Meeting's Committee was empowered to fill up vacancies if any of these Friends should be unable to go.

REFERENCE was made in a recent issue of THE FRIEND to Justine Dalencourt's work in France. All will be pleased to hear that, with the exception of £160, all the money needed to purchase the Training Home in Paris has now been raised. It would be peculiarly gratifying if this remaining sum were contributed during the Jubilee year, which closes this month. Any who have not yet given their donations are invited to send them during the next few weeks to Catharine L. Braithwaite, 2, West Bar, Banbury, who will have great pleasure in acknowledging them.

A REPORT of Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin's recent visit to Japan closes thus: "You will not be surprised to learn that there was no time left for sight-seeing on this my first visit to Japan, a matter for which we were very sorry, but which seemed to be unavoidable. Gilbert Bowles, himself, is a glutton for work, and he certainly did not mean to let me waste my time while I was under his care. What I could have done without his help I do not know. It was invaluable, unwearied and most sympathetic."

HENRY T. HODGKIN sailed Fifth Month 20th on the Empress of Asia from Japan to Vancouver. His address during his brief stay in the United States is care of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, 306 Broadway, New York City. He sails for England about Seventh Month 7th.

At the same session of Germantown Monthly Meeting which issued certificates for Edward C. Wood and Esther Morton Smith, alluded to in THE FRIEND of last week, a letter of introduction was granted to Alfred C. Garrett, whose prospect of attending Canada Yearly Meeting, now in session, was presented.

CHARLES H. HAINES was also granted a sojourning minute to the group of Friends at Canton Christian College. It is his expectation to start soon for this field of service.

It is a satisfaction to learn that the recent Baltimore celebration of the 250th anniversary of the founding of the Yearly Meeting was a success financially. We have already been assured that it was a great success otherwise. About one-third of the amount subscribed was all that was needed. The Intelligencer makes the following favorable comment in regard to the Baltimore American. The same is equally true of the Sun, an Associate Editor, Richard L. Cary is a Friend; one of the leading editorials from his pen appeared the first day of the Conference.

"In addition to their accounts of the celebration, at least two of the leading dailies carried editorials of considerable length on the contribution which the Society of Friends has made to the life of Maryland. Such an editorial from The Baltimore American, which has come to our attention, gives both a sympathetic and an intelligent exposition of many of the most important phases of Quaker tradition."

WILLIAM L. PEARSON of Wichita, Kansas, sailed on the 15th by the S. S. Empress of Asia from Vancouver.

As known to many Friends he expects to be married about the 30th to Alice G. Lewis, now resident at Mito, Tokio, Japan.

A RECENT letter from Francis R. Bacon, head of the Friends' Unit in Berlin, informs us that in conformity with suggestions of the "Extension Committee," three of the Pennsylvan leaflets—"Vom Glauben der Quaker," by Barclay Moon, "Echo und Stimme" and "Die Christus—Begeisterung der ersten Juenger," by Max I. Reich, have been translated. Three thousand of each of these have been issued and more may be called for. The next of the series to be translated and issued will be Rufus M. Jones's "Die Lehre der Quaker." F. R. B. writes: "You will be interested to know that when on a visit to Vienna last month I attended Friends' Meeting held in a room of the former Imperial Palace and there met Professor Boeck who, on one occasion at least, was at Woodbrooke and appeared to be something of a leader among Austrians interested in Quakerism. Upon his expression of desire for literature I sent to him 200 copies of "Die Lehre der Quaker" and 250 copies each of the three pamphlets whose titles are given above.

"Upon my suggestion a German member of the Berlin group has written to Quaker centres throughout the world asking for contributions of quotations suitable for publication on a motto-calendar which it is proposed to issue for next year."

THE RECONCILIATION.

Into a world full of strife our Lord has entered with a ministry of reconciliation. Christians are those who can say: "We joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now obtained the reconciliation" (Rom. vii, R. V.). This state of harmony and peace is not an attainment, but an obtainment, and that by faith, which comes by heeding the inward voice of God.

The reconciliation of man to God, his return into the Divine harmony, to use the John Woolman phrase, is the central fact of Christianity. Take that away and you have obliterated it. Christ is more than a Pattern for our imitation. He is the means of our coming into right relations with God. "We have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ"—He has so revealed, even to the extent of His cross, the Father that we cannot but love Him, trust Him, and live in a filial attitude of mind towards Him.

Now Christ not only thus reconciles us to God, but also to ourselves. For man is at strife with himself. His inner life has been tangled up through sin.

Our Lord revealed the worth of the individual, i. e. (what he is worth to God). If he speaks of man as a lost sheep, it is the Shepherd who is the loser. God has a Shepherd-heart, and feels the loss of that man who has elected to live his life apart from Him. He cannot give him up, because man is necessary to His happiness, and there is joy in heaven when he repents. Now our Lord wants every man to wake up out of the delirium of sin to a conception of his true worth to God. The prodigal was not himself when among the swine. "When he came to himself" he remembered his origin in the Father's house, and made haste to return to it. The true man awoke in him once more. "The outward man" is but the perishing clay tenement in which the man made "in the image of God" has his temporary abode. We need to give this man, the real man, his proper food and nourishment.

Now when a man has thus come to himself and to God, through the revelation of God and man in Christ, how quickly he finds his brother also. Reconciliation between man and man then takes place. Christ revealed our Father, as He is in the truth of His being, and not as the Rabbis and Scribes have caricatured Him. He revealed besides our true worth and preciousness to the Father. He also revealed our brother man and bids us see hidden glory in the humblest and meanest brother. What we do to the least of His brethren we do to Him. He makes their sickness His sickness, their poverty His poverty; their imprisonment, His imprisonment. Thus does Christ become the true motive for social service. Shall we be ashamed to minister unto them whom Christ is not ashamed to call His brethren? All frontiers, caste, class and color distinctions and artificial barriers fall away in the light of His reconciliation between man and man. Ah! methinks we have hardly begun to understand the Master on this matter, or if understanding Him, to apply the teaching!

Then, finally, Christ reconciles us to our tasks and duties. His life as the obedient Son—a life "which would no glory borrow, nor majesty from earth," has consecrated poverty and toil. It has dignified the disagreeable things of life. If the Incarnation had taken place in our age, we would probably have seen the glory of God shining through a workman's overalls. The Nazareth life was also a part of the ministry of reconciliation, which is now "committed unto us," to live out and proclaim in the world.

What a wonderful peace and glory can come into a human life reconciled to the will of God, as expressed in the daily providences of His hand, which appoints to each his lot and tasks! No more is the neck chafed under an ill-fitting yoke. Learning obedience, submission, dependence and quiet confidence, at the feet of Him who always pleased the Father, we too shall find rest unto our souls. For now the yoke becomes easy and the burden light.

A MESSAGE FROM SYRIA.

[The following letter was written with no thought of publication. We, however, wish to share it with readers of THE FRIEND.—EDS.]

RAS-EL-METN, Syria,
Fifth Month 22, 1922.

My Dear Friend:—It was good of thee to write such a kind and encouraging letter, with thy contribution, and I want to tell thee that we appreciated it very much. If Friends at home only knew how helpful an encouraging, sympathetic letter is from the homeland to those of us away from home and often struggling with tremendous difficulties, they would never have hesitation in writing or think they were taking up our time. Please accept our grateful thanks for the "slip of paper" from Brown Brothers. It came at a most opportune time and was indeed useful. It is wonderful how our Heavenly Father has helped us through a time of unusual strain and difficulty. He has been good to us. It is just wonderful how He guides and leads. After the Friends' Service Committee discontinued helping us there was a time when it seemed that no contributions were coming in at all. Friends, perhaps, were thinking we were being provided for. In consequence we were in great financial straits. That was the time when the Armenians were in greatest difficulties, too. And to undertake still more responsibility when we were in such difficulties seemed unwise and yet we felt so strongly the call to do something for these poor people and so in faith, and with an empty purse, but with good credit, we brought up sixty here. Just the next day a cheque arrived from America for $1000. He never comes too late. That cheque was timed to arrive just at the right moment. He knew our need, our responsibilities and the trust we had in Him, and He abundantly justified the latter. So our hearts were very glad that we had ventured on a new piece of work for Him before the money arrived. This work for the Armenians has been a great satisfaction and joy to us. The need is still almost as great as ever, and cannot be very different, until the whole, big question of the Near East settlement takes place. For the moment the weather is so fine that the housing problem is in abeyance, and a little work can be got by some here and there. So that things are not as acute as they were in First Month, but they are bad enough. The worst is that the "latter rains" have failed us, and in consequence the wheat crop is the poorest on record. In many places there will be no crop at all. Prices of wheat would be very high now, but for the fact that some Australian wheat is being imported. We face the immediate future with some fears perhaps, but we cannot forget how wonderfully God has blessed us and helped us since we have undertaken this work for the orphans, and our trust is in Him. Please give a message of love and kind remembrance from us to thy family, and to the Meeting. And tell our Friends at home that the Kingdom of God is coming. The Kingdom of love, and peace, and righteousness.

Men and women everywhere are so weary of the strife, and the commotion, and the results of hatred and war—and they are longing with an earnestness and desire so intense for better things—for a new way of life. Blessed is he who has the vision, and the message to give to these perplexed and longing hearts. Every kind thought, every prayer, every deed of love, and service, and sacrifice are helping men and women to see more clearly the new way of life and to bring in the Kingdom.

Affectionately thy friend,
DANIEL OLIVER.

LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

We propose to depart somewhat from our usual course in reviewing London Yearly Meeting and shall select scattered remarks made by individuals, such as appeal most to us as having a close bearing on problems that confront our own membership here; what we give is taken in part from The Friend [London].

When the subject of Ministry was before the meeting, the deadening effect of unkind criticism was contrasted with the helpfulness of an atmosphere of sympathy and prayer. Where this exists it is much more likely that the vocal utterances will form a harmonious whole.

Various speakers touched on the question of preparation for vocal ministry—the right and the wrong way of doing this; most agreed with T. E. Harvey, who thought that our whole life should be a preparation for ministry; we may hear God speaking in our reading and in our own experience. Our ministry might be more effective if we remembered more often the words and ways of our Master. He gave seed thoughts; we too often think we must prepare the seed into bread before passing it on in faith. In all true spiritual ministry there should be the spirit both of joy and of sacrifice: the minister must not come and make a discourse, but should make an effort to sink himself and to reach after those who need help, seeking that of God in our fellow worshippers. It was evident the subject had gripped the meeting and the time was felt to be all too short for the adequate consideration of such a vital subject. It was announced that next year it was hoped one whole day of Yearly Meeting might be devoted to it.

Carl Heath gave the Swarthmore lecture this year. We are told the lecturer addressed a perspiring house and though the weather conditions were extremely adverse to a large attendance, there was a reasonably full house. A brief review of the lecture has already appeared in THE FRIEND. It was characterized throughout by many short pithy sentences—these four were taken rather at random as illustrations:

"Isaiah is a book of splendid politics." "The New Town of Mansoul must be planted on a firmer foundation than that which satisfied a former generation." "The Christian Church must speak overtly to public as to private life or die." "The Gospel is a good news of new relationships—to God and to men."

The subject of Religious Education was conspicuously before an early session of the Yearly Meeting. It was hoped that a list of books useful both for parents' own reading and also for reading to their children will in the near future be issued; a plea is under consideration for loaning such a collection in turn to the various centres. May there not be an example in this for some of our American meetings?

The discussion turned mainly on the need of reviving Family Worship and making it a real and living thing. It was acknowledged that the Bible reading, with silence following, at one time almost universal amongst us, had now been to a large extent discontinued, partly on account of the rush of modern life, but quite as much from a feeling on the part of many that they did not wish to be insincere or to establish or continue a practice which had become a formality only. One Friend's experience was that the Bible reading was usually carried on, while another suggested that the former had only sampled the "well concerned Friends" of the Society and that there were many who had discontinued the practice.

There was much diversity of opinion as to the best way to revive a true united worship. One Friend deprecated the reading of continuous chapters, whilst another found simple stories from the Gospels most useful. One suggested helps in the form of collected thoughts or short prayers, on the other hand, one advocated strongly the Bible being read without note or comment.

A Friend pointed out how not only in Scripture lessons, but also in those on history and literature there come often opportunities to give the instructions we have now in mind, if we will only seek for the openings and embrace them. The need for intellectual study is great, for the problems of the world can not be mastered by good-will alone; the need is that minds trained and well furnished with knowledge should be brought to bear upon them.

Part of one session was given to the reading of the testimony of his Monthly Meeting concerning the late William Charles Braithwaite. "He did not teach theories or doctrines about his Master, he was concerned to show forth Jesus Himself. It was not a traditional Jesus of whom he spoke; it was Jesus who learned in the school of experience and of hardship, was tempted as we are, who lives among us here and now, leading and inspiring us today and moulding our characters to His own likeness."

What we term the "consideration of the state of the Society" and which with us claims fullest recognition when we read and answer the Queries, London Yearly Meeting designated, "Vital religious experience as the basis of service." This was, as a matter of fact, discussed under two distinct captions: "Christianity as the power to solve present-day problems" and "Consistency in individual life."

One morning session was devoted to the consideration of the report of the Peace Committee. The introductory remarks were referred to afterwards as among the best things heard during the entire week. One Friend spoke of the reconciling and healing work of the Friends who have gone into so many countries to distribute relief. Another, in pointing out the political insincerity cultivated by war, queried what would happen if a new John the Baptist came into our midst and called a section of well-meaning people a "generation of vipers." Lady Barlow referred to her long acquaintance with the debates in the House of Commons and deplored that there seemed no one there to hold up the Quaker ideal. A Friend spoke of a visit he had paid to Vienna last year to attend an international conference to represent the pacifist point of view. He was so moved by the perilous position of pacifism in many of the countries of the Middle East, danger threatening the existence of pacifist individuals or groups, that he felt it impossible to attend any similar conference. The duty of pacifist people in this country of comparative safety, must be to try to do away with conditions which cause hostility and suspicion instead of brotherly understanding.

The annual London Epistle has become in Friendly circles in many quarters a thing looked forward to with an honest expectancy of something worth while. The circumstances attending the issuance of this year's Epistle were somewhat novel. An unusually large number of Young Friends were present when the committee was appointed, and the twenty-five set apart to draft it included several of them, many of whom were known to their own meetings rather than to the Yearly Meeting as a whole. The usual hope was expressed that the Epistle might be brief and in simple language, and the suggestion was thrown out that Browning might be avoided. Speakers do not all seem to have realized that the most difficult thoughts can be expressed in words of one syllable without becoming easier to understand. The hints thrown out by some older Friends are quite likely to be relished by some on this side the Atlantic, among them it was remarked that each group of people has its own particular phraseology, and that the language of the Labor group is not always simpler than that of the Yearly Meeting. Modern speech is sometimes as bewildering to the older generation as modern paintings. It has been our practice of late to publish the General Epistle as soon as it reaches us. This brief review will not lessen our interest in it.

Some of us feel that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has grown into something of a clearing-house; what would be the feeling of such when they learn of the items to come before a two and a-half hours' session in London? This session was expected to include five distinct "minutes" forwarded by Quarterly Meetings. How it could be expected that such important questions as the Devonshire House Premises, the Constitution of the Meeting for Sufferings, Penal Reform, the York Retreat, Sanatoria for the Nerve-strained, the Bedford Institute Association and the Tabular Statement, not to mention other items of considerable interest, in two hours and a-half, is beyond our comprehension. They could hardly have imagined that Friends would regard these as merely formal matters and not want to discuss them. Some different arrangement will evidently have to be planned for the future. When the session closed six out of the thirteen items were left over for consideration later on.

There is food for thought in this complexity of topics. We probably have as wide a range of interests in Philadelphia as do our brothers and sisters in London; but our plan of having many very important concerns under managers not directly accountable to the Yearly Meeting and therefor not reporting to it, has obvious features to recommend it.

The discussion that centred about the disposal of the Devonshire House will have added interest to those who were privileged to attend the All Friends' Peace Conference there two summers ago. The arguments pro and con touch Philadelphia Friends not remotely and apply to some extent to the meeting property on South Twelfth Street. The advocates of removal made a strong point of the health of the workers in the various offices of the different organizations of the Society and urged the important bearing of this upon efficiency in carrying on the work of the Society. Our responsibility for the souls of men and women was also mentioned, as the locking up of so much capital hindered the discharge of that responsibility. The provision of a meeting-house large enough for Yearly Meeting, if new premises are found, or the retention of the Men's Meeting-house, if the whole or part of the present premises are retained, was advocated by many speakers. Should London Yearly Meeting see its way clear to sell Devonshire house and locate elsewhere, probably outside of London, no one can charge it with being over hasty in reaching a conclusion. The matter was referred to the Meeting for Sufferings in 1914, just before the outbreak of the war, and it had been under serious review for some time before.

Some felt that the retaining of the present house in London was essential. It was, however, pointed out that this was almost in the nature of a luxury as the room is lying idle for most of the year. This again is partly a financial question; and if Quarterly Meetings cannot pay their full quota for the Yearly Meeting Fund, it hardly looks as if the Society were prepared to pay for the luxury.

The division of opinion during the discussion on the premises was a surprise to many. Some Friends usually labelled socialist were found amongst those in favor of retaining the property, whilst at least one other usually labelled conservative was an earnest advocate of parting with it and moving elsewhere.

The burden that I bear would be no less
Should I cry out against it; though I fill
The weary day with sound of my distress,
It were my burden still

The burden that I bear may be no more
For all I bear it silently and stay
Sometimes to laugh and listen at a door
Where joy keeps holiday.

I ask no more save only this may be—
On life's long road, where many comrades fare,
One shall not guess, though he keep step with me,
The burden that I bear.

THE NEED FOR THE DENOMINATIONAL SCHOOL.

ADDRESS BEFORE THE WESTTOWN ALUMNI ASSOCIATION,
FIFTH MONTH 27, 1922.

WILBUR K. THOMAS.

The teaching and interpretation of history can be carried on in the most satisfactory way in our own private schools. Perhaps it is impossible to hope for, but we have not yet developed non-partisan historians. It is said that at the present time in Germany no reference is made in the text-books to the Great World War. Opinions vary so much in regard to the causes, conduct, etc., that the schoolmen have decided that it is best to say nothing about it. There are text-books used to this day in our Southern States that imply that the South won the Civil War, and the fighting was stopped because they had too much humanitarian spirit to continue it. Our own interpretation of the Revolutionary War,—causes, etc.—are all to the glorification of the United States. It does not matter whether this is true or not, good feeling between the United States and England is not cultivated by exploiting Lexington, Concord, the Battle of Trenton, etc. The peoples of the world cannot be brought closer together until the artificial boundaries which separate them are destroyed; and this cannot be done by the glorifying of one nation at the expense of another. I say that it is impossible in our public schools to teach history in the right way, for public opinion would not stand for it. It can only be done in the private school.

Furthermore, perhaps due to the war, there has been a decided decline in moral standards. Perhaps it is too much to ask that the men and women who are selected to teach our young people, should represent the very highest moral standing. Perhaps it is because I am too old-fashioned in my own ideas; but I cannot permit my children to be taught by a cigarette-smoking man or woman, or by a man or woman who justifies the modern movie, dancing, etc. The management of the denominational school can insist upon the highest moral standards on the part of its teaching staff, and so long as they are not bidding for financial patronage can maintain it.

Today in the public schools such tests are no longer considered necessary; although there are many principals and teachers who have refused to be debauched by the times. The atmosphere of the school-room exercises more or less of a moral influence on the child's mind, and unless the greatest care is used in the selection of teachers, those who are upright and pure in heart, the greatest good cannot be accomplished.

There is a further reason for insisting upon the denominational school which applies more particularly to us as Friends than any of the above reasons. Our whole attitude toward worship is quite different from that of any other denomination. The meeting for worship on a basis of silence is not found elsewhere. As a group we have not developed the religious side of church work for young people as some other of the Protestant denominations have; and, therefore, there is a decided value in bringing our young people together in a homogeneous group in connection with our meeting for worship. Many of our Friends' Meetings are small. There is little of the uplifting ministry; and too often no attention is given to the needs of the child. In all such cases where parents do not supply this lack in their home life, it is a most valuable thing to have a denominational school where this side of Quakerism is highly developed.

Our interest in our own denominational schools ought not to lessen our interest in the public schools. There is no one institution of which we should be more proud than our public school. Therefore, while supporting our denominational school for the sake of our own children for whom we are directly responsible, let us redouble our efforts to purify the public school. If public schools are overcrowded, let us see that the condition is remedied. If they do not have enough men teachers for the boys, let us see that salaries are such that the very best men teachers can be employed. If there is a teaching of the wrong kind of patriotism in the schools, let us, for the sake of our country, see that it is changed. In the meantime, however, we cannot afford to permit our own children's lives to be warped. Our interest in the public school does not necessarily require us to sacrifice our own. Rather should we sacrifice ourselves;—that is, time, energy and money, to improve conditions. Merely putting our own unformed, undeveloped children in the public school of the present day is not enough. In other words, the maintenance of the private school should not for one moment lessen our interest in the public school.

A careful study of incoming students by Harvard University has led to the conclusion that the best scholars on the average come from the public schools. The reason for this, as advanced by those who have made the investigation, is, that the private school offers more distractions. While I agree with the conclusion, I do not agree with the reason assigned. I believe that the best students come from the public school because they are from homes where sacrifices must be made in order to secure an education. The student, therefore, is more devoted to his studies than the average student who has been brought up in a home of luxury and ease. If Friends maintain simplicity in their homes and in their schools there will be a minimum of these distracting influences. It is a question of earnestness on the part of parents and students.

Objection is made to the private school on the ground: (1) That it introduces elements foreign to the broadly democratic conception of society; (2) That it serves as a sort of hot-house; (3) That the ability of parents to pay for the education of their children does not necessarily mean that their children are better off in the private school; (4) That the element of snobbishness is almost always prevalent in the private school. Such criticisms cannot be used against the denominational schools if there is a real, live, religious element in control. It is true, however, that special efforts must be made to avoid the development of such harmful elements; but they cannot be introduced as serious objections if the people back of the school are in earnest.

We come, therefore, to this general conclusion, that if our young people are to receive the right kind of education—that which properly balances character and learning—we must continue to support our own denominational schools. The problem of money and students is not serious, if we follow this ideal. If once the doors are opened and we begin to cater to the general public and to the standards of education as proposed by those who are not actuated by as deeply religious motives as we, very soon our schools will lose their influence and will reflect only the average educational standards of the times.

Greater stress must be placed upon the private secondary school. The colleges offer a problem in themselves which is quite different from the lower grades. A Catholic has said: "Give me the child until he is seven years old, and you can have him ever afterwards." Certainly we, as Friends, should take direct responsibility for the welfare of our own children until they are at least through the preparatory grades. By the time the student enters college he ought to be able to think for himself, and his general attitude toward life ought to be pretty well established.

Reference has already been made to the influence of Westtown on Friends in other sections of the country. I believe that just in proportion as you appeal to southern and western Friends to send their students to Westtown will you be having leavening influence on American Quakerism. This is one of the greatest opportunities that faces your Yearly Meeting.

I can close with no more fitting words than those of the Psalmist, used so many years ago for the young people of his day. He prayed that our young men may be "as plants grown up in their youth and our daughters as corner-stones hewn after the similitude of a Palace."

THE LESSON OF A LOSS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FRIEND:—

Some of my friends have advised me to offer the enclosed article for publication in THE FRIEND. I desire to put it where it may do good, if such a place can be found. I am also enclosing a copy of a poem, written near the time our little one was taken from us, which may explain part of the other. The vision referred to was the "Vision of Thomas Say," published a few years ago in "Select Miscellany," in which he spoke of those he had seen in the vision as "appearing in the fulness of the body," (after death).

COLUMBIANA, Ohio.

M. E. C.

There was once a mother who had a little son. And the child was straight and strong and fair to look upon. And his soul delighted in all things good and beautiful. And the mother rejoiced greatly in her son.

Then suddenly the places that had known him, knew him no more. One morning he was there, all light and joy; the next, his brow was marble and the sweet voice stilled forever. The flowers he had loved put forth their blossoms in vain, for no little hand came to caress them. And the mother grieved sore for the child.

At evening she missed the little form that was wont to pause at the stairs, while he repeated the little prayer verse that for him unpeopled all the dark shadows.

When she entered her room she thought of the little hand that had knocked on the door, and the childish delight when she opened it and playfully greeted him as a stranger.

There were the boots, never to be pressed by those little feet. There the rosy gloves, shaped to the sturdy hands. And the mother's heart was faint with grief.

Then a dear friend spoke to the mother:—"Thinkest thou to know thy child when, thy mortality laid aside, thou shalt join the throngs of the blest?"

And her heart cried out in fear, "God would not plant mother love within us, to be torn out so ruthlessly."

But like a barbed arrow, the thought remained and would not be plucked out. And the mother's cheek grew thin and her eyes dim with many tears.

But after many months, when the loving Father saw it was enough, He spoke to her through the vision of one long since gone to his rest; and showed her that all things that are needed for the soul's happiness are in store for those who love Him. And peace fell on the weary spirit.

Yet she queried, "If I may again fully believe that I shall one day clasp my child and know re-union with my father, my mother, my sister, and all the loved ones gone before, why all this heart-rending grief?"

And the voice answered: "Didst thou not ask to know My valuation of a human Soul? Behold thou hast longed in thy finite heart for the conscious presence of thy child throughout eternity. Even so I long with infinite longing for every soul of man to be with Me and to enjoy with Me the things which eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither hath entered into the heart of man, which I have prepared."

So though she never ceased to miss the sunny presence, the mother grieved no longer bitterly for the child. For she had other sons who needed her loving ministrations, but she pondered the lesson much in her heart.

So the years passed; and another vision rose before the mother.

She saw the nations of the world gathered in battle; And her own beloved country was there, and she saw men gloating over the horrible death-dealing efficiency of their weapons. And she cried out in her heart, "These men are my brothers, whom Christ loves, and longs for, to spend Eternity with Him!"

And she saw other men, the young and old, the evil and the just—victims of these death-dealing weapons. She saw the dead and the dying, the maimed of body or of soul. "These, too, are my brothers, and brothers one of another. And every one Christ loves!"

And she beheld in the rolling clouds of smoke, reflected by terrible barrages of fire, the face of Christ, infinitely sorrowful, infinitely loving; the outstretched, nail-pierced hands, the tender, pleading voice, calling: "Come unto Me, all ye!"

And she saw that not alone for her own beloved America, nor even for those allied with her, but for every "nation, kindred and tongue," was given the supreme sacrifice of Calvary—was spoken the loving call: "Come unto Me, all ye!"

FIFTH MONTH 28, 1922.

EDITOR OF THE FRIEND:—

I am so thankful for the publication of the article "I was in prison and ye visited me not," in the issue of Third Month 16th. Esther Harlan tells me many have answered it, asking numerous questions about the work.

As secretary of the Philadelphia Prison Comfort Club, I'm sending a little report of our work, thinking many readers of THE FRIEND would like to read it and hoping thee can find room for all or part of it.

Sincerely,
RACHEL DAVIS DUBOIS,
Secretary.

With its Third Month meeting, the Prison Comfort Club of Philadelphia completed its first half year. Its original membership of eight has increased to forty-seven. Several hundred letters have been written to and received from prisoners and their families. Other similar groups have been formed, outside the city, working in unison with this one. Nearly $1200 have been collected in all, and have been distributed to political prisoners and their families, except a reserve fund of about $400, which is to be divided among those ordered deported, when they actually leave the country. (One clause of our constitution reads: "No member of this organization may accept any remuneration, nor may any of the running expenses be paid from the treasury. Every dollar contributed goes directly to the political prisoners or their families.")

The club has many plans in hand for the coming six months. It is hoped eventually to come into personal touch with every man imprisoned for a principle. Our list now shows nearly three hundred, to only about a hundred of whom the members of this club have been able to write. Every one who will undertake correspondence with even one or two greatly widens the scope of service. The writer has found such correspondence a liberal education in more than one sense. The outstanding feature of the experience as a whole, is the splendid unselfishness of these men. When asked what may most acceptably be done for them, letter after letter comes back—"I can get along. Send something to So-and-so, he is ill." Or: "So-and-so has fewer friends on the outside." All through the past winter, letters have come—"Don't send to me. The women and children on the outside must be needing it more, with all this unemployment." Two of them sent their Christmas money (gifts from those on the outside not members of this club) to the Friends' Service Committee to "help feed a hungry baby in Russia." When one realizes how much of actual health even a dollar represents under the terrible prison conditions, such unselfishness amounts to a very real sort of heroism. No one could read these prison letters without realizing the exceptional character of these men, as a whole group, their clear vision, their splendid courage, the saneness and breadth of this work for which they are giving their lives, in the full knowledge that for them individually there is everything to lose and nothing to gain, that no material results can come in their lifetime, but only to "the children of the future."

It may be of interest to quote from a recent letter, from Richard Brazier, serving a twenty-year sentence, slated for deportation to England:—"My mother, when a young girl, was a pupil in Miss Helen Cadbury's Sunday School Class. Miss Cadbury, as you doubtless know, was a member of the famous Cadbury family of Bournville, amongst the leading Quakers of Great Britain. It was largely through Miss Cadbury's efforts that I came to America—as assistant in charge of a group of orphan boys and girls—emigrants." He encloses the latest of his prison poems, with many protestations and only because it was especially desired of him. But to the writer it seems of more than casual interest:—

"THE HIDDEN HEAVENS."

From my high prison window I see fall
The far, soft shadows of the summer eve,
I watch the warm glow climb the towered wall,
Then creep away in slow and lingering leave.
Soft falls the dusk upon the prison yard,

The twittering birds seek rest beneath the eaves,
The evening wind takes up its watch and ward
O'er prison flowers and buds and captive leaves,
And night her sable curtain draws without.
But I can see no moon with silver sheen,
The shades of deepest darkness put to rout,
And reign in radiant loveliness as queen
Of distant stars and of earth's lesser lights.

For here, where walls are high and windows barred,
Are hidden from my eyes the heaven of nights—
The heavens full of glory, silver starred,
Only in dreams my hungry heart can keep
Dear memories of things I loved outside;
And when the hush sounds the hour of sleep
I see once more what bars and walls would hide."

Have we no responsibility that men so-minded are left to spend twenty years behind iron bars, and only by accident do any of us learn of it? These men in prison "substituting" for every one of us in the fight for freedom of speech, of thought, of faith, the fight against the inhumanity of all war, have written again and again that above all else they desire that the convicts for which they are paying this price may be understood by those "on the outside." And nothing could show our friendship for them, could so companion them in their exile, as action born of sincere understanding of the principles for which they are working—and suffering.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

HOW THE PIG WAS WEIGHED.—A Yankee Boy's Ingenious Device for Scales That Did the Work.—An instance of typical Yankee ingenuity, showing how a Massachusetts boy weighed a pig he had entered in a state-wide pig contest, is told in a recent issue of the Weekly News Letter issued by the Department of Agriculture.

According to the rules governing the contest he had to weigh the pig at the beginning and at the end of a certain period, and also at monthly intervals. The only scales available were household utensils used by his mother, and of a limited range.

After surveying his difficulties he found he had available a hog crate, a strong box, some chains, a high board fence and a long pole, in addition to the small scales, with which to weigh his pig.

He marked the middle point of the long pole and placed it over the fence. To one end he attached the crate and to the other end the box was fastened by means of chains. Sand sufficient to balance the crate was placed in the box. He then gathered a quantity of small cobblestones, dropping them in the box.

By placing a few grains of corn in the crate and using other grains as a bait, he lured the pig into the crate. The door was then closed and the pig was ready for weighing.

By putting more of the small cobblestones into the box until it balanced with the crate, the boy learned the weight of his pig in stones. By means of the scales the stones were weighed and the total of the weighing gave the boy with fair accuracy the weight of his pig in pounds.

The arrangement worked so well that he used it throughout the weighings for the contest, and as a result he was able to determine not only the cost of the pig per pound of grain but also the average daily gain of his pig by months and for the contest as a whole.

His pig did not win the contest, but the boy received honorable mention for good work done.

I was watching a beautiful white swan, with its baby swan following it one day at Orlando, Florida, when I was surprised to see the baby cygnet jump up on the mother's back, just behind the lovely soft white wing, and ride on over the lake. I have so often thought of it, and of how it was another case of our Heavenly Father's tender care in providing for His little ones when they are weary.

Another time in Minnesota, when the electric light men were busy running new wires through the woods near our house, we saw a little squirrel come down from its nest carrying its baby, and take it way off to another tree. Back it soon came and carried down another baby, repeating this until all were safely moved.

RECOLLECTIONS OF YOUTHFUL DAYS, AND SOME RECORDS OF AFTER YEARS.

WRITTEN BY MARMADUKE C. COPE. COMMENCED AT NEWPORT IN THE SUMMER OF 1877 IN MY SEVENTY-FOURTH YEAR.

When I had attained the age of fifteen years, my dear father, at my urgent solicitation, consented I should leave school, and enter the business in which he had been engaged, thus commencing my long apprenticeship of six years. Many times in after years I regretted my precipitancy in this matter, before the mind had been properly disciplined by study. My desultory attempts at mental improvement after entering the whirl of business, were far from making up the loss sustained by my own premature resolve, which was not in accord with my father's judgment, although he yielded to my impotency. But by the change I received one lesson of great value. I had become very fond of gunning and fishing and frequently went out for these sports. My uncle, Isaac Cooper, seeing my fancy for them, presented me with a fowling piece, and just after I had entered the store, invited me to accompany him to Cape May to shoot, which I was very anxious to do. I applied to my kind and judicious father for permission, which he declined to give on the ground that as I had chosen to enter into business, I must now be diligent in attending to it. This was a sore disappointment, but submitting to his decision, the gun was laid aside, and so far as I remember never after used by me. This check to my sporting propensities was a means of leading me to reflect on the subject of taking the life of any of God's creatures for sport, and I was gradually led to a settled conviction that it would be wrong for me to do it, and I entirely abandoned the practice, having more enjoyment afterwards in witnessing the happiness of birds and fishes in the freedom which their Creator gave them than in depriving them of it. In this conclusion I do not in any wise question the right of man to use both fish and fowl for his food, but would leave the taking of their lives to those who adopt it as a lawful occupation, and are justified in it by the necessity of providing food for themselves and others. After entering the store I was diligently engaged in mastering all the details of business, which then included for the youngest apprentice the opening of the store before breakfast, sweeping it out, making the fires, as well as keeping the goods in order and carrying parcels to customers.

About my seventeenth year, I was in an unguarded moment exposed to a great and sinful temptation, in looking back on which I shudder even now to think how near I was to the opening of the horrible pit. But by the good and merciful grace of my Heavenly Father marvellously interposed, I was snatched from it in a way very humbling to myself, but through His goodness so secret that no one knew of my folly. This I have ever esteemed a most convincing evidence of our Heavenly Father's care over His poor, weak, erring children, and shall continue to praise Him for this great deliverance. When about eighteen years of age I had the privilege of a visit to Baltimore in company with my sister Mary Ann. I enjoyed highly the agreeable social circle into which we were introduced. We went on to Washington, where we visited the Capitol, and then to Alexandria and Mount Vernon. At Baltimore I met with several agreeable young men of Friends' families, who endeavored to promote my enjoyment. On one occasion when taking a walk to some interesting localities, they proposed stopping at a public house to have a drink of beer, to which I felt so strong an objection that I promptly declined, and they with some surprise at my refusal gave up their intention. I have ever felt satisfied with the stand I took then against a practice which has resulted in the downfall of so many promising young men. I well remember the sad end of one of the most accomplished young men I then met with, who after attaining to a high position in civil society and in social circles, was so intemperate as to become an out-cast and die a drunkard.

There was a charming freedom of manner and an open-hearted hospitality among the Friends of Baltimore that quite charmed me. It was there I first met with "Peggy Carey" as she was familiarly called in the bright gaiety of her youth, the very delight of all she mingled with in "the pleasures of friendship." How greatly the fascinating traits of character and person were, in after life, adorned by the Christian graces with which she became richly endowed, many who have intimately known her as Margaret Cheston can bear witness.

In those days the journey to Baltimore was made by steamboat to Newcastle, thence by stage to Frenchtown and again by steamboat to Baltimore. It was my first important turn-out from home and has ever been remembered with pleasure.

My youthful associations at home were now more and more with the social circle in which my sisters were interested, and this I have always esteemed an advantage, as it tended to preserve me from the pernicious habits of smoking and chewing tobacco, and other objectionable practices common among young men. Even in Friends' families in those days it was usual to hand round the glass of wine or the foaming cup of beer, but I was happily preserved from acquiring a fondness for them, and when settled in life easily became a rigid abstainer from their seductive use. The subject of reading works of fiction early became a serious question with me. I had been very fond of novels, but confined myself as I became capable of judging, to the best class, such as Walter Scott, and Fenimore Cooper, but even these, ere long, became as the forbidden fruit, and my conviction was a decided one, that it was best for me to give up such reading entirely, and choose that which was more solid and instructive. With a natural taste for instrumental music and singing, I became quite a devotee to them, and having a good voice I was frequently pressed to sing in the social parties I attended. Gradually, however, I found my pleasure in this to diminish—I have ever believed this to have been under the guiding hand of my Father in Heaven. About my twenty-second year, I gave up the practice, and laid aside the flute to which I was much attached.

Here I will mention the disposition I made a few years afterwards of the unused flute. A pious young man had become much interested in the inmates of the insane department of the Alms House, and spent much time in reading and preaching to them. Many efforts were then making to alleviate the afflictions of their mental condition; among others it had been ascertained that musical sounds had a very soothing influence on their distempered minds. This young man had been accustomed to call on me to aid him, and on one occasion mentioned their need of musical instruments. At once I offered him the flute, considering that as a remedial measure it was both right and expedient thus to endeavor to comfort the distressed. I heard afterwards that it was thankfully received as a useful gift.

About the year 1814 my father purchased a small farm situated about seven miles north of the city adjoining a little manufacturing village, called by the common folks Grubtown, by others Crescentville. Part of it was bordered by Tacony Creek, a pleasant stream where I often had hours of enjoyment. It had several fine springs and brooks and was named Brookland. Here I became much interested in rural pursuits. I made walks through the woods with rustic benches, cleared out the springs, took some care of the garden and in harvest time worked diligently in the field. The remembrance of those days between my eleventh and seventeenth years has always been a pleasant one. I have always loved the country and its simple joys.

The beautiful spot on the Schuylkill River now called South Laurel Hill was one of my early haunts. My uncle Isaac Cooper purchased the property from William Rawle. It was then called Harleigh. There was on it at that time a large aristocratic mansion with ample stables and garden. The noble lawn was planted with grand old hemlocks and other fine shade trees, and skirting the rocky bank of the river, was a forest of ancient oaks, beech, walnut and maple. The sylvan walks and summer house on the rock which descended precipitously to the river, were a source of great enjoyment. A short distance above Harleigh, the bed of the Schuylkill was full of rocks through which the waters rushed in a rapid descending current causing what was called "The Falls of Schuylkill." The name is still retained, though the construction of the dam at Fairmount has backed the water so as to cover the rocks, and the surface is nearly placid. After the dam was built the residence on the banks became unhealthy and the place was sold.

In connection with Harleigh, I may also mention Rockland, the seat of my uncle Isaac C. Jones, lower down on the river, to which I often rambled, enjoying greatly with my young cousins, the hillsides, the rowboat on the river, the lovely walks and the fine garden. This charming place was long retained by the family who resorted to it in the summer, and the pleasure of a visit was much enhanced by the sweet winning way in which my Aunt Hannah Jones welcomed all who were privileged to partake of her courteous hospitality. Half a century has more than passed since those days, but the picture is perfect in my mind's eye. But few who enjoyed those scenes with me are now living. Rockland is now absorbed in our beautiful Park and the thousands of happy children who now in their summer excursions run over the hillsides and in the shaded lawn, and through the time-worn hall, so utterly change the scene, that I scarce recognize it. True, the garden is obliterated, the winding approach from the rural lane is no longer there, and other landmarks are removed. In their place we have the broad public drive, but the neglected look of the mansion and its surroundings brings a pang to those who remember their charms in former days.

I must not forget to tell of Peter's Island as it then appeared in the Schuylkill opposite Rockland. It had a beautiful grove on it, and our favorite row was to its shaded shore where we rambled for awhile. Our poetical imagination was exercised occasionally in describing these excursions. But the beauty of the spot was soon after destroyed. In the winter of 1822, which was unusually severe, a great ice dam was formed across the river a short distance above the island said to have been about twenty-five feet high. When this gave way on the approach of spring it swept away the grove utterly, and left the island a bare muddy desolation. The large bridge at the Falls of Schuylkill was lifted from its piers by the flood and carried down in the fearful torrent. I was standing at Fairmount with many thousands of the citizens who came to witness the fearful scene. Many thought the Fairmount Dam, which had just been completed, would be broken down. But happily it stood firm. The huge bridge came down that far whole, but as it was swept over the dam it broke into fragments. For many weeks after the large cakes of ice remained high up on the rocks at Rockland, and one of my pleasures was with the help of my cousin Aquila Jones to dislodge them, and witness their crushing fall into the river.

My first acquaintance with my brother-in-law, Stephen P. Morris began in connection with a ride to Rockland. My uncle Isaac C. Jones was a successful agriculturist and raised large crops of the sugar beet, which he fed to his stock. He had a peculiar iron cutter to chop those beets, and I was sent out with Stephen to show him the tool, as my father who was also interested in the best culture wished one like it. Stephen had just then commenced business as a blacksmith and my father procured him the first important job of work, which was making a lot of iron bedsteads for the Pennsylvania Hospital. Soon after this anthracite coal began to be used by families in Philadelphia, and Stephen commenced making the grates for parlor and kitchen, which soon became in large demand, and the manufacture of those and other articles of iron eventually became a very extensive and profitable business.

TEXTS—PHRASES—SHIBBOLETHS.

III.

In a recent number of The Nation, a distinguished editorial writer refers to the commandment, "Thou shalt not kill," as a biblical injunction against carnal warfare. The statement has been made by more than one writer, even by some who have resigned their membership in the Religious Society of Friends, that Friends have based their opposition to war on this Sixth Commandment.

I have consulted several of the recognized authorities on the doctrines and practices of Friends, and have not yet discovered that they base any argument against war on this commandment.

Jonathan Dymond refers to this command as an ordinance against the murder of an antagonist with whom one may have a personal quarrel. He bases his scriptural argument against war upon the teachings of Jesus Christ and his apostles. He refers to the prophetic writings of the Old Testament where there are many references to a glorious era of Peace, when men would cease to learn war and righteousness would cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

Robert Barclay in his chapter on War makes no reference to the Sixth Commandment, but derives his main argument from the New Testament writings and the records of the early Christians.

The evident meaning of the Sixth Commandment is "Thou shalt not commit murder." Among the Hebrews at the time the Mosaic Law was announced, the law allowed retaliation. An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth (Lev. 24: xx). The eye-for-an-eye, the tooth-for-a-tooth method of retribution was an advance step. The previous notion of vengeance was that if "another strike me or insult me, I'll kill him." Is it not humiliating that some modern notions of retaliation have not advanced to any great extent from the pre-historic methods of the cave-man? They have not attained the standard of the Mosaic Law. They have not reached Sinai, they are still in Egyptian darkness.

In accordance with Jewish conceptions of Jehovah, He appeared to sanction warfare with other nations. Almost at the very time the Law was given on Sinai, the hands of Moses were upheld by Aaron and Hur in order that the Amalekites might be vanquished in battle. The Lord declared to Moses that He would "utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven." In later times the Lord through Samuel commanded Samuel to exterminate this wicked tribe, an injunction which he literally obeyed, sparing none save Agag their king. And Samuel, the prophet of the Lord, was exceedingly wroth at the forbearance of Saul, and in order to complete the massacre ordered by Jehovah, summoned King Agag and hewed the old sinner "in pieces." Joshua under what was thought to be divine command captured city after city in Canaan, and usually gave no quarter to man, woman or child. Jewish history of that age is a revolting, bloody record, and further details are unnecessary to be rehearsed. All this time the Ten Commandments were supposed to be in force. They were intended to apply with their dealings with each other, not with the outside nations. Hence the Sixth Commandment has not been quoted by our approved writers in support of our testimony against war.

It is true that in the prophetic writings of the Old Testament we note a vision of better days. The work of righteousness shall be peace (Is. 32: xvii). The eleventh chapter of Isaiah contains an animated description of the glories of the peaceable conditions of the reign of righteousness. Both Isaiah and Micah speak of the time when the people "shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up the sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." King David was not permitted to build a temple for the worship of Jehovah because he was a man of war, from which we may rightly infer that there was a growing conception among the Jewish leaders that the character of Jehovah was averse to bloodshed.

However, the fuller conception of God as a Being of universal love is apparent in the writings of the New Testament. He is still the Lord of Hosts, but their anthem, "Peace on earth, good will among men," has no resemblance to a battle cry. The teachings of Jesus and His apostles, the accounts of the lives of the early Christians, clearly indicate this belief in the iniquity of all carnal warfare.

ALBERT H. VOTAW.

O Thou that rulest life and death, and all we see

And hear, and know;—we are but children in Thy loving power.

Thou art our Father! By this dear tie help us be Steadfast in duty every passing hour,

Thy wisdom sees and knows:—Thou judgest what is best;—

And Thou art love. Midst all the loud alarms

That life may know, grant us to rest,

Trusting and peaceful, in Thy everlasting arms!

FRIENDS' TRACTOR PLOWING IN RUSSIA.

In Buzuluk Uyezd, Samara Gubernia, land is being plowed by tractors. The tractors belong to the Society of Friends' Relief organizations. The drivers are members of these organizations. The plowed land is being sown with seed furnished by the Soviet Government. The products to be harvested will be used to feed the Children's Homes in the area.

The English section of the Uyezd already has four tractors at work; two are turning up the black steppe within a stone's throw of the Buzuluk railway station, two are at Maximovka, a Quaker outpost, working on land owned by the October School of the Revolution. In seven days the latter two have plowed 25 dessiatines or approximately 68 acres. They have no definite schedule to accomplish. They are merely plowing at top speed from sunrise to sunset, and they will keep on plowing as long as there is a day left for sowing. Both wheat and garden seeds will be put in the ground near Buzuluk. A large quantity of seed potatoes have been furnished by the Government. The English tractors were brought out originally to serve as transport. They will be utilized for this purpose after the plowing season is passed.

The American section, likewise, has two tracts of land, both near Sorochinskaya, the home station and warehouse centre of the American Friends' work. The first is lowland that can be irrigated in case of drought. It comprises some 10 dessiatines along the muddy banks of the Samara River. For this tract the Quakers are to supply the tractors and the tractor drivers. The Government gives a trained agricultural supervisor, an adequate amount of garden seed, workers for sowing and cultivating, and some tools. A plan to have all the children in the Children's Homes of Sorochinskaya work on their individual plots as well as on the common plot is agreed upon by the Quakers and the Government. In addition to the seeds provided by the latter the Quakers are now advised that 1450 sacks of garden seeds are on their way from Philadelphia. (By the time this appears these seeds will be in the ground.)

Some of these seeds will, of course, be used on the larger plot of land southwest of the village in the rich black soil where wheat was sown and burnt by the drought last year. "You can have all the land from here to the hills," says the Soviet representative to Homer Morris, the American Field Director, as he points toward some rising ground three or four versts away. The sweep of his arm takes in at least a thousand dessiatines! The arable land in this section is literally unlimited this year. So many of the peasants have died, so many have left, so many are too weak or too poor in livestock to plow their allotments, that the land to be cut by the plowshares, pulled by the three Fordson tractors, is much more than could be covered by even a thousand tractors in the month remaining before the last spring grains can be sown. On the larger allotment the Quakers will supervise the planting of buckwheat, millet, Russian maize, potatoes and sunflower seeds, the latter being one of the staple Russian products that will grow in some of the driest lands.

Just as in France and Poland the American tractors pulled the plows for the peasants after the ravages of war, so in Russia after the great sweep of the hunger has done its worst the tractors will lay open the soil for the harvest that the spring rains tell us is coming this year. Next winter, perhaps the Children's Home will have food from the Quaker gardens. And in the autumn the machines will open the soil again for the spring rye. This is more than charity. It is reconstruction.

ROBERT W. DUNN.

CABLE received in Philadelphia dated Moscow, Sixth Month 17th, gives the latest information on the work of the tractors. From Fifth Month 13th to Sixth Month 15th three tractors with Russian drivers working on two eight-hour shifts plowed and seeded 230 acres of millet, 40 acres of potatoes and 13 acres of garden seeds.

The cable further states that the fall plowing begins Seventh Month 1st.

ARTHUR WATTS.

Friends in America will be glad to learn that Arthur Watts, who has served as Chief of the Russian Unit for the past two years, is convalescing from typhus. Following a very severe case one lung filled up. This has now cleared, and he is so far recovered that he has taken a trip to Norway for a period of rest and recuperation.

HELP WHEN LEAST EXPECTED.

The Minnesota Russian Relief Committee with headquarters at Minneapolis, Minnesota, is very much alive. Their Secretary reports that recently in starting a campaign in one of the counties in Minnesota she accidentally discovered two people who had tried to go to Russia as missionaries, but had been prevented from entering. These people immediately interested themselves in the campaign and at the first meeting arranged for the benefit of the Russian Famine Relief $147 was raised. "So help often comes before we ask it. I am sure now that they will have a good campaign out there."

The Minnesota Russian Relief Committee has contributed approximately $95,000 in cash and kind to the work of the American Friends' Service Committee.

TWO DAYS—POSSIBLY FOUR.

It is three vests to the Children's Home. On the way we pass four separate teams returning to the villages without grain, "Perhaps," the drivers say, "we can return for it when the animals have more food and the roads dry a little." Above the glitter of a birch grove stands the Children's Home, its west windows looking across the valley toward the two silver knobs on the church at Yerokovka. Bruskinin, the director, takes us at once to his desk. He pulls out the report book for the first four months of 1922. He opens and points to some columns, Deaths during First Month one, during Second Month none, during Third Month none. During Fourth Month (and this only the 27th) seven red crosses in this column. Bruskinin looks at us with pure appeal in his face, no affectation. He knows that we know that the corn didn't come for the adults and only a part of the child food. And he asks us to help him in the emergency.

In the clean, white-washed kitchen Bruskinin's wife stands over a boiler of steaming kasha—beans and millet with a few cans of unsweetened milk. Fifty children are eating this every meal now. They have nothing with which to vary the diet. A few of the children stand by the big white stove. "The Kasha smells so good," says Poyla a tiny thing almost as white as the stove. We wonder how such burning eyes ever grew in such a miserable body. Poyla had been starving slowly for two years before she came to the Children's Home. Contrast her with Michael Petrovka, thirteen years old and full chested. He has a full arm and says he boxes well. He has been eating Quaker food for four months.

"They are all figuring on the number of hours now," Bruskinin explains. "They always ask me when I return from Buzuluk or Sorochinskaya, 'What have you brought us, Nicholas?' I tell them the exact amount and show them my O. D. K. (Friends) order slips and they figure out just how long that amount of food will last our family of fifty. They used to figure in days, but now it is in hours." Bruskinin opened his cupboard. A few cans of milk, half a small bag of grits. "That is the last of our Quaker food. It will last us two days. Then we will live on a pod of millet the Government gave us for personnel. After that we know there is just one sack of American flour in the warehouse at Kluchi. We can perhaps do something with that. This with the millet may stretch us over two days more. Then there is nothing." We thought of those broken horses returning without wagons. We knew that at best it would be two weeks before the American food could come up the long road from Buzuluk.

As we walk back to Kluchi we meet a peasant leading a firm-horned cow. It tugs at the rope as he stops to tell us where he is going. It is only twelve vests away. His wagon sits in the mud up to the hubs. But this is the strongest cow in the volost. It will pull it out. But the poor horse. It may die before it can be led home. At home there is no food for horse or cow or man, only a little seed grain to plant for the hope of autumn. But the cow can pull. It will bring back the seed. It may even be able to return to Buzuluk for the Children's food. Were it not for a few cows and horses like this, death would come swiftly to Kluchevskaya volost.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

BARNESVILLE NOTES.—Commencement of 1922 is a thing of the past, occurring on Sixth Month 1st. This year the class consisted of twenty-six members from five different states, and Canada. The states represented were Alabama, Indiana, Iowa, Maryland and Ohio. Naturally the greatest numbers in the class were from Ohio, with Iowa holding a close second. Good weather prevailed during the week and the beautiful time of year helped to make the event a very enjoyable and we trust a profitable occasion. This week was also the week of Stillwater Quarterly Meeting, thus bringing the spring session of the Meeting for Sufferings of Ohio Yearly Meeting at the same time. Naturally there cluster about these two events important meetings of Yearly Meetings' committees, all of which bring a rather large company to the school. This year the company was about normal in size, there being something over 300 visitors for the commencement exercises. Our assembly room was somewhat crowded, but our guests are accustomed to it and take the crowding very good-naturedly. The exercises were of the usual character of such occasions, and as we still stick to the old custom of having each student read the essay prepared for the occasion, the program was quite lengthy, but having half of the program the evening before and insisting on short essays, we manage to get them all read. David H. Forsythe, a former teacher of the school, 1877-79, delivered the class address which was very much to the point and much appreciated by all who heard it; a brief reference to this will appear in the Olney Current. The evening of Commencement Day the Alumni Association held its annual spring meeting, and after the transaction of some routine business was addressed by Judge Farr of the State Courts, whose knowledge of Friends began when as a boy he was brought up in a Quaker community in Columbiana Co., Ohio. He had long expressed a desire to address a group of young Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting, for he felt that they did not appreciate their privileges or the value of their religious training as they should. His address was inspirational and quite eloquent and was much enjoyed by all who heard him. As Judge of the Probate Court of Columbiana County for a number of years, he had opportunity to study various phases of delinquency, and he has often expressed himself that it was his belief that if all denominations were as careful in the training of their children as Friends there would be very little need for judges and courts; he has very great respect for the marriage customs amongst Friends and thinks they would prevent divorce if widely adopted. His early training amongst Friends he has not forgotten, and it has greatly influenced him in his public life.

Shortly before the close of the school year we had a very acceptable visit from Max I. Reich and companions, his wife, Francis Walton and Anna Walton. A short time before Anna Walton delivered before the school a very interesting lecture on her recent trip to the Hawaiian Islands, which was illustrated by some fine slides, most of which had been taken by herself.

We have had many good lectures during the past year and feel we owe many kind friends much for what they have done for us.

J. WETHERILL HUTTON.

THE Cheyney Commencement on Sixth Month 14, was a novel occasion in many ways. One of the special features was the presentation of a bronze tablet, the gift of the Alumni. The speech of acceptance was made by a member of the Board and responded to by Principal Hill.

The following are the exact words on the memorial tablet that was placed by the entrance door to the Carnegie Library Hall:—

"BY THEIR FRUITS YE SHALL KNOW THEM."

This tablet is set up to express the lasting gratitude of alumni, students and teachers for the pioneer service rendered by the Society of Friends to the cause of the education of the American Negro, first in the Institute for Colored Youth in Philadelphia, then in the Cheyney Training School for Teachers in Cheyney.

From 1837 to 1920 Friends built up and supported a private school for the professional training of Negro Teachers. They maintained the highest standards, visioning ever the highest humanity. It was a venture of faith in the dark days of our national life requiring foresight, Christian courage, patience, self-sacrifice, and the giving of their material substance.

In 1920 this institution became the fourteenth State Normal School of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Thus was the work of their hands established.

Presented by the Board of Trustees, June 14, 1922.

WALTER E. WILDMAN, Selma, Ohio, known to many who receive THE FRIEND, has taken the place of Murray S. Kenworthy as head of the Russian relief work.

MAX I. REICH interrupted his visitation to the meetings in Ohio in order to fulfil an engagement of long standing in Canada. A correspondent from Toronto has sent us the following notice of his service there:

The Eighth Annual Conference of the Hebrew Christian Alliance of America was held in Toronto, Canada, Fifth Month 30th to Sixth Month 2nd. Max I. Reich, of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, who is president, presided throughout the Conference, and gave the closing address, which was a remarkable picture of God's dealings with his chosen people in the past and a clear statement of the prophecies concerning them, now being fulfilled. The Friends' meeting at Maitland Street entertained the Hebrew Conference at supper on the evening of Sixth Month 1st. Max I. Reich spoke of the interest taken by Friends in the welfare of his race in the past. It was a very happy occasion. Six other churches in the city similarly welcomed the Christian Jews.

THE American Friend is responsible for the following reference to the opening of New York Yearly Meeting, Fifth Month 25, 1922:

The business session of the Yearly Meeting was remarkable for having no Friends' ministers from other Yearly Meetings present with minutes. Epistles had been received from all the Yearly Meetings with whom we regularly correspond, excepting California, and in addition a very sympathetic and helpful message from Genesee Yearly Meeting in Canada, where they had met jointly with our Canadian Friends.

The first session of the Yearly Meeting was devoted to considering the actual situation in our various meetings, and a query from one of the Quarterly Meetings was really taken to heart by the meeting and the session was brought to a solemn close by the reading of the London Epistle of 1921. The following is the form of the Query alluded to: "Have we lived our fullest life? Have we loved with deepest love? Have we burned our lamp of faith with ever brighter flame? Have we worked with ever-widening vision? Have we looked with the Master's understanding insight?"

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL NOTES.—The Graduating Exercises were held on the afternoon of Sixth Month 9th. The address to the School was delivered by Frederick J. Libby. Fifteen diplomas were granted to graduates, and certificates of partial work to four students. Members of this class are expecting to enter Haverford, Swarthmore, Goucher, Mount Holyoke and Wheaton Colleges, as well as the University of Pennsylvania, Drexel Institute and the Philadelphia Normal School.

The J. Henry Bartlett Honor Scholarships for 1922-1923 have been awarded to H. Walter Davis and E. Hope Broome, both of the Class of 1923.

Two of our teachers expect to spend the summer abroad—Anne Balderston in the study of Art and Lucile Hiatt in the study of French. Anna M. Garrett and Mary E. M. White expect to study at Teachers' College, Columbia University; Mary E. Williamson at Chicago University; Ethel M. Whitson at the University of Pennsylvania; E. Mae Myers at Middlebury College.

Mary E. Williamson was granted the degree of Master of Arts at the recent commencement of the University of Pennsylvania on work completed during the year.

We expect to have at least one representative at the Y. M. C. A. Preparatory School Conference to be held at Blairstown, N. J., from the twenty-fourth to the thirtieth of Sixth Month.

Pine Tree Lodge, the School Cottage at Pocono Manor, has been improved during the year by the addition of two dormer windows and the installation of electric lights. It will be occupied during the summer by some of our teachers with their families and friends.

The Children's Country Week Association is making use of our dining-room for its summer headquarters, while the Y. W. C. A. have the privileges of our tennis court.

The contract for the addition to our building, which will provide an entrance from the Parkway, as well as offices and other rooms, has been let to R. C. Ballinger and Company. The Art Jury has expressed approval of the plans and duly authorized the addition.
